That has been a tiresome trans-African voyage and we will return home to Ghana now. You must be too tired already so why not take a rest till tomorrow morning. As the old saying goes, "Tomorrow is another day" and we shall begin our tour of Ghana.

Energy Committee

Fifteen students, faculty mem bers and administrators have be named to an Energy Conservati Committee at Juniata College.

The chief tasks of the committe appointed by Juniata Preside John N. Stauffer, are recommen ing conservation measures to t college and explaining the need f such steps to the campus commu ity.

There will be a representative on campus next week from the Miss Central Pennsylvania Scholarship Pagent. He will be here to interview all interested girls Tuesday at 7:30 in the Gold Room.

Girl Spends Year Abroad in Spain Learning About Herself and Others

by Elayne Fahrnkopf

I must look at my past though looking at an eclipse of the sun — only through a narrow hole which lets in the image but not the blinding glare. It is only now, a full year after I left for a year in Spain, tthat I can capture the outlined form of an answer to "Why did you go to Spain?", "What did your year there mean to you?".

Please — you'll understand if you examine these three thought photographs of my life. They come together in the end to answer the above two questions.

• • • • • • • •

I. I lived in a safe world. I'm nine years old, in the living room, sticking to the red leather chair, reading about the American Indians. My father is painting the walls, furniture covered with last week's newspapers, the radio plays an Italian opera. I lose myself in the paint smell and the Indians and am quite content. But — the Italian opera? How can someone appreciate something he can't understand?

II. Nothing can touch me. I'm walking along the top of a brick wall, a princes in a yellow dress, acknowledging my attentive subjects with a shakey curtsy and . . . I fall. My knee throbs pain, and blackness shot with gold fills my head. The protective magic I thought I carried inside me has been wrenched away. So now I will have to deal with things myself.

III. I'm free. I'm riding my new bike. My parents aren't home so they can't see that I'm not stopping for the stop signs as I fly down one hill and as far up the next one as I can coast. I'm free and flying .. . until Chris (he says he wants to be a Nazi when he grows up) tries again and again to block my way with his bike. He can't do this, he can't be allowed to take away my free flight. I push him. He and I fall to the ground. I'm hitting him, hating him. Then, from behind the corner mailbox comes a voice cloth ed in a beige overcoat and felt hat: "Now, now, you two shouldn't fight like that. . ." How can that coat and hat say that? What does he know? He's not in the situation, and his authority, although paralyzing, is artificial.

Seniors Receive Practical Experience From Internship

by Dwight Johnson

Any junior interested in field work for his or her senior year should be aware of the opportunities available through the Business Department. In cooperation with local business firms, an intern program has been established for Juniata College seniors. The eight week program consists of an overview of the decision-making process of each firm as well as an assigned term project and weekly seminar meetings.

Approximately 15 openings are available for this program requiring a forty hour per week schedule, plus a coat and tie appearance. An accounting or math background is preferred although placements can be found for students specializing is other areas.

A student intern would spend a full term with firms such as Owens-Corning Fiberglas, The Elco Corp., or Swigart Insurance. In past years the results of the program have proved to be quite successful. Some students have even been offered jobs as a result of their internship. This real world opportunity is worth three units of academic credit; interested students are urged to contact the Business Department soon.

B.C.A. Offers Programs In France, Spain & Germany

The B.C.A. (Brethren Colleges Abroad) program at J.C. along with five other Brethren associated colleges annually sponsors students to Phillips-Universitat at Marburg, Germany, the University of Strasbourg, France, and the University of Barcelona, Spain. At present tthere are six J.C. students at Marburg, six at Strasbourg, and none at Barcelona. Prior to enrollment students are required six weeks of intensive language training, and are given the option of living in university facilities or private homes.

At Marburg students tend to become more incorporated with German students, in contrast to Strasborg where the establishment of an Institute for Foreign Students has somewhat isolated foreign students, and placed limitations in this area. Acceptance requirements into the University of Strasbourg aside from the Institute of Foreign Students are very rigid. One must be quite fluent and is expected to function on the same level as the French students. The program at Barcelona has of late been rather unsuccessful, due to frequent university closings because of political activities and disruptions.

Since there is a limited quota, students applying, compete scholastically with other students for acceptance into the program. The cost is less than that of spending a year in Huntingdon, due to the foreign government's paying most expenses, and most scholarships are transferable.

As a person who has visited both Marburg and Strasbourg, the opportunity seems quite compelling. For more information see Professors Dolnikowski or Engle, or anyone in the Foreign Language Department.

Washington and U.N. Semesters Provide Political Experience

by Rob Lopresti

For students who are interested in Political Science and life outside Huntingdon, the United Nations or Washington Semester could be a dream come true.

The UN Semester is a program run by Drew University in Madison, New Jersey. It's object is to give students an opportunity to learn about the UN at first hand. More than one hundred colleges have sent participants to the Semester. Juniata has been involved in the program for about ten years and has sent around 25 students through it.

The participants live at Drew and take three classes there of their own choosing. Two days a week they are bussed into New York for sessions at the UN. These include addresses by people who together cover the entire range of UN activities. They also have the opportunity to attend meetings of the General Assembly and the various committees.

While the Semester would be of special interest to those concentrating in Political Science it is open to people in any fields of study. However, usually only juniors are accepted.

The Washington Semester is very similar in set-up to the UN program. While living and taking courses at Washington University one learns about the workings of the federal government through research projects, observation and meetings with officials.

Application is open to juniors in any field of study. The campus coordinator is Dr. Harry Klug.

Since each Semester is 1½ trimesters long the Juniata Student would have five extra weeks. These can be used to undertake an independent study.

The Semester idea is a chance to learn about how the systems work first hand instead of by sitting in a classroom in Pennsylvania.

Social Fieldwork In Inner City And Appalachia Brings Students To Life

APPALACHIA

The Appalachian Semester at Union College is a unique educational opportunity offered to sophomore, junior and senior students. The comprehensive academic program, including classroom and field experience, provides 15 to 17 semester hours of credit in sociology or social work. Objectives of the Appalachian Semester include promoting an in-depth study of the implications of social and cultural conditions in Appalachia, providing an academic setting for understanding and participating in the dynamics of rural life, and offering students opportunities for actively seeking answers to regional problems through guided study, observation and participation.

The Appalachian Semester was initiated by Union College in the spring of 1970, and students from many states and schools have participated. Since the college is fully accredited, the academic credit may be transferred to the student's home, college or university. Union College is a private, church-related institution offering two-year, four-year and graduate degrees.

At present, one Juniata student is enrolled in the program.

URBAN STUDIES

Urban Studies can be coordinated also through the Sociolgy department. This program consists of work with agencies in the inner city. Students work with the agency to help victims of the poor conditions in the cities. Also available, if the student desires, are courses in conjuction with Wooster College in the area of Sociology.

Last year, a Juniata student spent one term and the summer months in this program. If there is anyone interested in this program, the Sociology department will be able to assist with further information.

In Defense of Paths

Dear Dr. Crouch,

Yes, it wasn't very long ago that I too held an ireful attitude toward "all those barren paths across green, grassy areas". But I ask you to take a second, more attentive look, and hope you are more inclined to add paths to your list of "grassy areas, trees, flowers, etc."

A path is more than the mere absence of grass; a path is an entity in itself in that it is a marked way. Indeed, I can't see where a path created in grassy areas by the passing of human beings is any less natural than a path created in a woods by the passing of deer; and then, what can one say of the naturalness of mowed grass? I presume you judge our campus paths an unfine aspect of nature because of their physical unattractiveness. Physical attractiveness does not strike me as being a wholely satisfactory criterion for natural fineness; consider the appearance of a praying mantis, or a hurricane, or the human brain. I, personally, reject that anyone can "enjoy nature at its finest" in that I understand nature to be only the manner or state of things, and this entails no implicit value criteria whereby any thing can be judged "finer".

At any rate, what are the redeeming qualities of a path? In that a path is a marked way, it is a way to some place or some thing or some experience; the possibilities are infinite. Robert Frost saw some special challenge in a certain road; Alice found wonderous adventures along a path through a hole; and given that for the past year or so I have been engaged in a private love affair with learning, how can I feel disgust toward a path that is guiding me to a place where I too will find wonderous and challenging adventures? (I am embarrassed at my sentimentality.)

I anticipate that your comment to this is, "Still, should we not confine our pedestrianism to the cement and asphalt if only for the reason that that is why it was laid?" My most obvious reply is, "Utility." A path will spontaneously (naturally) be created where traffic is most likely; given that on this campus the object of pedestrian traffic is primarily to travel between buildings, it is most likely (for the sake of utility) that it take the course of the shortest distance between two points. You yourself recognized our illegitimate paths as "short-cuts". Thus, it is implied that our cement and asphalt paths are not always true to the nature of "natural" paths in that in the engineering of them we have sometimes compromised utility for the sake of landscaping. Which then, I ask, are the adulterated, illegitimate paths?

At this point, one, more ignorant than yourself I'm sure, might retort, "Well what if everyone walked on the grass whereever they so desired?" This is comparable to asking, "What if everyone in the whole world sneezed at the same time?"—both equally absurd improbabilities.

And so, Dr. Crouch, I ask you to look again and see if a path doesn't have its place; and then look to see what othter aspects of our fine nature you have heretofore judged with paths.

W.C. Fields and Mostel Head Movies

W.C. Fields

by Stella

W. C. Fields is one of a very few comedians who is as familiar to this generations as he was to two generations before. And lately, some years after his death, he seems to be gaining rapidly in popularity. Posters, books, records and television commercials all trade on the notoriety of Fields and count on his reputation to attract attention and build sales.

This phenomonon known as W. C. Fields will hit Juniata this weekend in the form of two of his most famous films. Those films are "Never Give a Sucker an Even Break" and "The Fatal Glass of Beer." For those students who have never seen Fields, this will be a special chance for them to get acquainted with him and for anyone who is already hooked on the Fieldsian brand of charm (Ha!), they should welcome the opportunity to re-view these classics.

For whatever reason, however, everyone should try to attend the on-campus films this weekend. Like Mom and apple pie, W. C. Fields has become an American institution. You may not love him but you should certainly be aware of him. And, at campus prices, you'll never have a better opportunity.

The time is 8:00 P.M. this Friday, January 25 and the place is Alumni Hall. Be there!

A Funny Thing..

by Brad Rudy

Zero Mostel is the first of two modern comedians to be shown this term that has developed his own recognized and consistent persona. Primarily a stage actor ("Fiddler on the Roof"), two films, "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum" and "The Great Bank Robbery", have shown that his talent is not confined to one medium only.

While startlingly original in itself, Mostel's character is more dependent on the influence of W. C. Fields than any other predecessor. He, like Fields, is essentially the "likeable con-artist". He points out the follies of "law-abiding citizens" by getting around them and profitting from them in the most absurd manners possible. For example, in "The Great Bank Robbery", he succeeds in robbing the most "unrobbable" bank in the West by posing as a revival minister. In "Funny Thing", by far the better film, he uses his "masters" (he's a Roman slave) as foils for his comic antics and succeeds in satirizing both Roman and contemporary society.

"FTHWTF" is essentially a movie that has everything going for it. First is the top-notch cast. Apart from Mostel and Buster Keaton in a cameo role playing his stoical old self, the film features Phil Silvers and Jack Gilford, perhaps two of the best comedians alive. Second, the score is by Stephen Sondheim who has had a his Broadway musical every year for the past three years. Most of the songs have been deleted from the film but the three or four that remain are a joy. Finally, the film has Richard Lester as a director. Achieving instant fame with "A Hard Days Night" and "Petulia", he is perhaps one of the greatest British directors alive.

"A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum" will be shown Tuesday, January 29 at 7:00 p.m. in Alumni Hall. Critic Steven Scheuer has said: "Mostel is much more than a comic—he is, simply, one of the very greatest actors alive." Come and Enjoy!!

Baer Questions New Curriculum

Editor's Note:

I have been asked by both Dave Baer and members of Student Government to mention that these articles in no way represent the collective or individual opinions of the members of Student Government.

AEB

by Dave Baer

The late President Johnson's domestic policy, "The Great Society", was a problem for the critics. Anyone who challenged its goals which were idealistically humanitarian was considered little better than a murderer. Johnsonites would argue their cause by saying "look what we are trying to do", but from its blunders it's obvious that the road to hell is paved with good intentions.

Such is the case to some degree with our new curriculum. We have established unquestionably tremendous goals and yet I can't help but question the effectiveness in achieving these goals. It seems that in our transition from the old to the new, we have lost our sense of direction and have produced a bastardized version. In any program there are elements of pedantry, frustration and practical limitations involved. But even with these considerations, I feel we are falling short for some reason.

What's wrong with what is happening now? Faculty have told me that students are sleeping with their eyes open in classes, that students aren't really doing anything but rote learning and that they (faculty) are tired of talking at warm bodies. Students have related to me that thy are bored with the empty motions of many of their classes. Students proudly state that they were able to bullshit their way through Modes. How many students have an understanding of the new curriculum? Students complain that their Freshman Seminars were flops. And to top it all off, students have told me that they had to forget everything they had in Modes the first time they took a "real" course.

Many would argue that these sort of problems are inherent in any educational structure, but are they? Are we really interested in executing to the best of our ability the goals of the Task Force. Or are we just paying in lipservice as I alluded in my last article.

Do we as students really have all those rights and responsibilities?

(Along Muddy Run)

by David Andrews

Juniata College is described in the 1973-74 catalog as an "independent, privately supported coeducational institution committed to providing a liberal arts educaton to qualified students regardless of sex, race, religion, creed, or color." However, the catalog fails to describe that the college consists almost exclusively of one color, race, and creed.

Juniata is primarily White-Anglo-Saxon-Protestant, and the college will continue to be primarily consisted of these particular origins. But this does not inevitably mean that we should let this college remain primarily "W.A.S.P.-ish."

Typically, students at Juniata share the same basic beliefs and values. This situation is only natural, since most students come from approximately the same socio-economic backgrounds. But a diverse assortment of students from different backgrounds is needed to give the student a "realistic" view of the society of which he is a member.

Presently, the student body lives in an "a typical" homogeneous community. There are only approximately fifteen black students on campus—an extremely low number for a campus of 1200 students.

What can be done? An active recruiting program by the Student Government and the admissions office should be the first step. In last week's edition, Jean Pollock accurately described the successful process of "informal" recruiting of prospective students being done by various members of the college community. However, an ambitious recruitment program is needed to bring more minority students to this campus.

The admissions office has done an excellent job of keeping enrollment intact at Juniata during the "college money-crunch." Naturally, the admissions personnel will recruit heavily from schools that have provided Juniata with students in the past. In the future, though, visits should be made to schools in the cities and schools from other communities which have not been previously pursued.

This situation almost found a panacea last month. The college was considering initiating Project 101 of the state of Pennsylvania, in which the state would aid in the financing of a program for minority students. A full-time director was to be hired to direct the program for minority students. This director would aid in recruiting students from minority groups and would help to obtain financial aid for these students.

After the faculty Personnel Committee interviewed three prospective candidates for this position, it was determined that there was insufficient funding for the portion of the program the college was expectd to pay.

Hence, it is highly likely that Juniata may remain a "college of W.A.S.P.'s" unless the college community unites with the admissions office to help bring greater heterogeneity to the student body.

Trustee Mourned By Juniata Campus

The Rev. George L. Detwiler, a member of the Board of Trustees for more than 20 years, died Thursday at his home in Greencastle.

Pastor Detwiler, 70, a 1928 graduate of Juniata, has been a trustee of the college since 1958. He also served in this capacity between 1947 and 1950.

Rev. Detwiler served as pastor of Stone Church of the Brethren for four years and retired from the active ministry in 1971.

President Stauffer said, "Dr. George Detwiler was a man of rare devotion to his Church. He was a dedicated pastor and a respected leader in both church and community affairs. His selfless career was a great credit to Juniata, his alma mater; he loved his college and served her faithfully as a trustee."

Federal Service Entrance Exams Coming Up Soon

College seniors will have an opportunity to compete in the Federal Service Entrance Examination (FSEE) when it is given on a walk-in basis at our campus on Saturday, February 2, 1974. Details about the on-campus test are available at the office of Career Planning.

During the past year 116 on-campus tests were given at 76 colleges within the Philadelphia Region which covers five states including this area. More than 2,300 men and women competed in these tests and more than 60% attained an eligible rating.

The FSEE was designed with the college student in mind. One test taken one time in one place opens the door to approximately 60 different and challenging career fields in many Federal agencies at locations all over the country.

Open to seniors and graduates in any academic major the program is appropriate for students in all curricula except Engineering, Sciences, Accounting and a limited number of other technical fields. This examination remains the most popular avenue for obtaining Federal employment.

Energy Commission Asks Students To Help Conserve

by Jim Hunter

The Energy Conservation Committee at Juniata College has announced that an urgent need for conservation of fuel oil is needed here. Although we are not yet in need of closing the school because of lack of oil, we could run into severe danger if any fuel oil is wasted. You've probably all heard of ways to conserve, but how often do you follow them. Do you take shorter showers? All the water on campus is heated by the college and it takes a lot of oil to heat water. Please read the memo the Energy Conservation Committee sent you, and follow it.

NEH Matches Funds For JC

Because of its successful matching effort, Juniata College will receive an additional $43,750 from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

According to Dr. John N. Stauffer, Juniata president, the NEH had offered to match dollar for dollar whatever the college could raise from its own constituencies up to $43,750. The total of $87,500 will be used to expand the collection of the Beeghly Library, particularly in the humanities.

William E. Swigart, Jr., local insurance executive and realtor, chaired the committee which raised the matching funds. Swigart and the other committee members also serve on the college's Development Council.

In acknowledging the accomplishment of Swigart and his committee, Dr. Stauffer remarked that Juniata "is fortunate to have dedicated alumni leadership, volunteer enthusiasm and constituents who are willing to invest in the growth and development of the college."

Some 120 donors contributed the $43,750 needed to successfully complete the matching program.

by Steve Townsend

The new day was fast approaching 2 A.M. and it was becoming very evident that unless some great new stimuli came across the television, it was going to lose the last of its viewers. Three friends and myself had been "glued to the tube" all evening in anticipation of one of the Rolling Stones rare TV appearances. But it was now nearly an hour past the TV Guide's listing time and the Stones were not to be found. The four of us were certain that we had spent the last few hours subjecting ourselves to prime-time torture for no apparent worthy reason. As two o'clock arrived, bringing with it a barrage of $4.95 "super-hit" record offers, we decided this hopeless bummer should come to an end. There was no reason to waste a good night's sleep watching a parade of B-rate Hollywood flicks, so I reached for the control knob with my toe. Just as I hit the "off" switch the sets speaker vomitted forth a haunting, yet familiar sound with the last of its power. An instant later, it seemed to dawn on all four of us as to exactly what that sound was. Suddenly four bodies made the break-neck dive at the television, and as miraculously as one of us managed to turn it back on without destroying it, the dull black and white Westerns had been replaced by the sensuous and vividly colorful face of Mick Jagger.

Of course, the sound that had sparked us to life was Keith Richards' classic guitar intro to "Angie." Since that time, nearly everyone who has ever been near a transistor radio is familiar with those opening notes. In fact, "Angie" emerged as one of 1973's most successful singles with sales approaching two million copies, and saturation air play by nearly every Top 40's station in the country. The Stones, amid rumors of their stagnation, were back on top, except this time they struck with a durable, tender ballad instead of their usual, pounding, hard rock standards.

"Angie's" tremendous success was due largely to two important factors. The first being the tremendous sexual aura that surrounds Jagger's every sound, and motion. The second stems from the band's willingness to subordinate themselves to this image and write solid professional material that showcases his sexuality. "Angie" is such a song. It encompasses near perfection of both these goals.

The musical arrangements of the song are characterized by their simplistic beauty throughout. Of special mention is Nicky Hopkin's tender treatment of the piano line and Nicky Harrison's fine string arrangements. Combined these two aspects give "Angie" its underlying atmosphere of innocent love. Mixed dominantly over this combination, is Richards' course acoustic guitar, and a vocal posturing by Jagger which is far and away his best performance. Jagger has never sounded so alive, vibrant, and magnificently sexual as he does here. The lyrical delivery exudes an intensly physical bedside manner. As Jagger cries, "They can't say we never tried", pictures of a couple who have just made love for the last time come to mind. There is no innocence pretended here. The vocal allows Jagger to run the gauntlet of his considerable sexual talents.

The pitting of a hopelessly fruitless innocent love against a fulfilling physical relationship combine to make "Angie" one of the Stone's greatest accomplishments. In an age when cheap sex themes are a dime a dozen in the musical world, it's comforting to know that the Stones are showing that they are still miles ahead of their competition. The emergence of "Angie" as the year's adult love ballad is proof enough for this author.

Good Luck to the Winter IM Competitors

by Alice Boomhower

There is an urgent need on this campus for relaxation. In the past few weeks, the amount of tension that the campus has experienced has increased greatly. There are several possible reasons for this, some of them not so pretty.

I think the atmosphere of tension that is present is partly due to the 10 week terms that is now in effect. Last year was the first year that this system was tried. Profs were not exactly sure of what to expect, so they tended to lighten the load a little. This year, after a year's experience, profs are trying harder to cram more into a term. This is not true for all courses, but it is a contributing factor.

Second it is that time of the year when we are all tired of winter. We have a long way to look towards term break, and there is a slump in parties and activities.

Thirdly, in the past few weeks there have been some very sorrowful moments for the campus as a whole. And finally, the excitement of the football win is over. During the football seoson, there was a unifying force for the campus. We could revel in our success. But, now that thrill is gone, and everyone is going their separate ways.

All these factors combined have brought an air of fear, and uncertainty to the campus.

There are several things we could do about this situation. First of all, we need a unifying cause to bring us together. A project that the campus to believe in, something spactacular. I felt this mood at the Warsaw Philharmonic concert. All of those who went to the concert forgot all their troubles for the two hours and were completely engulfed in the beauty of the music. We need more happenings of this sort to make us reflect that the campus is not our whole life, and that there are real people outside of Huntingdon.

Also, in my last editorial, I suggested that a free school might be a good thing for Center Board to initiate. I have talked to several people about this idea, and it appears that there is some interest in this field.

Finally, there is not going to be another football team for some time, so we are going to have to look to ourselves and the leaders of this campus for some assistance.

Unusual Courses Being Taught At High School

by Ginny Harris

Granted, J.C. may not be the broadening experience I thought college would be, but this does not mean that there aren't enlightening experiences to tap off campus. Perhaps I'm not alone with these impressions, and if I am maybe you'd be interested in one of the many courses being offered by the Huntingdon High School, and the Vo-Tech Center in Mill Creek.

The tentative course offerings at the High School are contemporary poetry, sewing, physical fitness for men, beginning bookkeeping and furniture refinishing (for those who find themselves picking up odd pieces at auctions and flea markets). These will be on Monday evenings from 7-9 P.M. On Wednesday the selection of courses includes Science, Typing I and II, Sewing, U.S. History, Upholstery, Beginning Spanish, Advanced Shorthand, and Physical Fitness for Women. These courses are available to the whole community, and registration will be Wednesday evening, January 23 between 7 and 9 P.M. in the High School Office. Most of these classes will be for 10 weeks again, from 7-9 P.M., one night a week.

The VoTech Center in Mill Creek, (look for the old bakery building, then go inside) will be holding registration for their evening program Wednesday and Thursday this week from 7:30 to 9:00 P.M. at the Center. Sessions are 3 hours one night a week for 10 weeks. Fees will be $5.00 for registration to be refunded to those students who attend 70% or more of their classes, and $5.00 to help defray the cost of supplies. So if you attend most of your classes its only $5.00, and that's not bad, figuring on the skills you will acquire along the way.

Ever wonder what's going on underneath the hood of your car? You can find out. Auto Mechanics, held on Thursday evenings, beginning February 7, from 6-9 P.M. at the Mill Creek Center. Basic Electricity will be offered Mondays beginning February 4, from 7-10 P.M. Operation of the lathe, shaper, and milling machine will be included in Basic Machine Shop, offered through the VoTech program at Huntingdon High School beginning February 6 from 7-10 P.M.

If you're thinking of learning the basics of brick and stone laying, stone cutting, plastering, tile setting and mixing procedures, the Masonry course is for you. Welding will be offered at the Huntngdon High Schools on either or Monday or Wednesday night from 7-10 P.M. beginning the week of February 4. At the Southern Huntingdon High School, Small Engine Repair will be offered Thursday, February 7 from 6:30 to 8:30.

I hope there is something here that might interest you. If I'm lucky, there'll be room in the Auto Mechanics class when I sign up. I've always wondered what my little yellow VW was doing when I took off down the road, and if it ever stops going down the road, I hope I'll know what to do.

Anyone who would be interested in organizing plans for a Crafts Weekend with various teaching workshops, please contact Alice Boomhower or leave your name at the Information desk.

Basketball Season Off and Running for Men and Women

Women

The Juniata Women's varsity basketball team defeated Messiah College 29-21 in their first game of the season. High scorer for Juniata was Cathy Dickey (soph.) with seven points. Freshman starter Mardi Fry pulled down 14 rebounds to lead the team. The team is coached by Mr. Pat Frazier. The five starters for J.C. were Mardi Fry, Sue Fry, Sue Rosshirt, Leslie Whittaker, Kim Norris, and Vernne Wetzel.

It took quite a while for our team to get their offense working. Messiah used a zone throughout the game. Juniata used a man-to-man defense for the first half and part of the 3rd quarter. When our girls changed to a zone defense, Messiah had trouble. A few quick baskets on fast breaks from stolen balls opened up the game. Several Messiah players got into foul trouble, and only one Juniata player picked up five personal fouls.

The game was played under the DWRS rules. Under these game rules; there is no backcourt violation, the offensive team has 30 seconds to take a short from inbounding, the ball, all fouls result in free throws. and all violations (walking, doulbled-dribbling, etc.) are brought inbounds at the foul line. Juniata might also play under PIAA rules, these are the same rules that the men's team plays under.

Tuesday the team travels to Gettysburg for a tough game, and Saturday evening they face Penn State at Altoona before the men's varsity game.

Men

The Indians snapped a 2 game losing streak with a 64-60 squeaker over the Vulcans of California State here Saturday night. Juniata had been on the road and had suffered 2 tough losses at the hands of Dickinson and Bucknell.

Against Dickinson the well balanced attack of the Indians almost pulled off the upset, only a last shot at the gun gave Dickinson the victory. Friday the Indians again played a good game but not quite good enough to lose to a very tough Bucknell squad.

Against California State the Indians started slow. Slow might not be the word however as both offenses worked for the good shot which they usually didn't get much to the dismay of the fans. The Indians were able to remain close and trailed by 5, 27-22 at the half.

The second half proved to be more exciting as the tempo of the game picked up. When Juniata switched to a zone defense the momentum also seemed to switch and the Indians gained the lead. The Vulcans keep fighting back largely due to Augie DePasque who seemed to be the core of Californians offense. DePasque who seemed to score at will in the 1st half was hindered by the zone defense and the switch probably turned a loss into a victory. Donny Williams again was the leading scorer but got some solid help from Tabor, Jula, Hachett and Martin who came out strong in the 2nd half to bring home the victory, the 4th in 5 games at home. The week didn't help Juniata as far as improving their record is concerned as they went 1-2 for a 6-7 record overall. However the losses didn't hurt the Indians as far as the MAC's are concerned as Juniata's conference record is 2-2

This week Juniata travels to Grove City Tuesday. They return home then for 2 important MAC games with Scranton and Wilkes. Two victories this week could greatly improve the Indians position and with the season just about half way over Juniata is still in the running.

tion that nothing was real in my life unless I could in some way create or guide it myself.

During my first two years here at Juniata, I was still dissatisfied. I suppose that somehow it must be possible to stay here on this campus for four years in a row while maintaining a sort of sanity; making the rounds from dorm room(ugh!), to library (Ugh!!), to cafeteria ( ) . . . . . But I couldn't. I felt trapped. I felt I was complying with what was expected of me, this giving only a superficial satisfaction i.e. grades. Sophomore year I was expected to make "meaningful decisions" about my future. Sure thing! I couldn't even see myself then.

So — why did I leave for Spain? I was afraid of being a victim of my safe world; it would have been an easy thing, and perhaps not too unexpected, to lose myself in a reliance on someone or something else, other than myself. I wanted to know that if I were ever to fall off a now higher and more terrifying brick wall, I could still believe in myself. I didn't want to stand on the sidelines accepting hand-me-down solutions. I had to actually get into a situation where my well-being depended on each decision I made. ,

By studying in another culture, I could see myself in sharp relief against a background of strangeness. I watched in fascination as certain cherished thoughts linked with incoming new ones, and writhed in mental agony as I saw that certain other ideas no longer fit and had to be discarded or rearranged. My year in Spain was both an escape and a challenge.

In Spain I had more time to spend as I liked. Except for the expenses of two trips in Europe I took during the year, the cost of the program in Spain was about equal to that of a year here.

If you feel unwilling to let yourself be guided through four years of college, why don't you consider spending some time living and learning within a different culture? You certainly can't lose anything. If you don't feel like tackling a foreign language, there are programs in England. If you don't want to spend a full year abroad, maybe a summer program or a semester study plan would fit better into your plans. No matter what your field of study may be, you can arrange to continue courses at a university abroad — practically anywhere.

It will be a great change and will allow you to see yourself and/or any other idea you want to explore more clearly.

My apologies to Dave Baer concerning his article on the curriculum. The paragraph should have read:

I do know that the original intention of the Task Force on Curriculum that started in 1969 on its project of academic revision wasn't a sales pitch for Juniata. However, after several years of watching its implementation, one certainly could question the matter.

Participation in Volleyball and Basketball Keep Interest Alive in Winter Intramurals

Volleyball

by Jamie Belmont

Legs! Legs! and more legs! That's what you'll see on the volleyball courts this winter in the gym. Every night is a different match. Come and see your favorite set of legs. Cheer them through a winning season.

The standings as of January 15: Co-Rec Volleyball: Tied for first place are Excuse Me and Co. and It's a Joke with 4-0 records each. Second place is held by Meacham's Mob 3-0, third by Active Transport, 2-1; and in fourth place is Ratzass.

In the Women's Volleyball the lead is held by Taken In Stride. Us holds a close second, with Dirty Pots and The Drop Deads, and A Little Bit of Everything tied for third.

Cripples and Dubois House are tied for first place in the Men's Volleyball League with 3-0 records each. Holding down second place and tied for the honor are Amsterdam Boy and Goosing Co. and the Morgans with 2-1 records.

Are we really developing as intellectually autonomous individuals or are we guinea pigs in the greatest Skinner box of them all—the American College.

I don't purport to have answers to any of these questions. The Task Force placed a premium of continual reflection and interpretation of our educational posture. I believe students and Faculty should be more conscious of not only what they are doing, but also why they art doing it.

This past year I've encountered a wide scope of students from many schools and few if any had the enthusiasm that J.C. students do about the curriculum. Many are astonished at educational developments on our campus. Probably the greatest single aspect of the "New curriculum" is that it is new and innovative. But unless we continually question its status, I'm afraid our new curriculum may show signs of early aging.

Grant Given By Arco To Chem Dept.

Juniata College has received a grant of $2,000 from the Atlantic Richfield Foundation, it was announced today by Dr. John N. Stauffer, president of the college.

The check was presented to Dr. Stauffer by H. Paul Cook, a 1938 graduate of Juniata and an Arco dealer in Huntingdon. The funds will be utilized by the chemistry department as a departmental assistance grant.

Arco provides support for higher education through a variety of programs. The type of grant received by Juniata has been awarded to a select group of "outstanding" independent colleges and universities across the country to aid in "maintaining their traditions of academic freedom."

Preesident Stauffer said: "We are indeed pleased that the Atlantic Richfield Foundation has recognized Juniata as such an institution."

Geibel Studies Structure Of The Corporate Union

By Dwight Johnson

Greg Geibel of the Sociology Department at Juniata College, is presently engaged in advanced research of American political and social organizations, particularly the role of labor unions in our society. The typically elitist approach to American history has been abandoned by Mr. Geibel in the interest of the common man's contribution to our society.

Labor unions, originally a leftist movement, were initiated for the protection of workers being victimized by their corporate employers. An oral-historical approach will document case histories of subjects of such victimization by means of tape recorded interviews. Rather than have some historian speculate 10 years from now as to what happened to these people, they will have a chance to speak for themselves.

Mr. Geibel's research is largely concerned with continued growth of technology and economic power with the industrial sector of our society. Of particular interest are the effects of automation and conglomerates upon union organizational structures, concerns of union democracy, collective bargaining and social change. The research aims to point out how union mergers can result in progressive legislation.

Dr. Kihl— An Expert On Korea

by Michael Houck

Besides his teaching activities here at JC, Dr. Young Kihl also finds time to do substantial amounts of research in his field of Political Science. Because of his knowledge of Korea and U. S., Dr. Kihl is sought after by many universities in their sudies of Southeast Asian politics. His primary outside activities include writing books and magazine articles, and research on current political problems.

Dr. Kihl was appointed as a fullbright-Hayes Reasearch Professor and worked at the Asiatic Research Center of Korea University. Here, he made a detailed study of elections and party politics of the Korean government. With other political scientists, Dr. Kihl made editorial contributions to a book on this subject which is presently held by a publishing firm.

The American Political Science Association sponsored Dr. Kihl on a reasearch study of Policy output and electoral composition in Korean cities. Dr. Kihl assumed the position of the head of the field service and organized interviews with citizens and notables of Korean cities.

In 1971, Professor Kihl published a reasearch paper on international aviation which is presently used in a political science course at Syracuse University. The title of this book is "Conflict on International Navigation." He has also written a large number of articles mostly for the "Korean Journal" and the Asiatic Survey." The data which Dr. Kihl presented in his writings were used for a seven nation study of the Korean legislature. Another papaer of his was presented to the North-South Korean conference. The subject of this work pertained to the Nixon Doctrine in Korea and its effects.

Lakso Researches Energy Problems And Effective Ways To Solve Them

Professor Jim Lakso, of Juniata's Economics Department is presently engaged in writing a paper on the "Measure of Energy Effectiveness" as part of a course he is taking from the National Science Foundation and the American Association for the Advancement of Science. The course is for selected college teachers and is based on the type fo research they want to be engaged in. Prof. Lakso's class met in the fall for two days of lecture from Cyril Komer, a well-known authority in the Physical Biology Dept. and especially dealing with estimating the environmental and health effects of different uses of energy. The encompassing course title is "Energy Supply and Energy Demand." The group will again meet in the spring for each participant's paper to be presented as a preliminary draft, for possible further research, refinement, and eventual publication.

The purpose behind the paper is to estimate what has happened to energy effectiveness over time and to "devise a measure of energy effectiveness, total energy consumption per unit dollar of value added per level of out put in different sections of the economy." The major source of his data will be in input-output tables published by the Commerce Department. He will be deriving an aggregate measure of energy consumption over time and noting the ratio of energy consumed per dollar added. The basis for the research is to decide which industries make effective use of energy and which don't.

The present stage of his research is to determine why there has been the drastic decline in energy effectiveness per unit dollar. Prof. Lakso is sorting out what demand shifts occured and account for the decline in energy productivity by demand shifts. Several noted reasons so far are the use of intermediate goods which require the use of more energy for production, such as the switching from steel to aluminum in the manufacture of cars. Another factor is the energy underpricing which caused this shift as well as the change in consumer's tastes toward buying high energy consuming products.

In addition to being a report type presentation, Prof. Lakso will be arguing present means of energy usage by sector are inaccurate and the present data can be used to develope better data and better measures. He has a few ideas himself on the improvements but will not develop them at this time without further research.

Between work like this and the brain child known as "Modes of Though," Jim Lakso is indeed showing himself to be one of those who will not let the gray matter deteriorate yet. Maybe a few of the students should follow his example.

Senft's Study: Ion Passage Thru Frogs

by Dave Mitchell

Independent reserch is an important part of today's technologicval society. At Juniata, students and faculty have established a place for themselves in this society by their work in independent studies and projects. Currently, the biology department is involved in a study of frog membranes.

Dr. Joseph Senft is heading a reserch project which has been underway for approximately a year now involving the passage of ions through frog membranes under different conditions. The study had been funded by a grant through the National Institutes of Health in cooperation with Rutgers University where a similar study is now underway with red blood cells.

The Juniata project began its reserech last summer under direc-direction of Dr. Senft and the work of three JC students: Greg Grueber, Pete Martina, and Charles Austin. Their work involved the study of ions and various solutions and how they passed through a membrane layer, in this case, the membrane

Schettler Studies Liquid Crystals From Cancer to Television

by Gloria Barone

Entering a room after being told the potential to detect cancer awaits just through the doorway, I almost forgot I was still at Juniata College. But Professor Paul A. Schettler, slightly disheveled but eager to show me his slides, microscope, tubes and other paraphernelia, led me to the sight of one of his latest interests — working with liquid crystals.

And They can detect cancer.

Bustling about the room, Schettler's first answer to my question of how he became involved with these phenomenal crystals which can be concocted out of soap or cholesterol derivations was, "Gee, I can't remember". But he concluded that he must have read about them sometime two or three years ago, spurring his interest.

The liquid crystals are pressure and temperature sensitive, and when touched on a slide with a coverslip over the liquid crystal, flashing color changes can be seen

TWIRP Week Brings Many Activities to JC

Well girls, it's that time of the year again when you get to ask out that guy you've been waiting to go out with all year. Now's you're big chance, but where do you take him at Juniata? Life on campus tends to get kind of dull during the winter months, and you're afraid that there'll be nothing to do. Don't despair, Center Board has planned several activities for all types of people during this special week.

Heading off the weekend will be the hit movie M.A.S.H. This should provide an easy atmosphere for even the most reluctant TWIRP. After you're all full of laughs from the movie, why not bop over to the Semi-formal in Ellis. The Special Events Committee has designed the theme of the "Ascot" for this special dance. The Ballroom will be decorated in the style of the Nightclub, with the band Pheonix playing from 10:00 P.M. til 1:00 A.M. Refreshments will be served. And for all those guys who have been looking for something very special to do, and you're afraid that girl you have you're eyes on is just too shy to ask you, remember, this doesn't have to be a TWIRP.

Then on Saturday evening, the Rob Taylor Band will perform in Oller Hall. This band is composed of a group of school teachers from the Philadelphia area. they play many popular tunes and should prove to be a good copncert.

And finally, if you're not going to be around this weekend and would still like to TWIRP someone special, the Billy Joel concert will be held next Thursday evening. The "Piano Man" will be performing at 9:30 in Oller Hall.

Piano Man Billy Joel Here Feb. 7

Ever since the wonderfully young age of 4, Billy Joel has been playing the piano, not always good, and he didn't always like it, but he played. Now he's the piano man, or so you would be led to believe from his most recent album. His first album, "Cold Spring Harbor" was a huge success; at least one person I know owns a copy. All seriousness aside, however, his second album, "Piano Man" should bring him some national aclaim.

What happens to be more important, however, is that Billy Joel is coming to Juniata College, Thursday, February 7. Maybe you never heard of him before, maybe you have. But since you've been complaining that they never get anybody here, now you have the chance to ge and hear somebody good. If your musical listening tastes are confined to the top 40 hits, you might be hearing of him in the future. Well, the point of this is that Center Board did get somebody to come to Juniata, and in my opinion, he's good.

Juniata Receives $100,000 Gift From Goods for Fund

Juniata College has received a deferred gift of $100,000 from Mr. and Mrs. Joseph R. Good of Hollidaysburg, Pa., it was announced on Monday by Juniata President John N. Stauffer.

The gift from the Goods raises the total in the college's Centennial Fund to more than $1.4 million. Initiated in October with advanced gifts and pledges of $1.2 million, the campaign will continue until 1976 when Juniata celebrates its 100th aniversary. The goal of the campaign is to raise $5 million for increased endowment.

In expressing the gratitude of the entire college community to the Goods, President Stauffer said: "This is heartwarming because of its very real worth to the future of the college and to its students. It is pleasing also because it will give a great boost to this initial part of the Centennial Fund effort. Jane and Joe Good are great and wonderful freinds of Juniata."

Mr. Good, former president of the Hollidaysburg Trust Co., is a member of Juniata's class of 1933 and has served on the college's Board of Trustees since 1952.

He and his wife, the former Jane Stultz, have made substantial contributions to many projects at Juniata over the years. They also have served as hosts at their summer home in New Enterprise for many college social gatherings such as alumni picnics and receptions for students from Blair and Bedford Counties.

In addition, they are avid followers of Juniata's athletic teams and seldom miss a football game, regardless of where it is played.

Mr. Good served as chairman for the alumni phase of a previous capital fund drive in the early 1960's. During the drive, he and his wife attended all alumni campaign meetings across the country, including one in Honolulu.

COMMUNICATIONS CENTRAL

The Juniatian will publish and WJC will broadcast notices for upcoming events if received by Friday Noon the week of publication or 5 days before the event is to take place. All information to be published should be submitted IN DUPLICATE to P.O. 996 and should contain the name of the event when and where it will occur and the price for tickets, if any.

by Alice Boomhower

I have been asked by several students what the purpose of the last few Juniatians is. This. to me, seems rather simplistic. but I'll at least try. The last Juniatian featured the programs that students can participate in for experience in the "outside world".

I find many students on this campus questioning the education that they are getting, and wondering if it will prepare them for a job. Last evening, I heard a coffeehouse performer say that he had spent four years in college to work in a factory for $3.28 an hour. According to him. the education had not helped him get a better job.

Another comment I have heard is that students were sick of the dull, boring, classroom scene, and would like to get out in the "world" for a while. just for the change.

The last paper was dedicated to these people, so that they might be able to find something to their interest.

Over the past few months, the Juniatian staff has dedicated several such papers to this type of program. Needless to say. this campus does not have three rapes, two murders, and twelve fires during one week. By the time this paper is printed, that type of news has been around this campus three times and back. It would be a futile effert to cover this type of news. Secondly, we at the staff feel that the Juniatian is more than a "report past news as you see it" type paper. This type of reporting is much less effective for a small number of people, than it is for a large number. If we tried to report as the New York Times does, we would end up with half a page of coming events. Thirdly, we feel that informing) students of the opportunities and problems on campus is our most important function. Finally, we feel that reviews of events in the previous week are not very valuable. Who wants to hear about how a dance went, when if you were really interested you would have been there in the first place or asked a friend?

I feel that the newspaper fulfills a vital role in the campus community, but I don't feel that that role is entirely one of previewing coming events. We are here to evaluate programs,) (comment) on things off campus (something that doesn't happen very often), serve as a clearing house for student opinion, and notify students of upcoming events they may be interested. We are not here to watch, we are here to aid the campus.

Curriculum

Alright, Dave; that's quite enough. Although you're my very good friend and a most competant administrator, you make for a lousy radical. Listen and learn, or get verily burned.

I will (mercifully) dismiss your "Disillusioned" dialogue of "The Juniatian", Jan. 17. The fine line between satire and slander can only be successfully drawn by an adept literary talent. Obviously, you. . . But I emphatically object to your "questioning" of Jan. 24. You sight what appear to be problems with Juniata education, and with NO justification lay blame on the curriculum; you even say, ". . .for some reason." And so, my defense:

You rightly point out that many faculty and students are very disappointed and bored with the "empty motions" of some of their classes. But it does not follow that a liberal curriculum which offers considerable room for student creativity and invention, and is receptive to student complaint and constructive criticism, could be the cause of such sterile phenomena. No, the fault lies in directly the opposite direction because our goal of student liberty necessitates student responsibility. The day of the solo song and dance professor is past; students are for the most part boring themselves by not contributing their due and are responsible for their own suffering by not appealing to the prof, Deans, or Provost their dissatisfactions with course. You see, Dave, you can the structure or direction of a lead a horse to water but you can't make it drink. (I've noticed your fondness for cliches.) Even if it were possible to force studentts to "drink" their responsibility, force would be a negation of their liberty. And heaven forbid, too, the thought of putting more emphasis on grades to motivate studentts with anxiety. No, the curriculum can only be merited here, not blamed.

And you say that students are proud that they can bullshit their way through Modes; this is great!—just what the Modes staff wants to see! The problem here is merely semantical. You see, what high school grads call bullshit, i.e., most anything that can't be put in an equation or get you a big salary, is what profs and most upperclassmen know as valuable fertilizer for the balance of a J.C. education.

However. in stating that students have had to set aside "everything they had in Modes the first time they took a 'real' course." you are pointing to a true shortcoming in the curriculum but I hesitate to call it a fault—yet. Allow me to rival your President Johnson analogy with one of my own. Imagine Juniata College to be a large rowboat journeying down a river (the Juniata River, of course). The Captain and his Mates realize that in order to successfully complete the mission it is necessary to drastically reorganize all the passengers and cargo, in midstream. To do all this shifting of weight simultaneously is to run a great risk of loosing control of the actvity, unbalancing the boat, and capsizing; only contained changes can be surely efficient. Remember our freshman year, Dave? We were working on tri-mester while all the upperclassmen were still on semester. Since then each year has steadily added further accomplishments toward our goals. But this naturally leaves some things left undone, so, we're going to run into "real" courses and profs, that is, "really" outdated courses and profs. The curriculum today isn't a "bastardized version" of the Task Force plans—it's an incomplete version—a necessarily incomplete version for the time being. You can only blame the administration for not being reckless.

I wholeheartedly agree that Juniata has set for itself "unquestionably tremendous goals". But even though "the road to hell is paved with good intentions", Rome was not built in a day. . .and irresponsible individuals don't by any means further the cause.

—Jean Pollock

WJC - Keith

Dear Editor:

I wish to protest a seemingly insane and biased form of censorship against a WJC disk jockey last Thursday, January 24.

The censorship occured after the D.J. played the hit record, "The Americans", on the air. Immediately following the completion of the song, he (the D.J.) was informed by Program Director Tony Martuzas that he (Martuzas) "did not like the song" and "didn't want it played on the air again". This is, in effect, the banning of a song that contains no vulgarity, no insidious phrases, no racial conotations; nothing but some patriotism and a little flag-waving. Could it be that Mr. Martuzas is afraid of patriotism, afraid to see the flag waved?

In any case, I fail to see where Mr. Martuzas has the juristiction or the grounds to ban a song from the air merely because he "doesn't like it".

Keith E. Hartman
Sincerely yours,

Food Service

Dear Editor,

A few months ago, some of my friends and I were discussing what seems to be a major topic at this school—the Food Service. We were trying to discover a better way to run the service when a recent graduate of Juniata posed this idea—why not get rid of the Hallmark Food Service altogether and hire a manager to run the cafeteria? The money not spent on a service could be used to buy the food the students would appreciate more and, in this way, they could have more of a say in what they eat. Besides, most, if not all, of the cafeteria workers live here in Huntingdon and have worked in the Juniata kitchen for quite a few years—through many food services. Therefore, if the food service leaves, this does not mean the help would leave with it. Since all it seems we are paying for is the right to have two men run the cafeteria and not even get good food for the price, why not just hire a person from around here to run the cafeteria and get the food we want? It seems logical to me, how about you?

Insane "Black Comedy" of Korean War Spoofed By MASH, Shown Friday Night

by Stella

Black comedy, especially in films, is an odd, sort of surrealistic form. the director and/or writer takes a very serious premise and explores it from ~~such an~~ angle that we are forced to laugh at it. I am not always comfortable in the presence of black comedy—especially when the premise is a subject close to my own heart—but I am almost fascinated by it. For example, "Dr. Strangelove", a fine film directed by Stanley Kubrick, dealt with the idea of a future nuclear way—a very plausible, very frightening possibility. And it was both of these things in the movie which seemed, in the long run, rather useless to worry about. The people on the screen were amoral, rather wicked, pompous and not at all worth saving. If that's what our future leaders will be like—infact, might be like now—let them get blown up, even if it does take everyone else. Of course, that feeling doesn't stay long after the movie is over—you start thinking that it would be better to just get rid of the leaders and save everyone else. But, through witty, satiric dialogue and striking visuals, Kubrick gets his point across.

"Dr. Strangelove" isn't, however, hysterically funny. Most black comedy isn't. But there is one wild, beautiful, incredibly perfect exception— and that exception is Robert Altman's fantastic MASH. Few movies that I have seen have taken on so many subjects at once —and succeeded! MASH attacks war, Army red-tape. sex—and, even that All-American past-time, football!

The attack is led by two of America's most versatile, talented actors. Elliot Gould and Donald Sutherland as Trapper John McIntyre and Hawkeye Pierce, respectively, are witty and totally outrageous. They have to be seen to be believed! And they are well-worth seeing! They are joined in their escapades by a supporting cast of fantastic personalities such as Tom Skerrit, Rene Auberjonois, Sally Kellerman, Roger Bowen and Fred Williamson.

We can hardly blame the doctors and nurses for their frivolity. When they work, they do the best job they can—which is excellent—but, when they're done, they can't let themselves dwell on what they've seen. They just have to invent mad-cap pranks and craziness to save their sanity.

There are serious parts in MASH during which the doctors fight to save lives but they are quickly succeeded by scenes of after-hours entertainment. The film moves quickly—snatches of dialoge are heard overlapping from one scene to another, quick cuts from Surgery to football games, bits of Japanese-oriented, American popular songs of the 1950's, and all kinds of clever filmic techniques make this a movie that never stands still. I love it!

This delightful, thought-provoking, absolutely insane film will be shown in Oller Hall this Friday, February 1, 1974. Admission will be $.75.

from a frog's belly, and how prostaglandins affected the transport of various substances through the tissue. They also carried out studies involving the effects of aspirin, time, and temperature upon the rate of transport. The work is being continued this term with Barry Spector, John Smolcic, and Perry Habecker as student assistants under Dr. Senft's guidance.

Information from these studies could shed some light on how reactions to drugs affect metabolic rates through the use of hormones and why prostaglandins affect the walls of the uterus in such a way that they may be used as an effective method of contraception.

Results of these studies will be written up in a paper which probably will be presented at a scientific convention next fall, say Dr. Senft.

— striking fuschias to brilliant pinks or oranges. Whatever color, there is always a change when they are touched. "A doctor can paint the liquid crystals on a patient or drop him in a vat," Schettler explained, and when a patient is doused in this, cancer can then be detected. If a color change appears on the liquid crystal it means there is a "hot spot" on the body, an area of high metabolic rate — cancer.

The method has been tried, but as Schettler said, "I'm not sure with what success". The crystals would not be effective "if the cancer were very deep".

Another aspiration aimed for these liquid crystals is to make television tubes out of them because "you can produce color changes in an electric field," Schettler said. They certainly are versatile, I thought to myself, used from cancer detection to Star Trek. But, there is a problem. The voltage needed to produce the color would wear the crystal out. "Research has not at this point discovered a liquid crystal to last", he added.

Schettler explained further about another use for the liquid crystals. "Material in a biological cell is more closely described as liquid crystalline rather than liquid." The membrane covering a cell is more like liquid crystal because the water inside a cell is organized by protein and other molecules, resembling the liquid crystalline environment. And studying the liquid crystals provides a kind of "model system" for the basic biological cell.

In the test tube the liquid crystal looks viscid, almost like clear molasses — hardly powerful enough to detect disease or even be put in a television.

Schettler's primary interest is in the electrical properties of the liquid crystal, The question of what is inherent in its molecular structure arrangement that causes the crystal to change colors.

"Nobody has looked at the electrical conductivity quite the way we have. We're still in the preliminary stages, though," Schettler said. He is actually at about the ¾ mark in his research and will publish his findings eventually in a journal.

There is also a liquid crystal Institute at Kent State, and various other work is being done across the country — even in the laboratories on the hills of Pennsylvania.

Award-Winning Poet Ed Orchester Recites His Works in Shoemaker

The Center Board Fine Arts Committee and the Kvasir will present a poetry reading by Ed sent a poetry reading by Ed... Ochester, from the University of Pittsburgh.

Mr. Ochester is the 1973 recipient of the Devins Award for his book, Dancing on the Edge of Knives. The collection was published in December by the University of Missouri Press. His poems can be found in The New Republic, Hearse, Poetry Now, and a new anthology from Vanguard, Moonstruck, Poetry Northwest, Chicago Review and many other magazines.

His most recent readings have been at Bucknell, the University of Kansas, Carnegie-Mellon and as part of the American Poets Series in Kansas City, Missouri.

Mr. Ochester received his formal education from Cornell, Harvard, and Wisconsin. In addition to his teaching and writing workshop duties at Pitt, Ochester is active in the Pennsylvania Council on the Arts, Poets-in-the-schools programs and conducts a poetry workshop at Western Penitentiary.

This reading will be held Tuesday, February 5, in Shoemaker Gallaries at 8:15 P.M.

Among His Effects We Found A Photograph

My mother is beautiful as a flapper,
She is so in love
That she has been gazing
Secretly at my father
For Forty Years.
He's in uniform,
With puttees and swagger stick,
A tiny cork moustache
Bobbing above a shoreline of teeth.
They are "poor but happy."
In his hand is a lost book
He had memorized,
With a thousand clear answers
To everything.

The Gift

One day
As I was lying on the lawn
Dreaming of the beautiful,
And my wife was justifiably bitching out the window
At my shiftlessness and
The baby was screaming
Because I wouldn't let him
Eat my cigarettes,
A tiger cat leapt over the fence,
Smiled at my wife,
Let the baby pull his tail,
Hummed a furry dynamo
As I stroked him.

My wife took the car to get him some food;
My son began to sing his wordless song;
And I wrote a poem in the sand.

Now God give every man who's hopeless
A beautiful wife,
An infant son who sings,
And the gift of a sweet-faced cat.

Grapplers Play Gettysburg, Have 1-4 Record for Season

by Keith Hartman

In a wrestling match held last Saturday, Juniata College's Indians lost to the Bullets of Gettysburg College to the tune of 42-0. The match featured four falls, all by the opponents.

J.C. just couldn't seem to get it together as Coach Bill Berrier's club lost their second match in a row, and fourth of the season. Time after time the Indians would come out smokin' in the first period, only to fade in the second and third periods.

The Indians hit the road for their next match, meeting Messiah on February 1. The Altoona campus of Penn State will provide the opposition for the next home match, which is scheduled for February 6. Hopefully, Juniata will improve upon their seasonal record. which now stands at 1-4.

The scores:

118 Mark Line (G) pinned
126 Paul Hetrick (G) beat
Mark Brown 6-1. (9-0)
134 Steve Fry (G) pinned
Randy Good with 1:50 left in the 2nd pd. (15-0)
142 Tim Smith (G) pinned
150 Brian Meckley (G) beat
Bob Crook 10-3. (24-0)
158 Tim Gesner (G) beat
Steve Shultis 6-1. (27-0)
167 Jeff Moretzsohn (G) beat
Jim Ruoss 11-4. (30-0)
177 John Keller (G) beat
Dave Landis 2-1. (33-0)
190 Bill Nes (G) pinned
UNL Mark Bergdal beat
Scott Simmons 3-1. (42-0)

JC Honored On All-State, MAC Teams

Congratulations are in order for a great number of Juniata football players. Juniata walked away with the honors handed out in the MAC northern division as an unbelievable 9 players were named to the 1st team and 4 named honorable mention. Lou Eckerl was the most honored player as he was the MVP in the section along with a berth on the 1st team. Joining Lou on the 1st team were, Gary Shope QB, Mike McNeal HB, Rick Rudolf SE. Don Meyers C, and Sean Ryan G. From the defense Don Leuber DE. and linebackers Dan Ereditario were named. Honorable Mention went to Alex Zubritsky G, Steve Lehman CB, Jim Rescigno MG, and Jim Messner CB. The number of players receiving MAC honors stand to pay a find tribute to a great team.

Juniata was also represented on the All State team. Again Lou Eckerl lead the way as he was named to the second team. Sean Ryan and Rick Rudolf were named to the third team. All State may not sound like much in comparision to All American but if we consider the competetion, Penn State, Pitt and the likes, it stands well for the small liberal arts college in Huntingdon. Once again Congratulations.

Girls BB Team Dumps Altoona

The women's basketball team has accumulated a 2-1 record thus far in the season. Last Tuesday the team traveled to Gettysburg and was defeated 44-32. The high scorer for the game was a sophomore starter Kim Norris, and Mardi Frye again led the team in rebounding with 8. Gettysburg was a taller team, but for the first half of the game the J.C. Girls out-hustled G-burg. At one point we trailed by 9 points. This lead was cut to 3 points for a half-time score of 18-21 for Gettysburg. The third quarter has been the nemesis of our team so far this season. The girls could only score 5 points in this quarter against Gettysburg, while the G-burg girls kept hitting the basket. The lead accumulated by the fourth quarter was too much for our team to overcome.

Saturday before the men's game with Wilkes, the girls faced Altoona Campus of Penn State here and came back with a powerful win to defeat Altoona 40-23. Mardi Frye led the team scoring (10 points) and rebounding (18), and several other J.C. players scored well. Juniata relies primarily on a man-to-man defense, although at times we fall in a zone. Gettysburg is the only team we have faced thus far that has used a press at all, and this was only for a few minutes near the end of the first half. J.C. is using an offense designed especially to cause problems for a zone defense. The girls played a good game defensively against Altoona. There were many steals for J.C., and a few fast breaks and Sue Rosshirt's last second shot at the end of the first half opened a lead of 5 for J.C. at the half (score 18-13).

The girls came out a little stronger after the half against Altoona than in the last few games. After several minutes of play the J.C. girls had opened a substantial lead and coach Pat Frazier erupted the bench. The starting five for the game were Mardi Frye, Sue Rosshirt, Kim Norris, Leslie Whittaker, and Vernne Wetzel. The other J.C. players who played were Jacque Prestiss, Cathy Dickey. Lela Eways, Ellen Valentine, Lynne Nenstiel, Barb Kosik, and Jane Robinson.

Next Saturday J.C. host St. Francis at 2:00. The girls are going for a 3-1, so come over and give the team your support. Also, Tuesday we host Dickinson at 6:30.

There is a correction to be made from last week's article. The PIAA rules are not identical to men's rules. The high schools play PIAA, and these rules are very similar to men's college rules, but not identical. The DGWS rules that the girls have been playing under were correct as printed.

Shorty dribbles away as the girls stomp Altoona Penn State 40-23, in a big win.

Indians Have Rough Week; Still Playing for MAC Title

by Gary Gillen

It wasn't a good week for the Indians no matter how you look at it. It started out bad when Junior Mike (Evil) Kenealy couldn't take it anymore and quit the team. Mike had been averaging a little over 14 points a game. To add to the Indians troubles they then had to travel to Grove City where they dropped the decision 82-72. Turnovers played a big part in the game as Juniata had a total of 16. Donny Williams continued his high scoring getting 24, Tim Tabor who was started to go to the hoop more and more added 16 and Oscar Hachett chipped in 14 but again it wasn't enough.

The Indians then returned home for 2 important MAC games that could have put them in 2nd place. It was not to be, however; as JC lost both games. On Friday the Indians came out smokin' playing very good ball in the 1st half and went into the locker room with a slim 36-34 lead. When the returned to the floor it looked like another team as they quickly fell behind and never were able to catch up. Donny Williams again led the scoring with 14. Tim Tabor and Mark Jula added 12 and Bill Bickel had 10. Now the Indians were 2-3 in Mac's and ready for Wilkes.

Well again the Indians played well in the 1st half and trailed by only 2 going into the 2nd half. Then Wilkes exploded, JC went cold and Wilkes won an impressive 81-57 victory. Donny Williams was the only Indian to crack double figures with 21 points.

This week Juniata plays host to Lycoming a loss for JC already this season. Saturday night they travel to Albright for another important MAC game.

"Come Into the Green Garden" Of Natural Madison Avenue in Andy's Production

by Gloria Barone

Buying a casket? Make sure it's made of natural wood, then, boasts Clarksburg Casket Company in their advertisement, "...exclusive designs executed in the finest hardwoods grown ... finishes of incomparable depth and clarity ... a blending of nature's beauty and man's patient skill."

In fact, whatever is bought today, Madison Avenue tells the public it must be natural. And that is what "Adman and Eve", Campus Minister Andy Murray's play by his "Myth, Symbols, and Ritual in Secular Society" class, is all about.

"The specific issue in the play is woman and how she derives her identity from Madison Avenue—how we all do," said Murray. Remember the advertisements that proclaimed, "Use this and we will make you beautiful?" With the rise of the counter-culture in the 1960's, people rebelled against such advertising, the philosophy turning to, "Natural things are what is beautiful."

Murray continued, "Well, in changing with the times, Madison Avenue shifted its claims to 'We'll make you natural.'" Thus emerged such "natural" products as "Herbal Essence Shampoo", promising "A garden of earthly delights" in every bottle—with flowers springing up around you while white doves circle your head as you shampoo.

The class, which put together dramatics, slides, film, and audio tape into a multi-media statement of modern advertising, interviewed college students about their concept of nature.

"Their ideas about nature are very sweet and sentimental—flowers, trees, long walks. But that is a media-created view of nature, one, only middle-class people can afford to hold to. Nature is also mosquitoes, and sunburn, droughts, floods, and volcanoes. Hurricane Hazel was every bit as "natural" as Herbal Essence," Murray said.

We are all victimized, then, by the media, as Eve is within the play. It begins with Adman looking for a natural face to sell products when he spies Eve. He feels she has "potential". The play progressed from there with his persistent attempted to create her into a type of natural image of Madison Avenue.

Adman and Eve explore the "natural" products in Wednesday's Multi Media Production.

Dr. Gooch Researches Genetics At Seashore

by Rob Lopresti

Since 1969 every summer has found Dr. Gooch of the Biology Department at the seashore. But while most of us are there for swimming and a tan Professor Gooch is applying a new technique in genetics.

In 1969 electrophoresis-genetics was first developed. Until this time the study of genetics was limited to a few types of organisms, such as fruit flies, whose genetic make-up was easily determinable. With the new bio-checical method, however, any creature could be studied.

Since the method was introduced Dr. Gooch has spent each summer by the sea — at the Woodshole and Duke Marine Stations. He has been using the technique to study marine organisms; mostly gastropods (alias snails), and barnacles.

Part of the time his work was under a grant from the National Science Foundation. Professor Gooch has taken four Juniata students with him, to assist him, and also to do independent project of their own, last summer Jerry Treon and Doug Baker went with him.

Some Juniata students who aren't working with Dr. Gooch are involved in electrophoresis genetics research in another fairly untouched area — cave biology. Steve Hetrick, a graduate of JC, is working for his masters degree in this field. Don Weston and Dave Cockley are resently studying the Ceuthophilis (a cave cricket), comparing the genes of crickets from one cave with those from caves a long distance away.

Dr. Gooch has written around a dozen papers on his investigations. He will return to the seashore this year if another grant comes through.

"Play It Again, Sam" Ends Term of Comedy Movies

by Brad Rudy

With Woody Allen, we come to the culmination of the series on the great comedians. ("My Little Chickadee" follows, but it is just a time filler.) He is, indeed, the culmination of all great film comedians. His character is a composite of all those who have come before with the possible exception of W. C. Fields (Although, in his newest film, "Sleeper," his visual and verbal assaults on policemen and the great American institutions of McDonald's, Volkswagens, Richard Nixon, and Howard Cosell would probably make Mr. Fields beam in admiration.)

The character Woody Allen plays is essentially an everyman portrayed as an overly neurotic nebbish. In "Sleeper." he is a Greenwich Village health food salesman who wakes up after being frozen due to an unsuccessful ulcer operation. ("I only believe in sex and death, two things than come once in a lifetime.") In one sketch of "Everything you always wanted to know . . . ." he plays a bespeckled sperm cell. ("What am I doing here?") In "Play it again, Sam," he is a Humphrey Bogart freak whose wife left him because he bored her and who lives on a thousand different kinds of tranquilizers.

This neurotic aspect of Allen's character is essentially his own invention, but he also portrays the pathos of Chaplin, the stoicism of Keaton, and the utter insanity of the Marxes. As a comedian, he strives for both the sight gag (in "Play it again", a coat attacks him as if it were a boa constrictor) and the gag line (In "Sleeper," he says of Norman Mailer that he "donated his ego to the Harvard Medical School" and of Charles DeGaulle that he "ran a little French restaurant in the Bronx."). Some critics have said that he hasn't quite achieved a continuity of sight and sound. This may be true, but in all his pictures, I never stopped laughing long enough to really notice.

"Play it again, Sam," which will be shown this weekend, may not be as funny as "Bananas" or "Sleeper," but it does show the comic genius of Allen. Newsweek critic Paul D. Zimmerman has said, "Woody Allen is the son and heir to the great tradition of American film comedy."

Action at Juniata that will make you say Weo!

by Suz Leffard

Like to play your guitar when you get together with friends? Any instrument and any student can get involved with a campus jam. Yes, Juniata is going to get together to jam—you can come to listen or play.

The weekend of April 19 to 21 is being planned as a jam weekend. Friday night will be the student jam. But there's more! During the afternoons there will be student-taught courses where you can learn the basics of candlemaking, macram'e and others. These courses are student-taught, so if you know a craft you'd like to share, contact Alice Boomhower, she's the organizer for this event.

There's more still — Saturday night there is planned a mini-concert. And Sunday night there's what everyone has been waiting for—a square dance! If you've never been to one—go! This is not the guys-stand- around- and- watch- the-band- type dance—everyone dances and has a grand time. Yes, even a live band, too.

All this is to replace the Newport Folk Festival which is becoming more expensive, as Juniata is trimming its budget. Juniata has a lot of hidden talents so the weekend ought to be really good.

GRE'S - What Are They All About?

This material was first published in THE DARTMOUTH.

by Richard Yurko

Last year approximately 200 students at the College, mostly seniors, took the Graduate Record Examinations (GRE) as part of the process of applying to graduate schools in this country.

These students, or testing "candidates" as ETS calls them, could have taken either the Aptitude Test measuring general verbal and quantitative skills, or one of the 19 different Advances Tests measuring the knowledge a student has of a certain discipline, or both.

Probably few, if any, of these students knew who determined policy for these tests and how the exams were developed.

The GRE, first developed and administered 35 years ago by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, are now administered by Educational Testing Service (ETS) under the direction of the Graduate Record Examinations Board.

Between 1948 and 1966, ETS administered the examinations on its own although it had the advice of a committee from the Association of Graduate Schools. During that time the program included only the two types of tests.

In 1966, however, the sixteen member GRE Board was created, independent of ETS, to supervise the testing policies and expand the program's services. The members of the GRE Board serve rotating four year terms, with one new member being appointed by the Association of Graduate Schools, one by the Council of Graduate Schools, and two more being named by the board itself.

One of the first actions of the new board was the expansion of the GRE program to include a program of research and later to add a number of new services. Richard L. Burns, a past ETS program director of the GRE, stressed that now "the test and the GRE program are two different things. The program is much broader than the test."

In addition to the original set of examinations and the present one million dollar per year research program, the services provided by the GRE now include the Graduate School Foreign Language Tests (GSFLT), the Minority Graduate Student Locater Service, and the publication of the Graduate Programs and Admissions Manual.

Discussing the Minority Student Locator Service, Burns stated that while any student could use the service, "It is intended for minority students; most graduate schools do not ask for data on non-minority-students."

According to Burns, the present research program not only investigates how to improve the tests, but also studies the entire process of admission to graduate school.

Linking the GRE program with graduate education as a whole, Burns cited the work of the Panel on Alternatives to Graduate Education which the GRE Board created eighteen months ago. The report of the panel, which studied such topics as external degrees and off-campus study, is due later this fall.

The GRE Board also sets the testing fees and manages the other financal affairs of the GRE program. Burns admitted that the GRE Program, which is funded almost entirely by test fees, "is now operating at a deficit although we are making efforts to turn that around."

He explained, "In past years we experienced phenomenal growth; now our volumes are leveling off while our costs are not leveling off. Unfortunately, fixed costs do not rely on the number of students taking the tests."

In the last three years, the number of students taking the GRE Aptitude Test has averaged approximately 280,000 while about half that number have taken an Advanced Test. This year the fee for both the Aptitude and Advanced Tests were raised from $9.50 to $10.00 each.

The Tests

Both the aptitude and Advanced Tests are developed over a period of a year or longer. In the case of the Aptitude Test, the examination is developed almost wholly by the staff at ETS. The questions are written and refined in the Test Development section of ETS and then "pretested" in an actual administration of the GRE.

During the pretest these potential items, although mixed in with the regular items, are not used in determining a student's score. Instead, certain statistics which measure the potential item's difficulty are compiled from the pre-test.

According to Robert A. Altman, the present program director of the GRE, approximately 40 percent of the items pre-tested are never used on a mass basis.

Once the difficulty measures are obtained on the pre-tested items,

I never thought of myself as an ogre. I wonder why Keith Hartman didn't bother to investigate a rumor concerning a "seeming insane and biased form of censorship" of the record, "The American". All he had to do was to see me to substantiate the rumor, instead of directing an attack against me via a letter to the editor. "The American", was not censored. There is not one sign in the radio station proclaiming its censorship.

Concerning the "did not like the song" statement, he is absolutely correct. If the song's main purpose is telling the Americans to keep their heads up and ride out their current storm, I think the song is highly commendable. I only wish the writer left out the Isolationism overtones (something to the effect, "who could blame them if they said to hell with the rest of the world."). I personally hate to see the wealthiest nation in the world turn its back to the rest of the world. I feel we have a moral obligation to assist all nations requiring help: as well as dealing with our currently neglected, internal problems. That's why I asked the dj to "hold off" the playing of the record, not "I don't want it played on the air again". I wanted to do an Editoral on the Isolationism theme, but I never got around to it.

Once again, it was not censored. How can I censor a record if the dj knows from reading his Student Handbook that "the programming content is determined by the dj on duty." Maybe the dj didn't read the handbook. It seems the common practice of this campus is, when you don't know all the facts, start a rumor.

Nevertheless, I am very disappointed at the dj who spread the rumor, not Keith Hartman. At Staff Meetings, I've always stressed cooperation and seeing me if a staff member disagrees with a policy I state or if I say something disagreeable.

I caused and please, if you have any further questions or comments concerning the radio station; see me. I reside in 310 North-East and my box number's 1097.

Program Director, WJC
Tony Martuzas

P.S. There's no truth to the rumor that WJC's not on the air because I feel "we're not ready".

Sorry for the misunderstanding

Reaching Out

To Whom It May Concern:

The following is a form letter which I, as a man and a prisoner, felt compelled to construct in the hopes of reaching the sensitivity and the intellect of at least one of its readers.

Being common members of one society we must succumb to certain social guidelines; to wit: we must fullfill our roles.

Some of us, more fortunate than some others, have been blessed by various degrees of personal ability by which means we can exercise certain amounts of control, and hence certain freedoms of choice, with regard to the specific roles that are available to us.

The crucial point would seem to be not so much the attainment of a given position— but rather; the actions of the person which follow once said position, and the degree of power and influence that goes with it, have been reached.

Quite sadly I am forced to admit that it has been my personal experience that the power inherent to a particular position is most usually one of furthering one's own luxuries, instead of exerting the influence of one's particular position in support of another person or cause.

As this letter is aimed basically at the minds of various educators I will phrase myself more specifically.

It is my contention, that as a body of people, educators have chosen for themselves a role that dictates that the person fulfilling a position of this type has willingly obligated himself to ideals of enlightenment, of truth, of integrity, and hence of both personal concern and strength with reference to those he serves as educator for. That is to say; he has chosen for himself, or herself, a responsibility

by David Andrews

In last week's edition, Meg Kathman proposed that the school "get rid of the Hallmark Food Service althogther and hire a manager to run the cafeteria." This "new" idea of Ms. Kathman's is really a quite "old" idea. In fact, Juniata now operates with a management service because of the past failures of food services which hired local managers.

A quick check with the present administration shows that the college did not have a management service until 1970. The college controller, Floyd Roller, relates that when the food service of 1969 was dropped, college officials found cases of wasted food and even cockroaches among the food of that particular food service. Mr. Roller also revealed that the two management services employed since 1970 have resulted in a $100,000 savings per year since the college-operated foodservice was dropped in 1969. Consequently, this money is being used to supplement other student needs such as financial aid and library services.

Furthermore, with the previous food services before the management services there were no "seconds" at meals, salad bars, "special" nights, or even a selection of beverages.

Hallmark Management Service gives qualified managers who plan meals on the advice of a dietician. A management service like Hallmark also has the advantage of buying from national firms like Kellogg and Pillsbury. This type of buying gives us quality products for a lower price than a locally-operated service could provide. The trained managers of a management service enable the college to eschew wasteful spending.

Hiring a management service has also resulted in an increase in student manpower in the dining hall. According to Juniata's current manager, Ed Straub, students presently comprise fifty per cent of the total labor hours of the food service and eighty per cent of the total work force. Students also get added savings from the food service since Hallmark bases its costs on a "missed-meal factor." The service predicts that a certain percentage of students will attend each meal, and it bases its buying on these estimates. Consequently, any student who goes to all of the meals is getting a significant number of his meals free of charge.

The Hallmark Management Service has proved to be thrifty and it has improved the quality of the food over past food services. However, students should bring any criticisms of the service to the Student Government or the Food Service Committee meetings which are held bi-weekly on Tuesday evenings. By putting a concerted effort into improving the current management service, students will be able to maintain a satisfactory food service. Experiences in the past have indicated that discarding a management service in favor of a locally-operated service would be a certain blunder.

As a final testament of their immense talent, Family has released "It's Only A Movie." Strangely enough, this album indicates Family's intentions of pursuing new musical directions— a great departure from the frenzied rock of "Fearless" and "Bandstand", the group's last two albums.

I've often wondered why this band never became popular, even well known, in the U.S. It's a real mystery— maybe they're too British. Anyway, their 1968 debut album, "Music In a Doll's House," was more or less a masterpiece. It managed to combine the intricacy of Traffic (the album was produced by Dave Mason) and the infectiveness of the late Kinks and surface with some very pretty music. Subsequent albums were equally fine.

The departure of Rick Grech most probably helped initiate Family's recent loud, chaotic style, best typified on the album "Fearless." The new release is a weird mixture of old and new Family— I think. True to the title, the music reminds one of a soundtrack to an old Hollywood Western one may have seen in a Nickelodeon in the 1920's. The title song and opening track confirms this. It alternates between a piercing guitar riff and a neo-barroom piano rag where the vocalist lapses into spoken sections a la "meanwhile back at the ranch" type interludes.

"Boots 'N' Roots" sounds like something left over from Bourbon Street or South Chicago during the clatter of horns and quickly settles into a now familiar piano blues progression. "Banger" the record's only instrumental, continues in the same vein. It's basically the same horn riff repeated endlessly (so it would seem). This, in fact, points out the problem with this, album: the horns are used in excess. John Witney's excellent guitar work becomes submerged under the racket of the horn and string arrangements. Such is the case with "Suspicion", which could have been a fine basic rock and roll song had the horn arrangement been eliminated.

The real exception to all this, and consequently the only time Family really gets down on it, is the "Check Out". Both guitar and organ are used to maximum effect, and the song seems to seem up to Family's diverse musical styles acquired through the years. "Buffet Tea for Two" is likewise a fine song. A nice piano break culminates in a horn explosion which is followed by a beautiful guitar run— the only real time Nitney is given a chance to explore on this album.

Well, I really don't know what to say about "It's Only A Movie". Taken in the context of Family's career, the album is a convienient way to close. Being a self-conscious group (and who isn't these days), Family may have viewed their past excellence as "only a movie", much like the Who introspection into their own mad culture of 1965 of "Quadrophenia." Taken as a singular piece of art though. "...Movie" doesn't have much merit, even though it's okay. However, given time, this "new" Family may have developed into something formidable.

the staff at ETS uses this pool of potential items in composing a new form of the test. The items which they include in the new form of the test must conform to complex content and difficulty specifications.

Each Advanced Test is compiled by a committee of scholars from the discipline which is covered by the exam. Some of the questions are written by the committee members, others by professional item writers, and still others by the staff at ETS.

Committee members receive copies of all potential items for a new Advanced Test prior to attending a three day conference. Some of the items have been pretested while others are not.

During their three day conference, the committee members refine and choose items for a new form of their test within guidelines for difficulty set by ETS staff members. In general, one conference produces one new form of an Advanced Test.

Two new forms of the Aptitude Test are written every year while one new form of each Advanced Test is written every one or two years. Old forms of the tests are retired but remain on file for possible use later on.

Once a new form of either test has been administered, a statistical analysis known as "equating" is done on it in order to convert a student's raw score into the GRE scale. Theoretically, this conversion assures that a score of, for example, 600 on an Advanced Test taken in 1969 demonstrates the same amount of knowledge as that same score in 1973.

The next article in this series, to appear on Thursday, will discuss several controversial topics in testing such as coaching, cultural bias in the tests, and confidentialtiy of test scores.

Editor's Note: The following is the second article in a series of four on Educational Testing Service.

Pictures talk. Some little boys don't.

Some inner-city ghettos have special schools. For little boys who don't talk.

Not mute little boys. But children so withdrawn, so afraid of failure, they cannot make the slightest attempt to do anything at which they might fail.

Some don't talk. Some don't listen. Most don't behave. And all of them don't learn.

One day someone asked us to help.

Through Kodak, cameras and film were distributed to teachers. The teachers gave the cameras to the kids and told them to take pictures.

And then the miracle. Little boys who had never said anything, looked at the pictures and began to talk. They said "This is my house." "This is my dog." "This is where I like to hide." They began to explain, to describe, to communicate. And once the channels of communication had been opened, they began to learn.

We're helping the children of the inner-city. And we're also helping the adults. We're involved in inner-city job programs. To train unskilled people in useful jobs.

What does Kodak stand to gain from this? Well, we're showing how our products can help a teacher—and maybe creating a whole new market. And we're also cultivating young customers who will someday buy their own cameras and film. But more than that, we're cultivating alert, educated citizens. Who will someday be responsible for our society.

After all, our business depends on our society. So we care what happens to it.

Women's Basketball Team Triumphant In Close Game

by Vernne Wetzel

The J.C. women's basketball team edged out St. Francis in the last minute of play Saturday to win 37-36. The game was controlled the first half by J.C. leading to a half-time score of 18-11. Neither team played aggressively for the first half. Our girls got into trouble in the third quarter when St. Francis came out and played more aggressively. They cut the lead to nothing, and then the lead was traded back and forth to the end of the game. The high scorer for the game was Vernne Wetzel; and Leila Eways and Vernne each had 5 rebounds to lead J.C.

This game was one of the slowest for our team. We came out slowly and only started to look alive at the very end of the first half. J.C. lacked the rebounding which has been a strong point for the team so far this season. High rebounder for the team, Mardi Frye, spent much of the game on the bench because of foul trouble, which hampered the whole squad. The St. Francis girls were tall, but the thing that helped them even more was the fact that they out-hustled J.C. St. Francis used a zone defense throughout the game. They were a well-coached team, and they are probably one of the cleanest teams we play.

If the game was exciting for the spectators, it was too close for comfort for the players. Sue Roshirt sank two clutch free throws in the last two minutes and a lay-up by Vernne Wetzel proved to be the winning points for J.C. St. Francis missed a half dozen foul shots in the last two minutes. Our team's shooting percentage is poor, at best, at this point, and combined with the sluggishness of play Saturday it nearly defeated us. Only the determination of the team to win pulled the game out.

Tuesday the team played Indiana, and Saurday they will host Dickinson before the men's game. The team does appreciate the support of the fans, so come over and cheer the team to a good game, and a good season.

to not only the maintenance, but also the up-grading, of his or her society and its members in general. From this it stands to reason that said persons, by actions obligatory to their respective roles, will unhesitatingly step forward when socially detrimental situations arise—and as well, shall willingly devote personal energies to the righting of any aversive conditions that threaten the basic ideals of our country and our peoples. This does not prescribe that one must become either a crusader, nor a martyr; but merely that one push aside, momentarily, those bits and pieces of the apathy that is already an all too prevalent mode of our joint existence.

But perhaps I myself have been premature in my judgments. Perhaps through our traditions we ourselves may rest secure that our own roles shall not be transgressed against. Or perhaps it is only my personal bias which is at fault, and that there really are no inequities and injustices that need tending to.

HEH Grading

The Faculty decided Monday, February 4 to permit a student option in Human Existence Historical grading. Students will now have a choice between receiving a grade (A, B, C, D, F) or receiving an S/U on their transcripts for their Human Existence Historical units. Both units must be recorded in the same manner. Either both as grades (A, B, C, D, F) or both as S/U. This decision is retroactive for all Human Existence Historical units completed in the new curriculum at Juniata.

Volleyball Teams Running Close For Second Place

by Jaime Belmont

What's happening on the intramural volleyball courts? Well, those legs are at it again.

In the most recent games in Co-Rec, played Feb. 3, "The Later Dates" defeated "It's A Joke", winning two straight games 16-14 and 15-11; and "Meachen's Mob" did a job on the "Spikes", 15-13 and 15-7.

The most recent standings in men's volleyball show "Dubois House" having a perfect season with five wins and no losses. "Amsterdam Boyt Goosing Co." and "Cripples" are tied for second place, holding on with four wins and one loss.

Women's Volleyball has picked up the same ranking pattern as men's volleyball. There is one outstanding team—"US". with seven wins and no losses, and there are two teams, "A Little Bit of Everything" and "Dirty Dete and the Drop Deads" who are after second place with scores of six wins and one loss for each team.

It looks like the battle for volleyball intramurals will begin with the fights between the second place teams.

Swinderman Resigns As Head Coach

by Gary Gillen

In somewhat an expected move, Coach Jack Swinderman resigned as Juniata's basketball coach this past week. Coach Swinderman announced that he would stay on for the remainder of the season; however.

Coach Swinderman hasn't faired to well since coming to Juniata at the start if the 1970-71 season. Since taking over here, his record has been 26-55 with his first season being his best when the Indians were 13-9 and just missed making the playoffs. His next team only managed to win 2 games against 19 losses and then last years team was 6-16.

Coach Swinderman also had served as cross country coach during his 4 years here at Juniata. Director of Athletics Walt Nadzak hopes to name a new coach in the near future so as to give Juniata a good shot in recruiting for the 74-75 season.

Due to the increase in the cost of paper, the Juniatian will be published on Thursday as it has been from the beginning of the year. This is a result of financial evaluation with the print shop. So, look for your Juniatian on Thursday. Also, we are printing only the papers we feel are needed to serve the student body. So, if you get a paper, share it with a friend.

Hearts Stop As Indians Edge Lycoming 95-90 in Overtime

by Gary Gillen

The Indians playing their best game of the season avenged an earlier season loss with a 95-90 overtime victory over Lycoming here last week. Juniata shot an amazing 71 per cent from the field in the second half. Juniata had been losing 46-40 going into the second half but the hot-shooting Indians could not be denied as they came from behind to gain the victory.

Bill Bickel led all scorers with 25 points mostly in the second half when Bill missed only 1 shot. Another added surprise was the spectacular play of guard Greg Ruffo. Greg who has seen little playing time the past 2 years earned himself a starting position with a good game hitting 10 of 12 from the field for 20 points. Donny Williams, Tim Tabor and Oscar Hachett also cracked double figures with 23, 16, and 10 respectively. The game was by far the best of the year for the Indians. The only sad part of the victory was that in bringing Juniatas record to 7-10 the game did not count in the MAC standings. Lycoming is still tied for the lead in the MAC Northern Division.

With the big win over Lycoming Juniata was not to fair as well against another MAC opponent, Albright. The Indians in a complete turnaround let a 2 point halftime lead slip away and become a 31 point loss. 84-53. Juniata played one of its sloppiest games of the year with 31 turnovers compared to 9 for Albright. Donny Williams continued his hot shooting sinking 23 points, helping him to stay in contention for the MAC scoring lead, Donny is now 2nd. Tim Tabor also cracked double figures with 12 points.

In Monday nights game Juniata faced a tough defensive squad in Susquehanna, who they had defeated earlier this season. This time around however they were not so lucky as Susquehanna proved to be too much. The Indians were able to score only 50 points and thus lowered their record to 7-12 with the 62-50 defeat. The Indians now stand 2-5 in the MAC sttandings.

The Indians return home this Thnrsday to face a very good Indiana. Indiana is lead by Randy Allen who is being touted as a pro prospect. Juniata should have its hands full. The Indians then take to the road where they have not been to successful this season with a 2-9 record. Saturday the Indians take on MAC opponent Wagner then on Wednesday travel to Elizabethtown for another MAC contest. The Indians must make a move soon with the MAC playoffs quickly approaching.

Energy Crisis Hits Food-Lookout for Smaller Meals

by Mike Houck

The energy crisis has affected just about everything and naturally our own Hallmark Food Service is no exception. However, because of preparation by the service, some trouble was avoided until at least the end of this term.

Ed Straub, manager of the food service, said a stockpiling of food was done just in case of shortages and proved to be a decent move. Presently the stockroom is filled but supplies are dwindling so trouble is expected third term. So far, crackers are the only food missing from meals but others such as tomato products, dairy products, and bread may be absent or at least limited. Dish soap has really been a problem, however the J. C. Blair Hospital came to the rescue with their excess supplies.

Some changes will be needed in the food service next term, says Ed, but he will try to do everything possible to keep them at a minimum. Milk rationing is a possibility, since dairy products are extremely high priced and still climbing. Meat constitutes almost 50% of the cost of food so it is possible that we will see a few meatless meals in the future. Another solution would be to have only two meals served per day with a brunch running from around 10:30 to 12:30 and dinner at the normal time. Not only is the amount of food output lessened but the wages paid to the workeers is also cutback. Nothing is really definite because it is too difficult to anticipate future prices and shortages, so we'll all just have to wait and see.

Ed Straub welcomes any comments from students but would really appreciate some constructive suggestions even more. If anyone is serious enough to get involved and to express opinions, go to the Food Service meetngs next term which are held every other Tuesday.

Choir Members Sing Their Way To Enjoyment

February 27 the J. C. Concert Choir directed by Dr. Bruce Hirsch will begin its annual tour, which will include ten concerts in six days. This year's tour will begin in Pennsylvania, and extend through Maryland, Virginia, New Jersey, and will conclude with a free day in New York City. I talked with several members of the Choir, who have toured previously, and found them to be very enthusiastic about the upcoming tour and Choir in general. Some of the comments were as follows:

"We take a lot of pride in the tour; it's something we really look forward to."

"It's really fantastic working under Dr. Hirsch."

"Choir tour is the best experience I've had in four years at J.C."

During the tour the Choir is housed by families in the communities in which they perform. This motivated the comment:

"It's really an experience. You have an opportunity to meet a lot of interesting people."

The ambitions of the Choir, I feel, are summarized in the following statement:

"The Choir is made up of a lot of individualistic people, but when we start singing, we're all working for a common goal."

Future For Film Fun In Courses

by Rob Lopresti

The purchase of a broken down camera was the beginning of Juniata's experiments in film production back in 1968. Since then nearly three hundred students have been in film related courses here.

Tonight Professor Clayton Briggs will speak on the past growth and hopeful future development of the film work. Professor Briggs, head of Juniata's Department of Speech and Theatre, has been involved in the programs since the beginning, when he allowed students to produce movies rather than term papers, in a course called Principals of Theatre Arts.

His talk will be in the Ellis Hall Faculty Lounge at 8:45 tonight. The second part of the program will be some actual student films presented by their creators.

The program is presented by the Juniata Dames organization and is open to the women of the Juniata community.

All Class Night Rules Given To All Before Performance

by Jack Schumaker

This year, All Class Night will be held in Oller Hall at 8:00 p.m. on March 23rd. The theme for All Class Night this year is Music. Each class will produce a twenty minute skit. The music for these skits may be pantomined, live, or even dead, as long as each skit does contain music. The judges, though, will be looking for more than music. Each skit will be examined for originality, theme, costume and set design, and length (Each skit may only be twenty-two minutes from bare stage to bare stage.) The judges panel will consist of alumni and faculty.

Special events committee, sponsor of All Class Night, hopes that the spirit of All Class Night will be caught by the different classes in that all will produce a skit with theatrical value. If you are interested in helping your class contact the following people:

"Piano Man" Inspires Listeners; Develos Rapport With Audience

by Steve Byfus

Billy Joel's performance last Thursday night was a joy for all who attended. Those of us familiar with his music found the concert exhilarating, even inspiring, and of course, entertaining yet the Columbia recording artist had something to offer even to listeners who viewed him as a new-comer. His professional ability to spontaneously create or ad-lib eased the audience through sound system troubles with his little rendition of "The Technical Difficulty Blues," but this was the best measure of his talent.

The strong, clear, sonorous voice coming from the little man behind the piano was at first deceiving: music is the true measure of his stature, not height. Classically trained, his skill at the piano is rivaled by only a handful in the field of rock music. Billy made the most of his chance to develop an actual sense of communication with the audience by offering personal tidbits of information that enhances the insight into the messages of certain songs. "Everybody Loves You Now" from the Piano Man album relates the vanity of a by-gone sweet-heart. He noted that he no longer aspires to the sentiment expressed in "Tomorrow is Today" from his first album, but advises that the listener appreciate the melody; the only device still giving credence to the song is art. Frankly admitting that the title song from his new LP was completely a commercial venture, designed to attract new listeners, he labeled the song as "bullshit."

He tried to make clear that the reasons for the late starting hour was not to fulfill any false sense of projecting a superstar image, but was merely due to transportation problems. The initial difficulties acted as a spark to the flame of Billy Joel's personality, which may not have been so easily conveyed had the conditions been picture perfect. O course, maybe it was the beer.

Regardless, a spirit of the evening was nearly tangible, definitely present, and perceived by audience and artists.

Ice Hockey Culb Forms For Interested Students

by Eric Kiesshauer

Ice Hockey has come to Juniata.

For those of you who watched the progress of last year's hockey club, your first reaction to this statement may be one of skepticism, but this year things are different. There are 22 players on this year's squad, including many new freshman with varied experience, and professor Mike Harrison, who serves as an advisor-player for the team. Also to the advantage of this years club is the coaching of Dr. Paul Heberling, who brings playing experience from his varsity days at Penn State and a year with the Johnstown Jets. To add further to the teams good fortune, they will be playing in the intramural schedule at Penn State as well as facing varies other foes from around the state, such as Hampton Hockey Club and Williamsport.

To date, there have been 4 practices at Penn State and some informal skating on local ponds. The formal practices at State College have been held between 10:30 - 12:30 on Saturday nights, which is indicative of the teams enthusiasm. The players are now looking forward to their first game which will be held this Thursday night, Feb. 14th, at 10:30 on the State College Ice rink and they extend an invitation to all possible fans that they may have on campus. Admission is free.

Annual Art Exhibit Shown In Shoemaker

An exhibit of works by the Standing Stone Art League will be on display at the Shoemaker Galleries, Juniata College, beginning Sunday, Feb. 17. The show will remain at the Galleries for two weeks.

The Standing Stone Art League, formed in 1959, began with a small group of local artists, members of a painting class sponsored by the First Methodist Church in Huntingdon. Since that time its interests have broadened to include other genres and artforms.

Membership now exceeds 70, including residents of Huntingdon, Altoona, Belleville, Roaring Spring, Saxton, Three Springs and York.

The league sponsors spring and fall painting classes conducted by professionals, a summer week of painting and this annual membership exhibit at the Shoemaker Galleries.

In addition, the league has established a continuous exhibit in the J. C. Blair Memorial Hospital and has shows throughout the year in the Huntingdon Public Library.

The Shoemaker Galleries, located in the Carnegie Building on the Juniata campus, are open each weekday from 9 a.m. until 5 p.m. and from 2 until 5 p.m. on Saturdays and Sundays.

Summer School Courses Listed By Admissions

Forty-two courses will be offered this year, half within a three-week term and half throughout a six-week term, when Juniata College opens its doors for its annual Summer Sessions.

The initial session will begin June 3 and extend through June 21, according to Dr. Donald T. Hartman, assistant professor of philosophy and director of the summer sessions. The second period begins June 24 and ends Aug. 2, the date of Summer Commencement.

Open registration for anyone interested in the first summer session, including area residents, persons pursuing continuing education, alumni, parents and qualified high school students, is June 3. Juniata undergraduates will register the week of April 29, and incoming freshmen may apply by May 28.

Open registration for the second summer session is June 24.

Inquiries may be directed to Hartman or Richard E. Kimmey, director of admissions.

In each term 21 courses are offered. Four of those within the first session are non-credit offerings. They include Household Physics: Electricity; Income Taxes; Officiating (for athletics) and Personal Finance.

Courses offered for credit first term will fall in three divisions. Humanities units (Division I) include Creative Writing, The Nature of Clay, Photography: Light as Image-Maker, and a Speech/

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatian. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

I have been highly dissatisfied at times with the newspaper and other communications media on this campus.

My dissatisfaction has stemmed from several reasons. I feel the newspaper should be published every week that the college is in session; that the radio station should be broadcasting both AM on the campus and FM on the cable; and that the student body deserves a decent yearbook.

But, as with all earthly machinations, there are basic reasons behind these that can be solved only by people in certain positions. The college itself is the principal problem in the case of the radio and the newspaper, as I see it, rather than the people who run them (who, no doubt, consider themselves slaves to a volunteer job).

The question here is one of priorities—the priorities of college funding. Another matter, of course, rears its repulsive head when we speak of our printed media, that of student apathy. But, as I must, I am kicking it in the cupboard for now.

So, I say, this college has some rather misplaced priorities. Do you, the student, realize the newspaper only has enough money for another few issues, certainly not enough to finish out the year. Yes, that's it, an insufficient allotment of funds hangs over the Juniatian like a black cloud of doom. This obviously has a connection with the proposal to unite the student publications into a single monthly magazine. (This, I feel, would be a lessening of services to the college community and oppose it as such; I would rather propose a magazine in conjunction with the regular newspaper.)

The reason for the lack of funding is a deficit incurred by this paper last year, and which demanded payment from this year's budget. The only other sources of income are subscriptions and advertisements. Since there are only barely over sixty subscriptions, and ads have not been growing on our lawns, the bank account is shriveling. Regardless of where the blame lies for last year's deficit, we must note that this is another year, with another year's requirements.

The radio station is also having problems. You students may have noticed it is not broadcasting in the dorms this year. The problem, wishfully denied by some, is again one of money. WJC cannot broadcast until the transmitters are repaired and adjusted. The transmitters cannot be so serviced unless a professional expert is imported or the station buys new equipment (capable people are available if the equipment is). Both of these options are extremely expensive, far beyond the present budget. To a person who can recognize a microphone from ten paces, the second option is the obviously more desirable one for the long-term situation. In fact, the station should probably have had such equipment already. I would urge that this matter be acted upon, if not for the financial situation.

So, where's the money?

More on that next week.

John Knouse

by Alice Boomhower

In this issue, John Knouse states that there is a serious lack of funds for campus media. I tend to agree with this statement, but some of John's facts are incorrect, and I would like to clear up the issue.

First of all, the newspaper will soon be in debt, but this debt was incurred a number of years ago when the newspaper at Juniata was revitalized. Each year, with our advertising, we try to lessen this debt, but it will take a number of years. Secondly, I agree with John when he states that there is a definite problem with the misallocation of funds. I seriously question the priorities of this school when a new fence is placed around the athletic field, and the newspaper has a debt from three or four years ago.

John also states that the radio station has had problems in repairing the old transmitters, and that the it does not have the money to purchase the equipment needed to test these transmitters. This year, with the backing of Student Government, the radio station has purchased all new transmitters, but the equipment they need to test the power output of the transmitters is too expensive. They are presently looking for equipment for testing.

John has been a loyal student in fighting for the campus media. I

Mrs. Goehring Speaks To Audiences In Oller Hall

We often criticize. Too seldom do we applaud. This is not a review of the Billy Joel concert last Thursday (February 7), which incidently, I thought was just fine, but rather a sincere appreciation for the conduct of the audience.

The doors of Oller Hall opened at 9:00 P.M. The crowd trickled in and swelled to near capacity proportions by 10:00. Murmurs of anticipation floated through the Hall, but the concert fell victim to the current gasoline shortage. A sound system rented from Pittsburgh bogged down along Route 22. No gas in the tank and no gas available at that hour seemingly for miles to the East and West.

Lenni Brooks and his hard working committee confronted the crisis and kept their cool. Having enlisted the aid of a fine young man, Terry Board from State College, who quickly assembled his own amplification system, entertained the crowd for nearly an hour and a half. He wasn't the major entertainment, but could well stand on his own meritts as an audience pleaser. And he did appear to please this audience.

The question was still provoking the back stage crew, however. Would the sound truck arrive? When would it arrive? Yet arrive it did with more equipment than Oller Hall has ever seen. It does take time to assemble that myriad of totally confusing paraphernalia (at least it is confusing to me). The audience was informed of the delay and were asked to be patient and "hold in there". They did. Oh, I guess a few gave up with Friday Morning classes leering ominously at these late night revelers, but the majority stayed and with amazingly good humor and politeness. None of the usual catcalls, stamping of feet or language I wouldn't use in front of my little old greyhaired mother.

It was 1:00 A.M. and here was an enthusiastic appreciative audience we could point to with pride and say, these are Juniata students. They showed overwhelming approval of Billy Joel, who in turn acknowledged the gracious crowd. Is it too much to hope that we could expect the same kind of respect from the audience toward their own classmates at All Class Night?

Third Term Film Series Offers Variety and Education For Juniata Students With Many Different Subjects

by Brad Rudy

Well, I guess it's time to let you know about the third term films! They follow no particular theme or genre as did the first two terms (due mainly to the red tape involved in having a committee do the choosing), but, with few exceptions, most of them are top quality and/or entertaining films.

March 5— "Ship of Fools" Vivien Leigh, Simone Signoret, Lee Marvin, directed by Stanley Kramer. Sort of a soap-operish "Airport" on the sea, boasting nothing except an excellent cast.

March 8—"The Candidate" Robert Redford, Peter Boyle, director by Michael Ritchie. Engrossing film of an idealistic senatorial candidate who gradually succumbs to the lure of power.

March 15—"What's up Doc?" Ryan O'Neal, Barbara Streisand, directed by Peter Bogdanovich. Hilarious imitation of the 1930's "screwball comedies." Not much plot, but who cares?

March 22—"Adam's Rib" Katherine Hepburn, Spencer Tracy, directed by George Cukor. Comedy of a married DA and defense attorney who are put on the same case. Excellent and funny film which provides the basis for the current poor TV show of the same name.

April 8—"A Man and a Woman" Anouk Aimee, Jean-Louis Trintignant, directed by Claude Lelouch. Excellent performances and camera work, but not much else in this recent French film. The performances are lost by the English dubbing, but the dreamy and hazy visuals should not be missed.

April 19—"Billy Jack" Tom Laughlin, Delores Taylor, directed by T. C. Frank. This is a movie with all the cliches of an indignant equality-for-all youth-oriented picture which Hollywood has been turning out recently. But it is different in that it was made by non-professionals and is so sincere that the cliches have to be believed. It follows a half-breed Indian and an idealistic teacher who try to save their "freedom school" from being closed by the arch-conservative town officials. Includes several funny improvisations by the "Committee."

May 3—"For Whom the Bell Tolls" Gary Cooper, Ingrid Bergman. Film adaptation of Hemingway's novel of the Spanish Civil War. Excellent performances by all.

May 10—"Smiles of a Summer Night" Gunnar Bjornstrand, Eva Dahlbeck, Harriet Anderson, directed by Ingmar Bergman. 1955 Cannes Festival Comedy Winner in which Bergman takes a wistful but cutting look at the idiospncrasies of love and marriage. In it, an aging actress attempts to win her former lover from his very young and very virginal wife. In Swedish with English subtitles. If funds permit, this last week will include one or more additional Bergman films, possibly "Cries and Whispers," "The Seventh Seal," or "Shame."

Once again, a subscription ticket to all the above films will cost a dollar, but this time, the individual admission price will vary with each film. Three popular and one not-so-popular films will constitute the extra films shown in Oller Hall. This last is included maily because of its price, but also to get students to come to films they may not have already seen or even heard of.

March 29—"Woodstock" Excellent documentary which attempted to show the country that youth can exist peacefully in greater concentrations than those in most crime-ridden cities. Features performances by many popular artists. Admission—75¢.

April 5—"Slaughterhouse-5" Michael Sacks, directed by George Roy Hill. Stunning film adaption of the novel by Kurt Vonnegut, Jr. In it, the author attempted to reconcile humanity and morality with his experiences in the fire bombing of Dresden during W. W. II. Phychological serio-comedy or good science-fiction, depending or your interpretation. Admission—$1.00.

April 26—"Little Big Man" Dustin Hoffman, directed by Arthur Penn. "Stringent and Powerful"—Judith Crist. "A mark of genius"—ABC TV. "Talk about reality—Wow!" CBS radio. "Dustin Hoffman is brilliant."—Newsday. You take it from there. Admission—$1.00.

May 17—"The Effect of Gamma Rays on Man-in-the-Moon Marigolds" Joanne Woodward, directed by Paul Newman. Adaptation of Paul Zindel's pulitzer Prize winning play. Sometimes funny, more often tragic, it shows the attempts of two teenage girls retreating into their own private worlds as a psychological defense against the "radiation" of their mother's demanding neuroses. Joanne Woodward was awarded the best actress award last summer at the Cannes Film Festival for her performance as the mother. Admission—50¢.

We hope you enjoy the series.

Behind - the - Scenes Politics Revealed in "The Candidate"

by Stella

"The Candidate"

There is no place in politics for the honest, "little" guy. The fellow who's trying to do a good job on a small scale just can't get ahead—unless he's willing to change, completely, his whole way of life.

"The Candidiate" is a film about just such a guy. Jim McKay is a young lawyer who is interested only in his little bit of the world. His main aim in life is to help the poor who need a lawyer but can't afford one. He is so uninterested in politics, in fact, that he is not even registered to vote. But he is taken in hand by a group of political manipulators who decide that he is young, handsome and idealistic enough to be a candidate for the California Senate. Not to win, understand, just to run. It's just a chance, they tell him, to get his views across to the rest of the state. He won't win they tell him — they don't even want him to win — they just want him because he'll be a change, a radical difference from the incumbent Senator who plans to run again. Finally, with a great deal of apprehension, McKay agrees.

So . . . he starts out as himself. He says what he thinks and when he doesn't know, he says he doesn't. And, when the first polls come out, he is trailing very badly. The experienced members of his campaign entourage immediately begin making plans to change his image in order to win him more votes. When McKay protests that he was never supposed to win, they tell him that he has to, at least, make a showing or he'll be made a fool of.

Slowly. grudgingly McKay begins changing. He speaks words that others have written for him, gives opinions which are not quite his own, assumes a confidence that he does not feel and emerges victorious — but the victory is hardly his.

Robert Redford gives a great performance based all-too-obviously on a Ted Kennedy-type character. Peter Boyle plays his campaign manager, Don Porter is his opponent and Melvyn Douglas is McKay's father, who is a retired politician.

With this excellent cast and a topical subject, "The Candidate" makes its mark as one of the better films about politics.

This great film will be shown in Alumni Hall, Friday, March 8, 1974 at 8:00 P.M. Admission will be $.50. Season's tickets will be $1.00 and this film is included in the series.

(By the way, this will be the second film of the series. The first will be "Ship of Fools" on March 5. 1974 in Alumni Hall at 8:00 P.M).

Huntingdon Inmate Writes of Life as He Sees It

Editor's note:

These poems were written by a man at the Huntingdon Prison who is currently taking the writing program. They were submitted to me by a student doing Soc. Fieldwork at the prison.

Don't Be Fooled By Me

Don't be fooled by me,
Don't be fooled by the face I wear.
For I wear a thousand masks, masks, that I'm afraid to take off, and none of them are me.
Pretending is an art that's second nature with me, but don't be fooled.
I give the impression that I'm secure.
That all is sunny and unruffled with me,
Within as well as without,
that confidence is my name and coolness my game;
and that I need no one.
But don't believe me. Please.
My surface may seem smooth, but my surface is my mask.
Beneath dwells the real me in confusion, in fear and aloneness.
But I hide this. I don't want anybody to know it.
I panic at the thought of my weakness and fear of being exposed.
That's why I frantically create a mask to hide behind, a nonchalant, sophisticated facade, to help pretend, to shield me from the glance that may know.
But such a glance is precisely my salvation. My only salvation and I know it.
That is if this is followed by acceptance, if this is followed by love.
It's the only thing that will assure me of what I can't assure me of,
What I can't assure myself that I am worth something.
But I don't tell you this, I don't dare. I'm afraid to,
I'm afraid your glance will not be followed by acceptance and love.
I'm afraid you'll think less of me, that you'll laugh at me, and you laugh would kill me.
I'm afraid that deep-down I'm nothing, that I'm no good and that you will see this and reject me.
So I play my game, my desperate game with a facade of assurance without, and a trembling child within
And so begins the parode of masks. And my life become a front.
Please listen carefully and try to hear what I'm not saying. What I'd like to be able to say, what for survival I need to say, but what I can't say.
I dislike hiding, Honestly.
I dislike the superficial game I'm playing, the phony game.
I'd really like to be genuine and spontaneous, and me, but you've got to help me. You've got to hold out your hand, even when that's the last thing I seem to want.

Prison Life

Prison is a place where all social ties are suspended and scrutinized, you compose fantastic letters and receive no answers;

Prison is a place where you experience the scorn teaching of society and that society doesn't need you;

Prison is a routine designed to dehumanize and strip the sacred principles of human integrity, human self-respect, human dignity and spirit;

Prison is a robolized hypnotic mechanical environment in which you're programed to respond to a number instead of a name, the cracking sound of the iron bar being released to unlock the doors;

Prison is a place where you dread to being lost under the complete anonymity of cannibalism; where no one really cares nor hopes; where prison officials' callous attitudes and mechanical answers to questions lead to the anxiety that no one will see, hear, care or understand, where thoughts of catastrophe becomes the conditional response to the monotonous platitude: "We're doing what's best for you;"

Prison is a place where prison officials invidious grouping and preferential treatment takes precedence over any real concern for the needs of prisoners;

Prison is a place where one seeks to convince his self that he will live a better and meaningful life once released
Sometimes you do, but then we all don't.

Grapplers Wipe Out U. of Scranton

by Keith Hartman

In what has to have been the best, or certainly one of the best, showings by a Juniata wrestling team in recent years, J.C. totally wiped out and wiped off the University of Scranton's team, 35-15. Actually, Scranton scored only nine points against Juniata as J.C. was forced to forfeit the 118-pound weight class.

The match, wrestled last Saturday, featured five falls; all but one by Juniata. Mark Brown pinned his opponent with 53 seconds to go in the second period, Dave Landis had the quickest pin of the day with 42 seconds left in the first, Steve Oak, pinned his man with just 20 seconds left in the bout, and Scott Simmons ended the match in perfect form with J.C.'s second first period pin of the day. The match also featured two superior decisions, both by Juniata. Gary Moellers literally rubbed his opponent's nose into the mat, beating him 11-1. Bruce Bowen, in a very well-wrestled bout, won by the score of 12-2.Myron Zimmerman also contributed to the cause, with a gutty 3-2 decision via riding time.

In a previous match, wrestled last Wednesday, J.C. lost to a very good Penn State-Altoona team by the score of 35-11. The brightest spot in the match for Juniata was Randy Good's pin with 2:17 left in the match. The only other winner for J.C. was Mark Brown, with a 4-0 decision. Jim Ruoss garnered the only other points for Juniata with a draw.

The last chance for Coach Bill Berrier's club to improve on their 2-6 record will be on the sixteenth of February, when they meet Lebanon Valley, Elizabethtown, and Lycoming at Lebanon Valley. Then, on February 22 and 23 the team travels to Delaware Valley for the M.A.C.'s. Good luck, team, with both.

126 Mark Brown (J) beat Steve Elliot 4-0 (3-6)

134 Randy Good (J) pinned Gil Barton with 2:17 left in the third (9-6)

142 Kirk Russel (PS) beat Roger Garber 11-6 (9-9)

190 Lou DeAngelo (PS) beat Steve Oak 4-2 (11-32)

UNL Larry Waite (PS) beat Keith Jones 2-0 (11-35)

Juniata vs. Scranton

126 Mark Brown (J) pinned Jay Christoff with 3:47 left in the second (6-6)

142 Gary Moellers (J) beat Bob Coyle 11-1 (10-9)

150 Myron Zimmerman (J) beat Mike Spirk 3-2 (13-9)

158 Mike Brown (S) pinned Bob Crook with 2:17 left in the second (13-15)

Indians Head Toward End of Season With 7-14 Mark

by Gary Gillenny

This week the Indians lost their chance for a winning season, registering 2 losses, the first to Indiana here on Thursday and then to Wagner in New York, Saturday night. The losses drop Juniata to a 7-14 mark with 4 remaining games. The Indians are also out of the running for the MAC playoffs.

In Thursday nights game Juniata played Indiana even for much of the game only to fall apart at the end to lose 76-63. The Indians using a box on one defense on Indianas All-American candidate Randy Allen were somewhat successful in holding Allen to 14 points. Bill Bickel did a super job on defense and chipped in 16 points in an inspired performance. However it proved to be not enough as Indiana was too much for the Indians. Tim Tabor lead Juniata with 23 points and for the first time in his college career Don Williams was shut out. Oscar Hachett was the only other Indian to crack double figures with 12 points.

On Saturday night Juniata appeared to be as cold as the 50 degree gym in which they played to drop a decision 66-50 to Wagner. Turnovers, which have haunted the Indians all season, were again costly as JC registered 22 turnovers against 14 by Wagner. Donny Williams snapped out of his 1 game skid and was the only Indian to break double figures with 16 points.

The Indians next travel to Elizabethtown on Wednesday evening. They return home Friday to take on Westminister and then hit the road again Saturday night to face Philadelphia Textile. The season comes to a close here Friday, Feb. 22 with the Indians entertaining F&M. Thus an end to another disappointing season, and the cry "Wait till next year."

Women's Basketball Comes Back To Defeat Dickinson

by Vernne Wetzel

The J.C. women's basketball team lost to Indiana last Tuesday and defeated Dickinson last Saturday to bring their record to 4-2 with three games left in the season.

Indiana defeated us by 39-23. This was a highly defensive game. J.C. came out looking great in the first quarter. They led 8-7 at the end of the quarter. The second quarter Indiana adjusted to our man-to-man defense and ran the score to 16-10 lead at half time. In the third quarter our girls came out strong again and cut the lead to three points by the end of the quarter. The Indians ran away with the game in the fourth quarter. They used a man-to-man defense. This was the first time our girls were faced with this defense, and it proved to be too tough for us to crack. The high scorers for the game were Mardi Frye and Kim Norris with 6 points each. Leslie Whittaker led the rebounding with 7.

On Saturday the girls came back to win over Dickinson 36-30. We used a man press for the whole game except for the last few minutes of the first half. The offense had a little better shooting percentage, but we had over 20 turnovers. Dickinson was a poor shooting team; they had many chances for scores on fast breaks that they did not capitalize on. High scorer for J.C. was senior Vernne Wetzel with 21 points. Leslie Whittaker had 5 rebounds and Mardi Frye had 4 to lead the team in that category. The half-time score was Dickinson 16 - J.C. 15. Our girls came out and opened a 14-point lead in the third quarter. This enabled Coach Frazier to put some other players into the game so they could get some experience.

The team has had problems since the St. Francis game with rebounding, shooting and turnovers. The two leading rebounders haven't been doing the job on the boards that the team was used to. The shooting is cold, to say the least. The number of turnovers has been high for the last two games. The defense is doing a fair job in holding the opponents, but the offense hasn't seen a lot of improvement.

At the beginning of the season our team had trouble in the first and third quarters getting started. Now the team seems to come out strong at the beginning and after the half, but we lose our momentum in the second and fourth quarters. Hopefully, the girls will be able to put four good quarters of basketball together for the last three games. The next two games are away, first at St. Francis Friday and at Altoona next Tuesday. The final home game is next Friday (Feb. 22) against F&M.

Baseball Team Gets Ready For Spring Training

by Dave Juad

The baseball team is planning a trip to Florida to help them tune up for the upcoming season. The team plans to stay in St. Petersburg where they can work on fundamentals as well as play a few other colleges which will be staying in St. Petersburg at the same time. All of the 23 players that Coach Berrier is planning to take, must pay their own way. The team hopes to repeat its visit to the EOAC tournment again this year with a little better outcome. Last year the Indians lost to Delaware Valley 7-2 in the first round of the tournment.

Health, Food, Politics For Stud. Concern

By Henry Siedzikowski

The Student Concerns Committee is the largest standing committee on the Student Senate, consisting of five of the fourteen senators. This committee deals with any area of student concern except life in the dorms.

Among the responsibilities of this committee is the leadership of the food service committee. This committee gives leadership of the food

Among the responsibilities of this committee is the leadership of the food service committee. This committee gives the students a chance to voice complaints and suggestions to the food service management. Although we cannot realistically control the quality of the food, we can apply some restraints. If anyone has anything to say, the meetings are held every other Tuesday night.

Also, we attempt to voice student opinion on the Health Service to the administration. Although again, we do not have much control directly, we can exert some influence. Along with these specific instances, we try to keep an eye on all other student services.

In addition to student services and other miscellaneous student concerns on campus, the student concerns committee is also the political arm of the student senate. We watch student interests in the political realm off campus. This has been a debatable function of the student Senate, however, we feel it is an important area of concern if we are to fully represent the students.

If anyone has any questions on this committee, or wishes to report an area of concern, just contact a member of the committee. They are Henry Siedzikowski, Eric Kiesshauer, Cindy Schwarzfisher, Rusty Bullock and Judy Huss.

Stud. Governments Complex Workings Explained To Help Juniata Students

By Gloria Barone

It's a bird . . . it's a plane . . . it's Student Government! But for many, this political body within Juniata remains as enigmatic as Superman. Students wonder at the functionings of this system, if it functions at all.

In fact, President of Student Government Dave Baer, recognizes his greatest obstacle as getting students to know what's going on with the college government.

Starting at the top, the executive offices consist of the president and vice-president who are elected at large for one year, and the secretary who is appointed by the president pending approval by the Senate.

Next in the political pyramid is the senate, a 14-member block. Three freshmen are elected each fall to join the 11 member body elected to office the previous spring. Within the senate are four committees — here the intricate political weavings start to become more complicated as these committees then break down into subcommittees. Well, nobody ever said politics was simple.

"Student Concerns," the first senate committee, handles general gripes from the students. The members try to catch complaints about Food Service and they attend the Food Service meetings to voice them. They also suggest special activities for the food service to plan, such as the Halloween dinner.

Also under "Student Concerns" is the Course Evaluation subcommittee, a 15-20 person body, the chairman of which is also appointed by the student government president. This group gathers students' comments to compile the course evaluation handbooks. The Legal Rights subcommittee is also under "Student Concerns," along with the Board of Trustees representatives and the Faculty Committee. The Board of Trustees student representatives and the Faculty Committee. The Board of Trustees student representatives sit in on the Trustees' meetings to keep them in touch with Juniata today. But the Faculty Committee further splits into quinary fission to the Executive, Personnel, Planning, Program and Standards branches. This entire body warrants an article in itself.

The provost is chairman of the Executive Committees with students sitting in, all of which oversees the rest of the branches. Three students sit on the Personnel branch, concerned with such touchy topics as tenure and the hiring and firing of the faculty itself. Two students hear the Planning branch meetings, which performs in such areas as approving Programs of emphasis'. The Standards branch does as the name implies, setting actual academic standards, such as if a unit should be considered as value centered and if the credits designated are appropriate to a particular course. All students in the subcommittees are responsible to the Senate.

The second committee in the Senate is the "Budget Management" committee, responsible for the financial allocations to various other organizations, such as the Student Volunteer Service. This body keeps the financial books and checks the vending machines on campus. Student Government receives a commission on all the Mr. Goodbars and Dr. Peppers sold through these mechanical wonders. The committee also interviews and makes recommendations for personnel to the President.

"Residential Life" is the third Senate committee. The president of Dormitory Government, filling a dual role of Senator, is elected at the same time as Student Government. The Vice-president of Dormitory Government is then appointed from the Senate by the residing student government president. This year the main concerns of dorm government Questions Of Academic Life For Comm.

By Jack Schumaker

The Academic Standards Committee, one of the college's major committees, has three functions to serve their dealings/questions of academic quality. The committee develops policy, procedure and certifies academic units, initiated by both students and faculty. This applies to students when they are seeking approval of independent studies or tutorials. Secondly the Committee develops policy dealing with admissions, grading and grade reporting. Recently the Committee was involved with the decision concerning the grade reporting of Human Existence Historical units, a question of great concern to many students. Also the committee recommends candidates to the Faculty for graduation. Involved in this function is a review of the student's record to insure that he has completed the graduation requirements. At this moment the Committee is involved in debate over what is required for graduation honors.

The Academic Standards Committee is composed of five students and five faculty. In addition to this voting membership three ex-offico seats are occupied by the Provost, the Registrar and the Director of Admissions. If you have questions or suggestions involving such matters as graduation honors please contact the students on the Committee. They are our representatives on the Committee to put forth the student view. Our students on the Committee are Marsha Rowland, Barb Kosik, Chris Hornberger, Jeff Putt and Mike Klag.

Course Evaluation Comm. Attempts Reliable Criticism

By Dave Mitchell

The student government at Juniata has formed a committee over the past two years to evaluate courses at JC and the manner in which they are taught. The committee is made of hard-working volunteers from the freshmen, sophomore, junior and senior classes. Its purpose is to establish a critisism of courses offered and the professors teaching them with the goal in mind of showing the student body what a course is really like from the inside view of the people who have taken the course and in an effort to set up a base of information from which professors can draw improvements for their classes.

Course evaluation takes place in this manner: the committee assigns certain members to certain courses, these committee members secure information from the professors currently teaching the course, then questionnaires are written and sent to the students presently taking the course. The results are tabulated by computer and comprised into one final summary in book form which is made available to the student body for a charge of twenty-five cents. It provides an excellent description of professors, course content, what is expected of the student in the way of readings and exams and just general comments about courses as a whole, comments not originating from the committee members, but conclusions drawn from questionaires filled out by people who actually took the course. It is considered such a reliable source of critisism that the faculty committee uses it to evaluate professors and their ways of teaching.

Course evaluation books for fall and winter term courses will be available in approximately six weeks through the student government. A supplement describing spring term courses will be offered during the '74-'75 winter term. For students wanting to know what courses and profs are all about at JC, this book really tells it like it is.

Human Sexuality Symposium Sponsored By Dorm Gov't

By J. Milburn

During the upcoming weeks of March and April, Dorm Government will be sponsoring the Human Sexuality Symposium. Each presentation will be concerning one aspect of the physical and moral implications of human sexuality. The program will be held in Alumni Hall.

The first of the series will be held on Tuesday, March 19, at 8:00 p.m. with Juniata's own Dr. Senft speaking on "The Physiological Basics of Human Sexuality."

Next will be a presentation on Sunday, March 24, at 8:00 p.m., featuring Dr. Alexander Franco of the Penn State Ritenour Health Center speaking on "Birth Control, Abortion, and V.D." He is highly qualified in his field, being a retired obstetrician and gynecologist as well as active in the institution and running of the Family Planning Center located in Bellefonte, Pa., near State College. His experience should ensure relevance and informity to his presentation.

The final presentation in the series will be held on Tuesday, April 2, at 8:00 with Dr. Grahm B. Spanier from PennState Speaking on the "Psychological Aspects of Heterosexual Relationships." This topic will include such areas as dating and premarital sex. Dr. Spanier is also well qualified to speak in this field, being an Assistant Professor in the Division Of Individual and Family Studies at Penn State. He has also been a Clinical Intern in Marriage and Family Counseling in Evanston, Illinois. He has spoken on such topics as "Premarital Cohabitation" and "Dating: Durable, Doubtful, Dying, or Dead?" and written on "Measuring Social Class among College Students" and "Sex Education and Premarital Sexual Behavior Among College Students." Dr. Spanier, with such experience to his credit, should provide an enlightening and informative view of human sexuality well worth attending.

University of Illinois To Start Tour at JC

The University of Illinois Jazz Band will begin it's statewide tour at Juniata College on March 17. The Internationally acclaimed Jazz Band will perform Sunday at 8:00 in Oller Hall.

Faculty Exec. Comm. Allows Sudent Votes

By Rob Lopresti

The Faculty Executive Committee is one of the college's highest decision-making bodies in which students have a vote.

The Committee is the guide and to some extent control for all the faculty committees. Its members include the Provost, the heads of each faculty committee, and two students; for a total of nine.

One of their duties is making up the agenda for the faculty meetings. This is important, since it allows them to determine if and when any subject is going to be discussed.

Their other duties include serving as an instrument of communication between faculty members. They can also set deadlines for the completion of any business of a faculty committee. They can be called on to serve as advisors to the President or Provost.

Any requests for appeals of any decision by a faculty committee go to the Executive Committee. They decide how it will be dealt with.

Obviously, the Committee has a good deal of say over the college's programs. Carl Glaeser and Bruce Moyer, as the student members have an opportunity to influence (and also each has a vote on) many matters of great interest to the student body. These include the college's policies on program review and credits.

The members of the Executive Committee serve for one year. Those who apply to be student members are appointed by the President and approved by the Student Senate.

As mrmbers of the Committee they will have the power to influence the college's policys for years to come.

EDITORIAL

By Jim Messner

Several articles have been written concerning student government in an effort to conquer some of the ignorance of the student toward the Senate and its committees.

We have student representatives on every faculty and trustee committee. Students in the admission department and students on the judicial board reflect the degree of responsibility which is given the students as a result of Senate activity.

Juniata has become very influential in the national student lobby and state lobby. One student, Sue Rosshirt, has been elected to a 12-member national board and is responsible for a five state area. Another student, Bruce Moyer, has duties in the state of Pennsylvania and is responsible for organizing the state lobbying conference to be held at J. C. the weekend of the 23rd of March.

Activities sponsored by the Senate, such as Senator Birch Bayh and the impeachment panel discussion, reflect the success the Senate has bringing the outside world to tiny Juniata.

While addressing a group of prospective students I caught myself saying, "Juniata students are liberal. They only appear conservative because they have gotten everything that most other students have not even thought to ask for." Reflecting upon this statement, I felt despair. We members of the Senate have become contented with our successes.

But we have no reason to be contented. Students still go to the required number of classes, do the required readings, take the required tests, and fulfill the requirements for graduation and they do nothing more. We explain to high school seniors how in a small college atmosphere students can see faculty and develop a warm relationship with them. Many students never see their professors outside of class. For important activities on campus, many students will say the following day, why didn't I go to that?

Ifeel the Senate has reached its limit in the direction it has traveled. New leadership and new direction is necesary. Fortunately elections will soon be held. What direction should we aim? What end shall we seek? Knowing what the Senate involves helps. I do not know the answers. I do know that the answers lie somewhere in the student body.

"Greed"-Not An Entertaining Movie But Still One of Best Movies Made

By Brad Rudy

OK, gang, let's get one thing straight right away — "Greed" is not an entertaining movie. Based on Frank Norris' brutal novel McTeague, it is perhaps one of the most agonizingly uncompromising films ever made.

Before getting any further into this article, a little bit of the films rather unusual history should be told. It seems ironic that a film relating the destructions of five people through greed should itself be mutilated beyond recognition by the greed of the releasing studio. Director Erich von Stroheim had made an epic 8 hour film, mortgaging his home and life insurance to stay alive during the filming. However, MGM, with its mind in the box office, ordered von Stroheim to cut the film to "marketable length." He managed to edit about half the film and a friend of his edited about an hour more. This still didn't please the studio, though, so they gave the film to a "hack cutter" "With nothing on his mind but a hat," to use von Stroheim's own words. This editor had never read Norris' novel or von Stroheim's original script, so he haphazardly cut whole sequences, filling the plot gaps with poorly written titles, and, in this two hour form, the film was finally released in late 1924 and will be the form shown here Friday night. It has been said that this mutilation is von Stroheim's own fault, that he possessed neither the talent nor the skill to limit his subject, but the point is that the film was never meant to be viewed in one sitting. It was in two four hour sections with a break for dinner in the middle. After all, if this can be done in the theater (O'Neill's Mourning Becomes Electra for example), why not in the film? This wasn't all that was involved however. An actor was called from Argentina to play the part of a junkman in one of the ironic subplots. He worked over nine months on the film and contracted double pneumonia in a scene shot in the San Francisco Bay. Not one shot remains of him in the film. This isn't the end, though. MGM saw absolutely no box office appeal in the subject, so they didn't promote the film at all, hoping to write it off as a total loss for income tax purposes. Then, to add insult to injury, the original negative was destroyed "to get the 43 cents worth of silver out of it." Needless to say, the one or two prints which were made fro this original are probably priceless, if they still exist.

Despite its shaky plot structure, though, the final form of the film is still very powerful and affecting. Th plot follows a miner named McTeague, strong and stupid, who leaves his home to become a quack dentist. In San Francisco, he becomes friends with Marcus Schouler and falls in love with Trina Sieppe, with whom Marcus is also in love. But Marcus steps aside and Trina and "Mac" are married. When Trina wins $5,000 in a lottery, everything sort of dies. Marcus begins to hate Mac, and Trina becomes more and more stingy until finally, Mac kills her and takes her money. Marcus chases him into Death Valley where their mutual hatred and greed cause their destructions.

The plot really isn't as important, though, as the different aspects of greed which von Stroheim shows us working. For Marcus, it destroys everything from his friendship to his life. His greed is the "mildest," yet, it is his resentment of Mac and Trina's new-found wealth that sets in action the events bringing about everyone's downfall. For Mac, money is nothing but what it can do to help him survive. He is too dull-witted to

Visiting Classics Scholar to Speak On Archeology

During the week of March 18, Anna Shaw Benjamin will be on campus under the auspices of Division I Visiting Scholars Committee.

Dr. Benjamin, at present chairman of the department of classics at Rutgers University, began her teaching career at Juniata College. She left here to join the faculty of the University of Missouri where she became chairman of classics.

Dr. Benjamin has not only been a working scholar at the Institute for Advanced Studies in Princeton but she has also been a visiting professor at other universities. She has published articles in English literature as well as in the classics. She has spent years at archaeological digs in Greece and Turkey. At present she is evaluating the findings from the Agora in Athens.

While she is on campus, Dr. Benjamin will conduct a seminar on "Archaeology and Cities." She will also meet classes in literature, history and religion. On Wednesday, March 20, she will present an illustrated lecture, "An Archaeological View of Ancient Athenians at Work." The place is Shoemaker Galleries. The time is 4:30. All are invited to the lecture and for the refreshments that follow.

Advisor System Studied, Found Lacking

By Dave Baer

Not long ago, as I was using the Xerox machine in Brumbaugh Science Center, I noticed a Freshman intently studying the faculty directory nearby. Upon inquiring, I found that she desperately needed a second advisor, and she candidly admitted that she was going on the "sound" of the name as the deciding factor. After she explained to me her ideas and aspirations, I suggested a faculty member which she delightedly accepted. No later than 5 minutes I encountered this same individual who reported that she had been successful in procuring a "Second advisor".

It seems that this student's lack of seriousness in deciding upon a faculty advisor demonstrates the problems in our academic advising system.

The founders of the New Curriculum developed a program that would not only give the student more freedoms, but also would demand from him or her greater responsibility — among them the choice of advisors. However, they were cognizant that most students coming from a normal high school background would be inadequately prepared to cope with selecting advisors on their own and so the originators of the New Curriculum anticipated the problem with an advising program that would aid students in planning their college experience. However, ther is a disturbing discrepancy between what the Task Force intended as an advising program and what now exists.

Some faculty advisors have far exceeded even the most demanding intentions of the Task Force, but judging from the number of complaints I have received from students, I feel that more must be done and an investigation of the situation is certainly warranted.

The structure of the department "Majors" of the old curriculum, which didn't allow course decisions by a student, has been replaced — in the name of freedom — with a less organized structure within which it's often more difficult for a student to make decisions affecting his college career. Originally it was intended that two faculty advisors would work towards opposing goals in a student's education. One advisor associated with the Program of Emphasis was to insure a specialization while the other advisor would work toward the broadening of the student's education. However, the virtual absence of interaction between the student's two advisors prevents any real give and take implied by assigning the need for two advisors, and such a lack has led to a "take-over" of the P of E by one advisor, with the second assuming the function of a rubber stamp. Students with a P of E in one department were advised to take three units last term — all in the same department. Fuuthermore, two of the three units were laboratory courses demanding considerable time. I fail to see the effects of the second advisor.

In another case a more horrifying situation, one which has all the dimensions of a Catch 22, has been bestowed upon students with a Program of Emphasis in Education. Students in Education have complained to me time and again of the Faculty of the Education Department blackmailing students into taking courses that are not necessary for meeting the requirements for State certification. Education students have candidly confcssed their intellectual acquiescence only as a means of "getting out". Can we condone a system that prostitutes a student's integrity?

In other cases students have been inexcusably misinformed or uninformed by Faculty advisors. An incident happened last term in which two students were forced to change their graduation plans because a Faculty advisor had failed to inform them of a required course. Occurances such as this can't help but cause crediability problems.

In talking to some Faculty, they agree that the advising program is poor. Many of their advisees utilize them only during pre-registration which is hardly the close personal relationship sought by the Task Force. Furthermore, it was only recently the the Faculty received an accurate list of who their advisees were. A few Faculty also claim that time requirements and the number of advisees don't allow them to do justice to advising. All of these conditions add up to a bad scene regarding student's academic careers here at Juniata and could lead to important lack of education.

Possibly the integrity of the advising program has been damaged from the onset by the Freshmen Seminar which hasn't nutured student-faculty contact as it may have. A revision of the Seminar may change the tone of advising. A big problem is that faculty are as uninformed as students in matters regarding registration, requirements and administrative red tape. I believe a seminar for the advisors with the registrar may be in order. I also find it a little disturbing when the first thing an advisor hands me is a list of what to take for what I want to be. A P of E in this light seems to be only an excuse for a major. (I'm equally perturbed about some advisor's unwillingness to meet anywhere except in the office.)

Students have shirked their responsibilities in the New Curriculum by accepting (if even begrudgingly) the advising program as it it stands. Possibly students don't realize what our responsibilities or options are. I know its easier this way, but is that what our education is about? The only way to help a student stand on his own two feet is to let hime lean on somebody, not by carrying him. But standing and leaning are not enough, the student has to want to walk.

Relax More, Feel Better, Try TM

By Mary Anne Runyen

It's spring and a whole new world is blooming, ready to be enjoyed. With each new spring a person should have more of "themselves" to enjoy and to function with. Yet we may find that as the years march on there seems to be something blocking our potential. There's a lot more we know we can do, a lot more we can be. Where is it?

Psychology says we use about 10-15% of our mental capacity. There is a vast portion of our mind that remains untouched. How do we get to that other 85-90%? That's what this article is about. Many Juniata Students are finding that by adding a simple 15-20 minute technique, twice a day to their usual routines, they have more energy, increased clarity of mind, improved relationships, improved learning ability and just a general good feeling all around.

The technique is Transcendental Meditation, which is a form of deep relaxation, 8% deeper than a full night's sleep. The body gets this profound rest, because TM allows the mind to settle down to finer levels of thinking and the body settles right along with it. TM enlivens that other 85-90% of our mind and puts us in contact with a resevoir of energy and creativity.

Students notice even after the first few practices of TM, they have increased efficiency in action, quicker reaction time, along with the other effects mentioned earlier.

In no way does TM conflict with any religion, but as religious people have found, it actually enhances their religious experiences. Meditation just allows one to enjoy more.

An introductory lecture on Transcendental Meditation followed by a question and answer period, will be presented in Ellis Ballroom on March 14th at 8 p.m. This lecture is open to all interested in hearing more.

value gold for anything accept his next meal or "steam beer." Here is an irony, in that this greed is the most "justified," yet, at the same time, it is the most destructive. It is though Trina that von Stroheim shows us greed in its ugliest and sickest form. Trina wants gold not for what it's worth, but for its physical beauty. She and Mac are wealthy enough to live in relative luxury, but they live at the poverty level only because Trina refuses to part with her lovely gold coins. Her sickness shows itself in scenes where she fondles the gold coins, endlessly polishing them, and, especially in one scene (since cut from the film) in which she buries her naked body in the gold, literally having a sexual experience by its touch.

One of the most outstanding aspects of the film is its startling sense of realism. Not one studio set was used; all scenes were filmed in mining caves, San Francisco houses, and, most startling of all, in the middle of Death Valley. (this was before any roads were made.) Miles from the nearest water and working under 100 degree heat, not a day went by that the heat didn't cause some crew member to collapse. Jean Hersholt, who plays Marcus was hospitalized for weeks with heat induced internal hemorrhaging. But apparently, it was worth it, as this climax is one of the most brutal and agonizing sequences ever filmed.

Despite its mutilation, "Greed" is still a powerful and dramatic film. It shows us humanity at its ugliest, in its starkest and sickest form. It stars Gibson Gowland as McTeague, Zasu Pitts as Trina, and Jean Hersholt as Marcus. It will be shown Friday, March 15 at 8 p.m. in Alumni Hall, admission being $.25.

Erich von Stroheim justified his making of the film with the following:

"I felt that the motion picture going public had become weary of insipid Pollyanna stories with their peroxide-blonde, doll-like heroines, steeped in eternal virginity, and their hairless flat chested sterile heroes, who were as lily-white as the heroines. I believed audiences were ready to witness real drama and real tragedy, as it hapens every day in every land . . . People who defied prejudice and jealousies, conventions and social mores of a hypocritical society, who fought for their passions, conquered them, or were conquered by them." (Excerpts from an unpublished article by von Stroheim, printed in Erich von Stroheim, Greed, ed. by Sandra Wake, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1972, pp. 7-8) were lifestyles, dormitory policies, taking care of maintenance complaints, and helping during the room drawing lottery in the spring.

Most important dorm Government task is getting information from Student Government to the dorms. Getting feedback from the students to the governmental body is difficult, so theoretically dorm representatives can bridge the gap. These representatives also work closely with the deans. Before Dorm Government was created, senators were sent out on dorm visitations.

The Human Sexual Symposium this month is being sponsored by Dorm Government also.

Fourth and last committee in the Senate is the "Publicity" committee-newly established shortly after last Christmas, endeavoring to inform students about the extra-curricular activities available on campus and to perpetuate their involvement in them.

And, although a separate entity in itself and not politically aligned, the Judicial Board — for selected

African Safari

By Agyei Frempong

"What are all the flags and decorations for?"

"Oh, Ghana just celebrated her 17th independence anniversary last week; 6th of March."

"Now tell me something, how did your country come to be called Ghana since it was called Gold Coast before independence?"

"That is a good question. Before the advant of the Europeans, Ghana was largely the then Ashanti Empire which occupied about three-fourths of present day Ghana and some parts of the modern nation of Ivory Coast. It was ruled by a King, the Asantehene, through his sub-chiefs and even when the British colonized the country they ruled through the chiefs in what is known as indirect rule. The Europeans upon arrival found the territory to possess large quantities of gold and therefore named the area Gold Coast just as Ivory Coast was so named for the ivory it possesed. How then did we come to call our Nation Ghana? For explanation I would like you to read this extract from a speech given by Dr. Nkrumah when he formally proposed the independence of the Gold Coast.

". . . . In the very early days of the Christian era, long before England had assumed any importance, long even before her people had united into a nation, our ancestors had attained a great empire which lasted until the eleventh century, when it fell before the attacks of the Moors of the North. At its height the empire stretched from Timbuktu to Bamako, and even as far as to the Atlantic. It is said that lawyers and scholars were much respected in that empire and that the inhabitants of Ghana wore garments of wool, cotton, silk and velvet. There was trade in copper, gold and textile fabrics and jewels and weapons of gold and silver were carried.

Thus may we take pride in the name Ghana, not out of romanticism, but as an inspiration for the future. It is right and proper that we should know our past, a glorious future, not in terms of war and military pomp, but in terms of social progress and of peace. For we repudiate war and violence. Our battles shall be against the old ideas that keep men tramelled in their own greed; against the crass stupidies that breed hatred, fear and inhumanity. The heroes of our future will be those who can lead our people out of the stifling fog of dis-integration through serfdom, into the valley of light where purpose, endeavour and determination will create the brotherhood which Christ proclaimed two thousand years ago, and about which so much is said, but so little done."

"This is very interesting; even lawyers and scholars as far back as the 10th century wonder how many civilizations are in ruins."

"Well, here we are at the museum!"

"I like the stone sculpters on the lawn. This one is very nice."

"True, well let's enter."

"Isn't that a strange doll?"

"Oh that! It's not a doll in the English sense. It's called 'Akuaba' fertility doll. There was a belief among our ancestors that barren women could bear children by caring that around. Interestingly, Juniata College Library posses a similar one."

"Oh really, I haven't seen it before. What are these figures on the shelf?"

"You mean the brass figures? They are called 'Abramuo' (Goldweights). In days of old people bought and paid for in gold and gold dust. Prices were often estimated in terms of domestic animals i.e. cow, sheep, hens etc. Brass figures of particular weights were made to represent these animals. An amount of gold or gold dust equivalent to the weight of a particular 'Abramuo' (goldweight) was the price of the animal the Goldweight representing In this sense, if an item cost one 'Predwan' (name of a goldweight representing a sheep) it was paid for in gold by weighing the gold against the 'predwan' on a pair of scales. However these figures weren't always in animal forms. As you can see, there are figures in the forms of a mother and a baby, a hunter, two lovers, a chair, a sword, wrestlers etc. What was important was that they all maintained the exact weight they were supposed to represent i.e. If a 'predwan' was supposed to weight 10 ounces all figures representing 'predwan' was supposed to weigh 10 ounces."

"That is very interesting. Look at those beautiful intricate carvings!"

"Yes, and do you see the geometric designs on the drums, carvings and brass works?"

"Great, especially the complex geometric weaving of the . . .er, what's it called?"

"You mean the Kente cloth?"

"Yes, that is just wonderful. What about these stone objects?"

"Oh, the Nyame Akuma (God's Axe). They were stone tools and weapons used by the ancient people. They are commonly found all over the country and people in their ignorance called them Nyame Akuma. Some people superstitiously thought that it came down from the sky alongside with thunderstorms."

"Some of them have very sharp edges. What about this metal pot?"

"That is called 'Forowa' pot. Have you seen the one possesed by Juniata College Library before; it is all made of tin."

"Are all the engravings made by hand?"

"Oh yes, the pot itself as well as the engravings are hand made. Pomade was kept in it. Isn't it strange that a mere pomade container should be so well made?"

"Those craftsmen were very skillful; er . . . shall we go to the second floor now?"

"I don't think so unless you particularly desire. How about going downtown to the market area . . . we could see the market place and later have lunch at a restaurant. We could always come back here if we want."

"That's fine with me, shall we go now?"

"Accra is a very busy place and very modern too; what is the population of the city?"

"Er . . . about 165,000; However don't think that the whole of Ghana is like Accra. Of course we have some cities just as nice or even nicer, like Kumasi, Tema, Sekondi/Takoradi, Tamale and others. But remember Ghana is just a developing country and some parts, especially the rural areas, are yet to be modernized. You will see this for yourself when we begin to tour the country-side."

"Let's enter some of these stores."

"We are almost at the market now so let's see the market first."

"I see some of the stores are operated by whites."

"Yes, as you can see, there are lots of whites in the country. Some were even born here. All those in the 'small business' are Ghanaians for there is a law that prohibits aliens from undertaking 'small business' in the country. However, there are some aliens in big business and in the teaching field."

"Do you have the type of racial problems we have in the United States?"

"No, in Ghana there is no racial problem like you have in the U. S. The colour of a person's skin is of no importance here. Unity and co-operation is achieved in all social matters, even in such delicate issues as marriage and chieftaincy. A good example of the racial harmony we have achieved is the fact that one of the chiefs of the Akwapim tribe is a white American. There is another white chief in Juaben in the Ashanti region. A Ghanaian to us is a citizen of Ghana not necessarily and African or a white. In the same sense, a person to us is who he is and what he stands for, not who his parents are and where he comes from."

"Isn't that the way things should be though . . . Unfortunately . . ."

by Gary Gillen

A lot has happened since the last time I did any sports stumpin' and so much has happened it will take awhile to get back on the track. I guess the biggest news to hit the Juniata Sports scene was the resignation of Coach Jack Swinderman and the hiring of Carl Meditch, a former Ball State Assistant, as the new head coach. It came as no surprise to hear of Coach Swinderman's resignation as he had been troubled with a poor record and more so the continual process of players quiting the squad. By this season's end there were no seniors and only 2 juniors. Hopefully Coach Meditch will breathe new life into the basketball program and bring a winner to Juniata. (more on Coach Meditch next week).

Carl Meditch, the new basketball coach at J.C.

Right now JC is in between seasons. The basketball team lost their final game to fall to a lowly season record of 7-18. Donny Williams was the statistical leader in both scoring and rebounding. Tim Tabor was second in both categories.

The wrestling squad showed some sign of improvement this past year and had it not been for some key injuries and the eventual forcit at 118, the team may have won more than the 2 matches they did capture. Myron Zimmerman and Steve Oak both wrestled their last matches for Juniata and deserve much credit for giving leadership throughout the year.

Also this past winter Women's Basketball seemed to catch on and proved to be pretty exciting. The girls did quite well and the increasing crowds should give much encouragement to the women's athletics program.

In a few short weeks Juniata athletics will be in full swing again, and the prospects look bright. Baseball, track, tennis and golf all appear to have solid squads and could return JC to the winning ways of the fall. Tune in next week for a deeper look into the prospects for the spring.

JC Wrestlers Finished 12th At Conference

Myron Zimmerman, senior captain from Ephrata, has finished this winter's wrestling season as the winningest grappler on the Juniata College team.

Zimmerman, a graduate of Cocalico High School, wound up with a record of 7-5-1 for the Indians, who were 2-9 as a team on the year. He wrestled at 150 pounds.

Out of action for more than a month and a half with two broken bones in his foot, Zimmerman returned for the Indians' last four matches and did not suffer a loss. In the Middle Atlantic Conference College Division championships, Zimmerman lost to the second and third-place finishers, while defeating one opponent.

His 18 team points, not including tournament bouts, ranked second on the Juniata squad.

J. Scott Simmons, a freshman heavyweight from Churchville, was the only other Indian matman with a winning record on the year. He was 6-5-0, including three wins by falls. His 21 points led the team, as did his number of falls.

Simmons split four bouts in the MAC tournament, losing by a single point to champion Al Scharer of Wilkes.

Other top grapplers for the Indians this season were Steve Oak, 190-pound junior from Lancaster, 5-6-0; Dave Landis, 177-pound freshman from Lititz, 5-9-0; and Jim Ruoss, 167-pound sophomore from Leola, 2-4-1. Ruoss contributed more team points than he gave away. He was 14-11 in that column, while Oak finished even at 18-18.

Oak lost in the conference championships to winner Steve Sanko of Lebanon Valley and third-place Neil Hazzard of Johns Hopkins. He defeated one opponent. Landis won his first match, 22-11, and a later bout 16-1. He lost by falls to the second and fourth-place finishers. Ruoss lost once to Joe Bender of Moravian.

Heavyweights provided the best weight-class record for the Indians on the year, breaking even at 8-8-0. Their total pins (4) and total team points (30) also led the team.

On the other hand, not a single bout was won at 158, and a total of two victories came at 134 and 142. In the lower six weight classes, the Indian composite was 14-53-2. In the upper four, the record was 23-38-2. Juniata forfeited 10 bouts, all in the lower weights.

The Indians moved up a notch at the conference championships, finishing 12th is the 16-team field. They were 13th in 1973. Their wins for this season both came at home, against Susquehanna, 18-14, and Scranton, 35-15. Losses came at the hands of Moravian, Lycoming (twice), St. Francis, Gettysburg, Messiah, Penn State - Altoona, Lebanon Valley and Elizabethtown.

Volleyball Champs Decided

by Jaime Belmont

The guys on the team, The Amsterdam Bay and Goosing Company, may not always have their heads together off the court, but on Thursday, February 14, they really collected themselves and claimed the championship for men's Volleyball Intramurals, defeating Dubois House 2 out of 3 games.

I have to admit it was the most exciting valleyball games I've ever seen played. The stress on the players was evident throughout the whole game. Captain Felix Pappalardo should be proud that his team played such a fantastic season. They displayed not only strength but tact. Slim Scott Hey used his catlike moves to save the ball from hitting the floor. John Pulliam made spiking loog effectless and impossible to return. John DiAmmino, Duryea Heppard, Steve James and Walt Masterson demonstrated the perfect set up. And Tom Hunter was the voice that boosted everyones morale.

Panel Discusses Nixon Ouster

By Alice Boomhower

Billed as America's Number One Issue, the panel discussion on the Impeachment of President Nixon, began last Monday evening. The panel was introduced, and the first speaker began his dissertation. David Fishlow is National Field Director for the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) and a proponent of impeachment. He rattled off charges against the President with little or no background on why he believed these were impeachable offenses.

Second to speak was Edward Spotts, a member of the National Committee for Fairness to the President. He began his talk with four bawdy stories, went into why he felt Shapp and Denninberg were "crooks". Spoke some on how "boys and girls" should be the ones most for Nixon because "he got us out of Vietnam" and "he ended the draft". Then he ended with yelling that the charges were ridiculous, and that "all politicians did them anyway, so it really didn't matter."

Third to speak was Irwin Aronson, a Pennsylvania executive of the AFL-CIO. He spoke on the attitudes of America, and what the AFL-CIO had suggested to the Congress.

James Gill was the next speaker, and a colleague of Mr. Spotts. In a capsulated form, he tried to answer the charges against the President and give his reasons for believing that the President should not be impeached.

To round out the program, Lawrence Mundus spoke on what he felt Watergate and Impeachment would achieve for the country.

Oller Hall was fairly well filled for this event, and the subsequent questions were basically aimed at Mr. Spotts.

When I began this article I felt that I could not be unbiased. In the course of the discussion, I became increasingly aware that the two sides were not represented fairly. This was not any fault of the planners, but it did occur. For those students who are against impeachment, their side was not fairly represented. I seriously hope that no students decided from the evidence given at this discussion for or against impeachment. That takes a critical look at both sides of the issue, and they were not given in this discussion.

Women's Basketball Team Concludes Winning Season

by Vernne Wetzel

The Juniata College varsity women's basketball team finished this season with a 6 and 2 record. The last game of the season (Feb. 22) with F&M was cancelled by F&M. Wednesday, during finals, the team traveled to Altoona and defeated the Penn State campus for the second time this season. In all, Coach Pat Frazier built a pretty good team, and the girls came through with a winning season.

The women's basketball program is now firmly established here at J.C. Things look good for next year. First of all the team is losing only one senior. That leaves four starters and eight other players returning. Mardi Frye was the outstanding freshman this year. She led the team in rebounding, and was responsible for a substantial part of our total scoring. Kim Norris (soph.) came on in the latter part of the season to lead the team in scoring. Sue Rosshirt (jr.) was outstanding as the offensive quarterback, and she did an equally fine job on defense. Leslie Whittaker, Jacque Prentiss, Leila Eways, and Cathy Dickey all did well when they played. The other five team members did not see a great deal of action during games, but they put as much effort and dedication into playing as their teammates. These players were Ellen Valentine, Elaine Becker, Jane Robinson, Lynne Nensteil, and Barb Kosik.

As yet, the coach for next year has not been designated. With the success of this year's program and the support and interest of the college and community, next year's program should be even better. In four years the basketball team has come from nearly nothing to be a well organized and effectively handled part of the total athletic life of Juniata College. I wish the same for the other women's athletics now being developed for Juniata.

Student Government—

committee representatives — is also appointed by the President with approval by the Senate.

The Student Government usually meets every two weeks. All meetings are publicized and open to all students, who are encouraged to attend.

Student Government has only become politically oriented in about the past four years, as minutes of previous years' meetings indicate. The Government did things somewhat like Center Board does — mostly non-essential and petty things in the way of social activities. But "students in general have changed and so has Student Government," Baer said.

Turmoil exists, though. There is opposition by some students that Student Government at the Juniata College level should not concern itself with national issues. But Student Government is nonetheless involved in Pennsylvania politics at a lobbying level and national issues on a Washington, D.C. level, such as the Student Government-sponsored debate recently on whether or nor President Nixon should be impeached.

Dave Baer also corresponds with other colleges to keep ties strong. And so, the tapestry seems complete, Student Government has woven itself into the college community as well as the world outside the Juniata campus.

Seniors Intern As Businessmen Spring Term

Three seniors from Juniata College will spend ten weeks, beginning on March 11, as "business interns" in local plants.

During the first eight weeks of the program, they will be at the plants 40 hours a week, observing and analyzing operations, sitting in on staff discussions, visiting and working in various departments, etc.

The purpose of the program is to give the students as much insight as possible into the decision-making processes of the participating firms. In addition, the students will have evening seminars on campus and during the final two weeks of their internships they are expected to write a report suggesting improvements or solutions to specific production or management problems they have chosen to investigate at the plants.

The three seniors are Brian L. Clemens of York, assigned to Owens-Corning Fiberglas plant in Huntingdon; Joseph M. Eways of Sinking Spring, the Westab plant at Alexandria, and Gary L. Ober of Lancaster, the Huntingdon branch of Elco Corp.

Charles W. Wise, instructor in economics and business administration, is serving as the supervisor of the program. Each of the seniors reveives credit for three course "units" from the college.

THE JUNIATIAN

VOL. XLVII NO. 15 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | MARCH 21, 1974

Vocation Is Theme for 1974 Will Judy Lecturers

Dr. Ralph Potter, Jr., theologian and author will present the 1974 Will Judy Lectures at Juniata College.

The lectures, dealing this year with the theme of "vocation" or "the problem of choosing meaningful work and life styles," are scheduled for 8 p.m. Tuesday and Wednesday, March 26 and 27, in Alumni Hall.

Dr. Potter's topic for the first lecture is "The Call to be One's Self" and the second lecture is entitled "The Call to be With Others: Servants or Friends."

In addition, during his visit to the campus Dr. Potter will speak in several classes and meet informally with groups of students.

The annual lecture series was established in 1958 with a contribution from the late Will Judy of Chicago, author of a number of books on dogs and publisher of the widely read pet magazine, Dog World. Judy, a 1911 graduate of Juniata, died Dec. 27 at the age of 82.

Dr. Potter holds a dual appointment at Harvard University as professor of social ethics in the Divinity School and as a member of the Center for Population Studies. He has written a book entitled War and Moral Discourse, published in 1966, and numerous articles on conscientious objection, population problems, the abortion controversy, relations between church and state, and various other subjects.

A member of the Harvard faculty since 1961, he had formerly served as pastor of churches in Kentucky, California and New Hampshire.

He holds the bachelor of arts degree from Occidental College, the bachelor of divinity from McCormick Theological Seminary and the doctors of theology in social ethics from Harvard.

During his student days, Dr. Potter worked as a teacher, athletic instructor, railroad section hand, maintenance employe, YMCA camp instructor and at a work camp in Poitiers, France. He also received a variety of fellowships, including grants from the Rockefeller and Kent Foundations.

Two JC Students Elected To Top Positions in National Lobby

While the rest of us were frolicking (?) around in February during the term break, four Juniata students were taking part in representative democracy of national student politics at the National Student Lobby's third annual convention in the unholy city of Washington, D.C. Gary Moore, Carl Glaeser, Bruce Moyer and Sue Rosshirt with the voting power of one-half vote per person, exercised Juniata Student Government's voting power of two at the gathering on February 23 to 27.

With more than 800 other students from all over the country, they voted to use the power of the lobby (the only registered student lobby) on issues which are guaranteed to affect the student in the upcoming year. The NSL will work for (1) increased funding and expenditure for work-study programs, (2) a change from $15,000 to $20,000 of total family income as the cut-off point for financial aid programs, and (3) discounts for students and those over sixty-five for air, train, and bus fare.

Programs drawing the opposition of the NSL are (1) the Carnegie plan which would decrease the tuition gap between public and private colleges and universities by doubling private school tuition, (NSL proposes subsidies for private institutions, as an alternative.) and (2) the sub-minimum wage plan whereby student workers would have a minimum wage only 85% of the standard minimum. NSL sees this plan as discriminatory.

Juniata's representatives appeared to be well respected at the NSL convention as Sue Rosshirt was elected as one of the two Region Five (Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Delaware, Maryland, and Washington, D.C.) coordinators. By virtue of being a regional coordinator, Sue also is now a member of the NSL National Board of Directors. This eighteen member board is composed of 12 regional coordinators and six at-large members. Along with the establishment of Board policy during her one year term, Sue will be working on the NSL organization of Maryland and Delaware and a membership drive for non-NSL colleges.

Streakers Hit JC, But Many Question "Sport"

by Rob Lopresti

Last weekend I was visited by my cousin Mark. Mark went to college at a large university in the late sixties, graduating with honors. Since then he has spent most of his time with a VISTA organization that works with inner-city kids.

We'd spent most of the evening talking in my room. A friend of mine came in, very excited and hardly able to wait till he was introduced to Mark to announce the news. "They say there's going to be more streakers tonight!"

Mark hadn't heard about the latest college fad and asked my friend to explain. He began by saying that "streaking" meant running nude, usually in a group.

"I don't get it" said Mark. "What's it all about? What are you people protesting against, trying to say?"

"Well, nothing."

"Then why is everybody doing it?"

"Just for the hell of it." He went on. "And, finally, the Dean just said that the administration doesn't mind that we do it. He says every generation of college students does something like it. What did kids do when you were in college?"

Mark hesitated. "What did we do? Well, we had some sit-ins that eventually got ROTC off the campus. We held protests against the war in Viet Nam. Once we took over the Dean's office and they almost brought the National Guard in."

Suddenly I was embarrassed for my generation, or at least my college class. But my friend didn't see it.

He went on about streaking. "The National Guard, huh? We had trouble with the town cops last time! Some guys almost ran right into a police car. You should have heard the cops yelling."

"Yelling," said Mark, and I knew that he was thinking of a time when cops had done more to college kids than just yell at them. "Tell me, what do the girls think of this pastime?"

My friend admitted most of them had never seen a streak because at Juniata it had been done mostly by boys, in front of boy's dorms, in the dark.

"Tell me, has your class ever done something that got the administration mad?"

Canterbury Guild Proprietors Attempt To Improve City's Cultural Facilities

Canterbury Guild proprietors Edward Evans and Glen Gress are preparing to open another arts facility in Huntingdon's professional district — the Carriage House Experimental Theatre.

The theatre, located in the old carriage house on the Miller Estate, 316 Washington Street, is a vital adjust to what is becoming a total arts complex for Huntingdonians.

The theatre will house a resident company headed by Gress and comprised of Evans, Lynn Streibhtiff and Josie McCoy. Year-round programming is being planned for the facility which will open its doors in March on a five-play season of contemporary works.

The company, which performs with guest artists from the community and from other theatres, will open with Harold Pinter's "A Slight Ache" in March, followed by Eugene Ionesco's "The Lesson" in May, Paul Foster's "The Recluse" in July, "Why Hanna's Skirt Won't Stay Down" by Tom Eyen in September, and close its season in November with an original play by Evans, "An Eagle Toward Heaven."

The thrust of the Carriage House Experimental Theatre repertoire will be toward original productions and recent works of contemporary drama. The company also hopes to utilize innovative production methods and programming as it expands the use of the new facility in the future.

Carriage House Experimental Theatre is a small, 50-seat theatre with flexible staging and seating conditions. Productions at Carriage House are expected to run the gamut from proscenium to arena and open thrust staging.

Admission to the Carriage House productions will be by subscription ticket, with only a few unsubscribed seated to be available for each performance. Productions this first season are on Friday and Saturday nights, the final two weeks of play months.

A brochure describing the 1974 season can be obtained by writing to Canterbury Guild, 317 Penn Street, Huntingdon, Pa., 16652, or by telephoning the Guild at 643-5125.

The New Carriage House, recently opened, presents plays of cultural interest to students and community.

Kipphan Studies Hitler's Close Friend Streicher

Dr. Klaus Kipphan of Juniata College, a leading scholar of German propaganda prior to and during World War II, will return to Germany this summer to continue interviewing members of the family of Julius Streicher, one of Adolf Hitler's closest early Nazi Party associates.

Kipphan, associate professor of history at Juniata, is author of "German Propaganda in the United States: 1933-41," published in 1971 by Karl Winter Press, Heidelberg. His interviews about Streicher, known abroad as "the Bloody Czar of Franconia," began during Kip-

Owens-Corning Here To Interview Seniors For Jobs

Representatives of the Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corporation will be coming to campus on two occasions through the sponsorship of the Office of Career Planning. Robert Paul and Daniel Sell of the Personnel Department of the Huntingdon Owens-Corning Plant will be visiting Juniata on Monday, March 11 and again on Thursday, March 14.

On March 11, Mr. Paul and Mr. Sell will be available for a group meeting in 201 Good Hall at 7:00 p.m. This meeting will be open to students of all majors and all class years. The purpose of the meeting is to discuss aspects of industrial hiring, production, etc. that are usually of interest to students who might consider eventual employment opportunities in business and industry. This session will provide information of interest to students of all class years.

The March 14 visit will be especially for recruiting purposes and will be open only to seniors. Recruiting is open to seniors of any major and is not solely for positions in the Huntingdon plant; rather, available positions could be in any of Owens-Corning's plants that are spread throughout the United States. It is noteworthy that women should not eliminate employment possibilities with Owens-Corning. Seniors interested in talking with Owens-Corning representatives should register in the Office of Career Planning.

No More Privileges?

To the Editor and students of Juniata College:

I have been moved by the events of the past few weeks to take pen in hand and put some of my thoughts on paper. The events of which I write are those regarding the drinking and smoking policies and the violations thereof.

Most of you have probably by now read the letter from the Dean of Students' Office, Student Government, and Center Board concerning drinking and smoking violations. I hope that many of you have also attended the dorm meetings regarding the aforementioned violations. If you have done either of the above things, then I think you will realize that there is a very serious problem forming right now and that if something lasting is not done soon, many of the privileges and rights which have been only recently given to us will backfire in our faces.

I think all of us will agree that the rights and property of other individuals should and must be respected. This is only common sense. Someday any of us could be that other individual and we would certainly want our rights and property to be respected. Secondly, I think that all of us will agree that there is a problem here on Juniata campus with the lack of respect given to other individuals' rights and property. There is evidence aplenty to support this statement; you need only look around you.

Did you ever wonder why Alumni Hall usually smells like a brewery on Monday mornings? It's because people spilled cans of beer in the upholstered seats during the previous Friday night movie. Last year, shortly after the Seatrain concert, did you ever wonder why the gym was unavailable for student use? It was because so many people during the concert had dropped lighted cigarette butts on the gym floor, creating burn marks which had to be first sanded down, then buffed, and finally varnished over. Did you ever wonder why there hasn't been mention of having a concert in the gym this year? It's because the school doesn't want the gym floor damaged as in the last concert held there. Did you ever wonder why the Center Board decided to use student monitors during the upcoming All Class Night to curtail smoking and drinking? It's because of all the refuse and damage found after the Billy Joel concert.

These are only a few examples of the sorts of things which have been going on recently here at Juniata. These sorts of violations go beyond all lines of age, authority, personal feelings. etc. These are basic human rights we're talking about. It doesn't matter that this property belongs to an institution which you feel is ripping you off of close to $4,000 and you therefore feel you should be allowed a little bit of revenge. It doesn't matter that this property belongs to the so-called "establishment" and you therefore feel it's cool to destroy it. Nor does it matter if you feel that "since everyone else is doing it, why shouldn't I." When it comes to destroying property and disrespecting other people's rights, you're just as wrong as the next guy.

I think the Student Government, Dean of Students' Office, and Center Board deserve a lot of praise for the way they are handling this situation. In the face of a myriad of flagrant violations, they have pretty well managed to keep their collective cool. I think the letter addressed to all students and the dorm meetings were both very mature and well-chosen actions. They are only trying to keep the lines of communication open and I think this is the first step towards solving the problem. After all, they could have been a lot tougher with us then they were. And yet, they are not asking us to stop drinking and smoking; rather they are asking us to act responsibly and behave like the mature adults we like to think we are. Are they asking the impossible of us? I think they are.

I have seen too much happening recently on this campus to think that any reversal of the current trends towards drinking and smoking can occur. I'm usually optimistic about man and his predicament, but not this time. I predict that within two years, if the current violations continue, this school will be so different that returning alumni won't even recognize it. We will lose the entire visitation system. There will be no more concerts. There will be unannounced raids on the dorms. Violators of the drinking and smoking policies will be prosecuted to the limit. Sounds scary, doesn't it; almost like a totalitarian state. I dare all of you to prove my prediction wrong. Your first big opportunity is coming up this weekend with All Class Night. All it takes is a little responsibility and mature thinking, but . . .

Finally, as long as I have your attention, I'd like to mention one other problem: shoplifting in the bookstore. Did you ever wonder why some of the prices are so high in the bookstore? It's not entirely due to inflation. Did you ever wonder why there are student monitors on duty or why they have those crazy contraptions at the front of the bookstore that only let one person enter and leave at a time? Every one of these measures is an attempt, in one way or another, to deal with tht problem of shoplifting. Even so, the bookstore is operating at a tremendous loss;

Open Letter

In reply to the overwhelming number of questions received since Monday night's program on the question of impeachment, we feel compelled to offer the following explanation.

Mr. Edward Spotts and Mr. James Gill were recommended to the Student Government as well-qualified and responsible spokesmen for the case against impeachment by the National Committee for Fairness to the President. In view of the tremendous difficulty we faced while organizing the program in obtaining a sufficient number of persons to speak against impeachment, we had no other alternative but to seriously consider the Fairness Committee's recommendation. After examining the extensive credentials of Mr. Spotts and Mr. Gill, we invited them to participate in the program, to which they gladly accepted.

It is unfortunate that Monday night's program was marred by the rude and tasteless behavior of Mr. Edward Spotts. We wish to apologize for the crassness of his comments and the coarseness of his actions. They were an affront not only to the intelligence and worth of each and every member of the panel, but to that of the audience as well. We are sending a tape recording of the program to the national headquarters of the Fairness Committee in order that they know what happened and in the hope that such future occurrences can be avoided. It would be a tragedy to believe that one man destroyed the endless time and effort that went into Monday night's program.

Courtroom Is Battlefield For Tracy And Hepburn

The finest acting team in motion picture history is surely that of Spencer Tracy and Katharine Hepburn. Witty, professional and outrageously talented, they made eight beautiful films together before their partnership was ended by Spencer Tracy's death.

"Adam's Rib" is a great example of the chemistry created by these two incredible people. The basic plot of the film is probably all too-well known due to the rather sad publicity given it by the third-rate television series of the same name which had a short-lived run in the Fall of 1973. But, to reiterate, Adam and Amanda Bonner are husband and wife and, also, both lawyers. Adam is assigned a case prosecuting a lady who shot and wounded her husband when she found him in the arms of another woman. Unfortunately, Amanda (a pre-Women's Liberationist) decides to defend said lady on the grounds that society allows a man to take desperate measures to protect his home and family but does not grant a woman the same privilege. Needless to say, both households are shaken-up — almost destroyed, in fact — during the trial.

The cast reads like a list of the great screen actors and actresses — all with a strong flair for comedy. Tracy and Hepburn are incomparable in the courtroom and in more domestic settings. Judy Holliday, as Doris Attinger, the lady who shoots her husband, gives one of the first of her many outstanding screen performances. She is both touching and tough as she fights a practically lost cause for the sake of her married life and her children. Tom Ewell is equally fine as her husband who'd like to see his wife locked up because, as he sees it, she's always been crazy. Jean Hagan, in a wild and wicked role which precedes her motherly "Make Room for Daddy" bit by some years, plays the "lady" who is breaking up their home. And David Wayne is a charming, maddening and altogether adorable baby doll as the Bonner's neighbor who admits that he loves Amanda mostly because she lives right across the hall and "it's so convenient."

This screen classic will be shown in Alumni Hall on Friday, March 22, at 8:00 P.M. Admission will be $.25 without a series ticket.

by David Anddrews

The East Houses parking lots along the shores of Muddy Run have witnessed a great deal of vandalism lately. The residence coordinator had his four tires slashed. Recently, a person was found trying to siphon gasoline from a stuudent's car in the parking lot.

One might hastily attribute this behavior to a morally-derelict person and proceed to forget about it. However these particular parking lots adjacent to East Houses have no lights anywhere near them. It is exceptionally easy for a townsperson or student to do anything at all to the cars in these parking lots. Moreover, it is a hazard for a student to walk alone late at night in these parking lots.

Last year at this tiime, Student Government requested lights for the parking lots of East Houses. The administration assured Student Government would have first priority among the student requests.

When students returned in the fall, there were no lights. The College Controller informed Student Government that the lights had been placed in the budget in a categorry called "if money is available." Of course ,no money was available.

How the Administration can eschew buying a light pole for the safety of the student body is certainly a conundrum. A light pole is not a major investment that would force the closing of Juniata College

Students do understand the tight money situation that faces the school. When none of the proposed student requests for the budget were enacted, there were no demonstrations. There has been no major uprising over the absence of lights for the tennis courts and intramural fields which were also requested by students last year. The students were content to wait a year until more money was available. However, a student's tuition fee should insure a responsibility of the college's for a minimal degree of safety. It is time for the procrastination to sttop before there is serious injury A light in a parking lot is not asking a great deal.

Another Juniatian receiving the NSL seal of approval was Bruce Moyer who was named the State coordinator for Penn's Woods. Bruce is now engaged in putting together a state lobby which will attempt to safeguard the interests of students in Harrisburg. March 23 is scheduled as the date for a statewide conference meeting. The meeting plalce will be . . . Juniata College.

"Oh sure. They say that during concerts in Oller we leave beer bottles all over, and damage school property. They're really mad about it. But I think the kids'll shape up."

After muttering a few unprintable words Mark then asked why streaking was popular here.

"It's a form of escape" said my friend. "Class becomes too much of a grind, and you have to get away from reality." Soon after this he left, anxious to see whether there would be any Naked Runners.

Once we were alone my cousin exploded. "To escape from reality, he said! I've never seen people more cushioned away from the real world, to begin with. After listening to him prattling about what he considered serious matters I expected a white rabbit to walk in with spectacles and a pocket watch. Is anyone in this campus faintly aware that there happens to be a world outside?"

"I think a few may have noticed," I said.

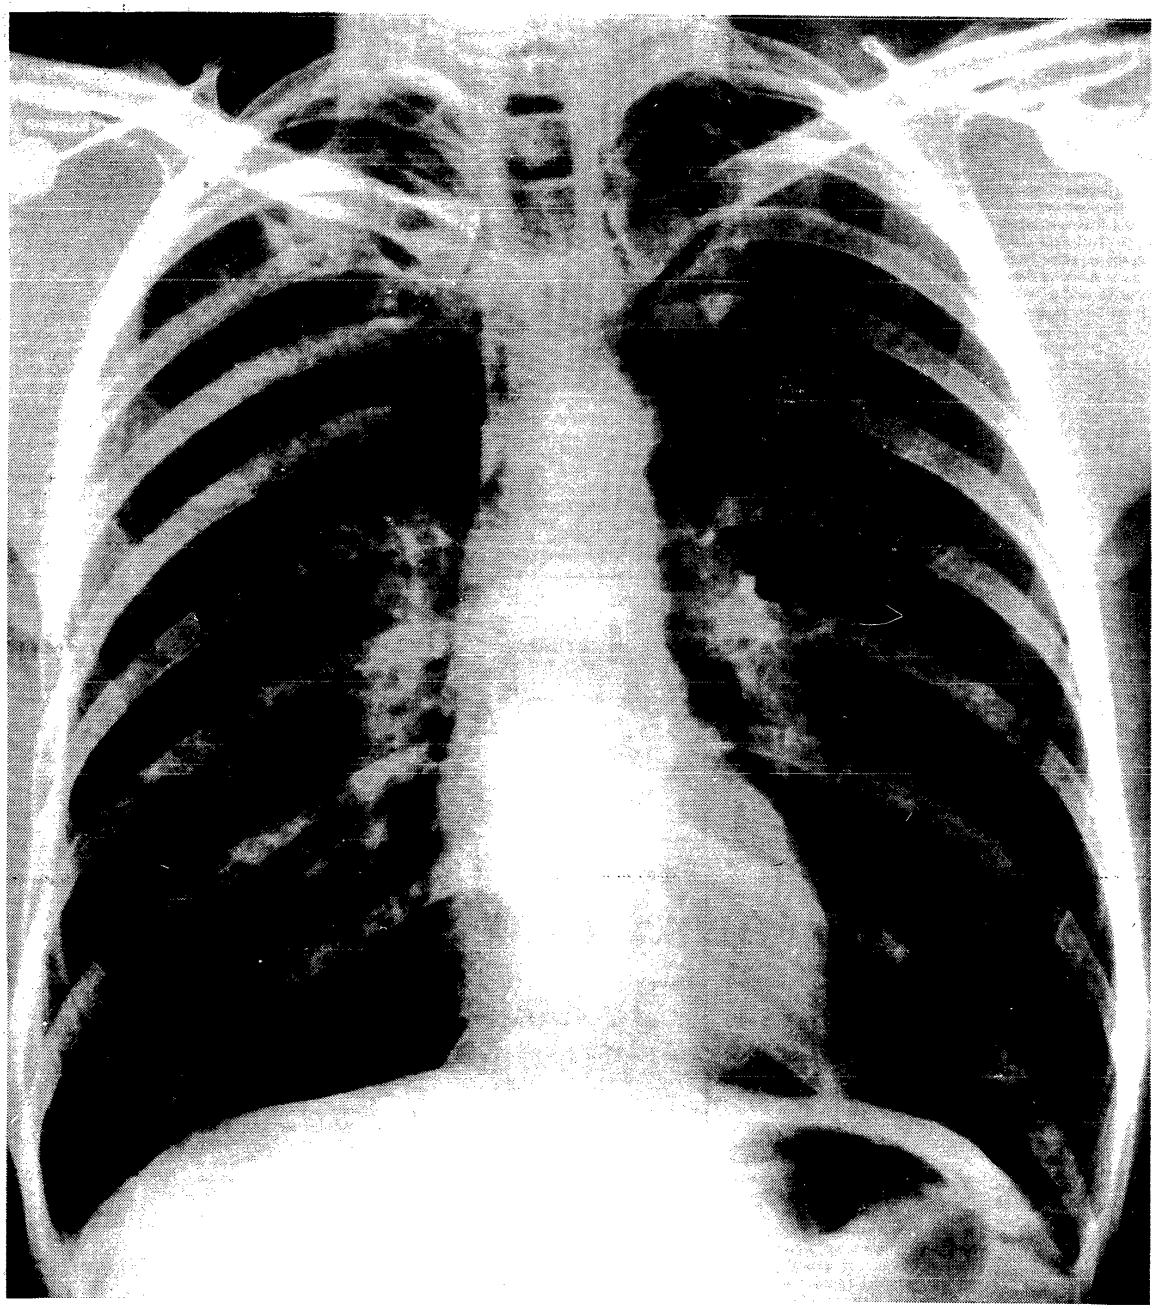
"What about the issue of the day? Are any of the students trying to get Nixon impeached?"

I told him about the panel discussion.

"I hate to say it," Mark told me, "but that speaker, disgusting and ridiculous as he was, was about all you people deserved. I'll bet half the kids on this campus can't discuss the issue any more intelligently than he did."

"Well Mark, what should we do?"

"I don't know. I'm not part of that mystical group 'the young' any more. 'Cause, cousin, I just lost my faith in the future."



If you think Kodak is just pretty pictures, you ought to have your chest examined.

When a chest x-ray shows that you have a potential killer like TB or cancer, it's not a pretty picture. But it's an important picture because it can help the doctor detect and catch the killer in time.

When doctors are out to catch these potential killers, they want the sharpest, clearest x-ray films they can get. And that's why people at Kodak spend so many hours creating new and better x-ray film equipment. Already, the results include convenience for the patient, economy for the hospital, an even more useful tool for the radiologist—and, most important, reduced radiation exposure.

Researching and creating better x-ray films is good for our business, which is why we went into them in the first place. But it does our society good, too—which isn't a bad feeling. After all, our business depends on our society—so we care what happens to it.

Kodak
More than a business.

Sports Stumpin'

I promised I would talk a lot more about Carl Meditch, the new varsity basketball coach. Meditch has been the assistant basketball coach at Ball St. University.

A graduate of DePauw University, he received his masters degree from Iowa U. in 1961. At DePauw he lettered 4 times in basketball and baseball and was named the school's most competitive athlete during his senior year.

Meditch started his coaching career at Arsenal Technical High School, Indianapolis, the largest school in the state. While at Arsenal he was quite successful with a 121-58 record over 9 years, his best year coming in 1966 when his team placed 2nd in the state tournament. His junior varsity squads at Ball State have been 30-17-1. Meditch has only suffered 1 losing season.

In announcing Meditch, Athletic Director Walt Nadzak said, "Carl will be a tremendous asset to the college. He has been an outstanding teacher, has been proven a successful coach, and is known as an excellent recruiter. I'm confident he will be a success in revitaiizing our basketball program.

"Carl was selected after a very thorough search. We felt it was important to find a man who understands our philosophy, one willing to work in a small college liberal arts atmosphere. Carl's philosophy is compatible with ours, particularly in regard to what it takes to be successful at Juniata and the MAC's."

Along with his basketball responsibilities Meditch will also coach cross country, and joins the faculty as assistant professor of physical education. He held the same faculty rank at Ball State where he taught activities programs, coordinated the golf and adapted physical education programs, and taught graduate classes in physical education for the mentally retarded.

So you have the scoop on new coach Carl Meditch. Hopefully Meditch will bring renewed spirit to the basketball team and turn them into winners.

Juniata Ice Hockey

by Eric Kiesshauer

The Ice Hockey Team has played two games thus far this year— and they are still looking for their first victory.

In their initial contest, the team tied the third place Magicians of the State College intramural league. After falling behind 2-0 early in the first period, the Juniatians roared back on goals by Howie Nathan (assisted by Mike Salzer) and a 60-foot slap shot by none other than Ken "Slap-shot" Rodger. This past Saturday, however, Coach Heberling's boys came out on the short end of a 7-2 score, against a tough, experienced team from the Williamsport area. Juniata's only goals were scored by Clark Travitz and Mike Buckwalter, while the "Loggers" of Williamsport exploded for four goals in the third period alone, to break the game open.

The Club's next game will be Monday, March 25 at 10:30, at the Penn State Ice Rink. Admission is free to all so why not ride up and see the team play? They can use the support.

JC Indians Endure Spring Training For Track Team

by Mark Bare

Juniata's track team appears very capable to repeat last year's MAC championship. The Indians led by Coach Dean Rossi feature many returning letterman as well as a promising crop of freshman. The returning letterman are led by Mike Slough, (440 220), Bob Zimmerman (pole vault), Mike Wintersteen (javenin), and Carl Koval (880). All of these athletes are present school record holders.

There are several freshmen who should help to bolster the Juniata attack. Among these are Kim Witmer (440 high jump), John Lilly (shot put), Mike Molesevick (discus), Bob Uhek (hurdles), Bary Eppley (440), Greg Ransom (mile), and John Ausheiman (2 mile).

Everything considered, Juniata seems to have a much more balanced attack than last year. The points shold be distributed over all the events. Juniata's strongest events seem to be the 440 with Slough, Bill Thompson, Witmer, and Eppley running. (This group will probably also run the mile relay), and the pole vault led by Zimmerman. Juniata has the potential to win a second straight MAC title. The team would appreciate all the supporters they can get at their meets.

phan's sabbatical leave in Munich last year.

Streicher, numbered among Hitler's few early personal friends, is described by Kipphan as "the most powerful district leader in northern Bavaria and probably the most vocal anti-Semite of the 20th century." He was executed for war crimes following the Nuremberg Trials.

Editor of "Der Stuermer," an anti-Semitic German weekly, Streicher also unified the early Nazi movement by bridging gaps between southern Bavarian and northern and central German party strongholds.

"Had it not been for Streicher and people like him," Kipphan characterizes the findings of the Nuremberg Tribunal, "the genocidal mass murders of Jews could never have occurred. One cannot just kill five or six million people without preparing the nation. Through Streicher's continual vicious propaganda, people developed an intense dislike for the Jews, and plans were willingly carried through."

Kipphan's research of Streicher's life delves deeply and close to the core. He has interviewed, and will seek further contact with, numerous contemporaries who knew Streicher personally, both as friends and as enemies. He alone among scholars has spoken with Streicher's widow, and he plans interviews with Streicher's sons.

"Much of what we read today of Streicher," Kipphan has found, "is legend blown out of proportion. It is hard for the historian to find the historical truth. We must cut through the underbrush, so to speak, to find the real man."

Pursuing such an investigation, Kipphan will speak with Dr. Friedrich Bergold, a chief defense counsel at the Nuremberg Trials; the former police president of Streicher's district, once a friend and later an enemy who helped engineer Streicher's party downfall; Streicher's 93 year-old sister; his chaffeur of 10 years, "always at the spot when major things took place;" and the administrator of the huge Streicher estate in Franconia.

For source material, Kipphan will look to the American Berlin Documents in West Berlin, the Streicher Papers in the West German Federal Archives, collections in Nuremberg — "the capital of German anti-Semitism," and police records in Munich, the Bavarian capital.

Streicher is mentioned in every major study concerning Hitler's Third Reich, yet Kipphan has found not a single biography about him. "This is amazing," Kipphan says, "in view of his influence on popular anti-Semitism. He played a significant, but as yet unknown, role in the Beer Hall Putsch, and was one of Hitler's closest friends and lieutenants during his early 'period of struggle'."

His "Der Steurmer," which he continued to edit after losing official party favor and position, reached editions of one million per week. It was displayed publicly throughout Germany so that those who could not afford the paper might be able to read it for free.

Kipphan's interest in Streicher developed while Kipphan conducted a seminar at Juniata concerning the Nuremberg Trials. The trials did not, according to Kipphan, produce a satisfactory picture of Streicher's role in the crimes. Hence his research last year while in Munich, and his plans to continue this summer.

To date, however, Kipphan has received no funding for this summer. He will, if need be, finance the research himself. "We should not overlook the urgency of the matter," he says. "Many of these sources are capable of solving the Streicher enigma, of giving us clearer insight, of providing important personal knowledge hitherto unknown. Many are old, in their 80's and 90's, and will carry this knowledge to the grave. It is most important that we do not fail our responsibility, that we find the essential man."

there's so much shoplifting. The faculty members (this should make them angry) are now in danger of losing their discount privileges because soon the college won't be able to afford them anymore. And now I hear that my job as a clerk in the bookstore is in jeopardy because certain people in the administration feel that outside help would be more apt to report shoplifters. Well, let me tell you this: I'm not afraid to report anybody and if I catch any student shoplifting, I will personally see to it that that student gets the full measure of the law. And you can take that as a threat.

Thanks for listening. I appreciate it.

Candidates Voice Opinions

Campus Politicians Prepare For Elections

STUDENT GOVERNMENT

It's the time of year when everybody's making promises again. That's right, it's time to elect the officers of Student Government. Three of us would like to announce our candidacy for the offices of President, Vice-President, and President of Dorm Government. We are running on a ticket and calling ourselves the Student Responsibility Ticket. This is a pretty lofty phrase, but we don't mean it to be empty rhetoric. We are stressing experience, team work and responsibility. The candidates are:

For President, Henry Siedzikowski. I have been in the Senate for three years, last year as the chairman of Student Concerns Sub-committee. In this position, I have worked to keep an eye on student services, such as the Food Service, and the Health Service, channeling student complaints to the proper places. I also serve on a faculty committee and helped write the new judicial structure.

For Vice-President, Cindy Schwarzfisher. Cindy has served on the Senate for two years, both on the Student Concerns Committee. She has also served on the Student Activities Council this year.

For President of Dorm Government, Ed Hinchey. Ed is a freshman who served on the Senate this year, on the Budget and Management Committee.

Compare these candidates with the others on the ballot, and you will find they have a great edge inexperience. Why is this important? Mainly because as a reesult of the money crunch, the college will likely have to make cutbacks. The students need officers who will be constantly on the lookout to protect student interests, and who have the experience to do something about it. A lot can happen when inexperienced officers are using their time learning the ropes.

Beyond these reasons, we have several positive proposals which we believe will make our candidacy attractive. In the area of student services, we are already working on a record co-op. In the area of communication with the students, we are proposing a student Senate Forum to be held once a month, where officers of the Senate and committee chairmen would make themselves available for a two hour period to answer student questions.

Also, we would like to work with the Pennsylvania Student Lobby to change the drinking age. It has become apparent that this is virtually essential if there is to be a more realistic policy on campus.

In conclusion, we feel our ticket stressing experience, teamwork and organization has the best chance of protecting student interests on campus. We also feel we have some proposals which are worth following up. So, in the next week, we will be getting around trying to talk to as many people as possible. Please don't be afraiid to stop one of us and ask questions. I think you'll be convinced we can do the best job for Juniata.

GLAESER — MESSNER

Juniata College has its assets and its problems. We wish fo indt answers to the problems that confront every student. Some basic issues that concern a majority of the students, we feel are: the lack of communication between the Senate and the student body, the social-academic atmosphere on campus, and the student buying power.

We wish to propose a student co-op, which would purchase room size refrigerators, records, books (NSA bookclub) and possibly in the future stereo equipment and room furnishing. These commodities would be sold to students at cost. This should help to alleviate some problems of day to day expenses for the student.

Before we can govern ourselves, we must educate ourselves to the issues, the people behind these issues, and the criteria for judgement on these issues. With this in mind, we feel that the decision making process for all students is being somewhat neglected. For a Senate to work properly, it must have some idea of how the student body feels about the issues. The Senate must go to the students. To take steps in this direction we first of all propose an issues desk in the lobby of Ellis Hall during dinner. The issues will be posted on the columns beside the table. The student assigned to this table will be responsible to answer all questions concerning the posted issues and also to take all of the students' opinions of any nature on the issues posted.

We propose that the Senate agenda be posted at least two days before the meeting for student input either through attending the meetisg or by voicing their feelings to their Senators. The minutes of all meetings will contain not only the distribution of votes but also how each Senator voted.

Since all student life revolves around the new curriculum concept, we feel the necessity of the immediate college community (students, administration, and faculty) to frankly discuss the assets, goals, and problems connected with it. We propose taking the necessary time, possibly cancelling classes one afternoon or however long it takes, and setting down with faculty and administration to discuss this issue and other issues students feel are important. We feel this interaction will lead first of all to better understanding of the curriculum's assets and in the long run will establish a better working relationship in the college. community.

PLATFORM OF CORDOVA

After one year's absence from Student Government, I Stephen Cordova, am returning in quest of the second most important job, Vice-President of Student Government. Exactly one year ago because of personal strife I ran into a detour, academically, politically, and athletically. I did not run for re-election to the Senate because I wanted to be at my best. I now return with the answers that I left to seek.

I am not running on a ticket because I don't believe it is up to me to indicate with whom I can serve best. I believe it is up to the electorate to make such a decision. I advocate a strong vice-presidency and a strong president which a ticket can't provide at all times. If I can serve one candidate and not another just as well, then I am not deserving of your vote. I feel strongly that I can function efficiently and effectively regardless of the outcome of the presidential race. A ticket in some cases presents two individuals with similar political thinking; I believe a rational dicersion would be in the best interest of those represented.

Platforms aren't programs, although it is pleasant to both hear and make such political profises. However, two attributes that are mine to share not only during but after the election are time and effort. I can't and won't promise full student involvement and communication that constitutes the efforts of both you and me. I can and will promise a job sedulously done and appreciation for those who believe in my cause. There are three specific goals that I would like to see fulfilled, but I will dwell on these and possibly others at a later date.

Thank you for your time,
Stephen Cordova

Foreign Exchange Student Reminisces About JC While Experiencing Europe

Courtnaye Byron Rhone
Fellow Junjatians, Faculty and Administration:

I wish to extend a very warm and hearty welcome to all at Juniata College. As I am about to embark upon my second semester at Philipps University in Marburg/Larn, West Germany, one tends to think very consciously of the place and people that were once very close to him. Having left a chronicle of friendships and personal experiences through what was once the routine college life, you find yourself readily contemplating those specific anecdotes, reminiscenses and memoirs of days gone by.

The entire educational system and European life style has indeed been a precursor of an awakeening of the self. Easing and unloading the mind, clearing and improving of one's understanding, engendering thought and knowledge, and overall, an essence of a true criterion for an individual's potentialities are quickly unleashed, some calling it latent promiscuity, others resigning themselves to what might be merely considered an enrichment of liberalness.

Having travelled to a number of countries in Europe, one senses the inner companionship of fear. Certainly, though, to let fear be an over-powering companion would mean the destruction of each individual's responsiveness to life, and the environment around him. My own motto for this year has been, "Where there is no path, I shall leave a trail." Striving to meet people without hypocrisy, artificiality and pretense, but to mingle with all people in an aura of quiet simplicity and humility. Of course, though, with an eagerness to give of one's self when the opportunity arises, and allowing a certain flexibility in one's own rigid principles, to permit the fresh expressions of change, but tactfully. of course, to avid offending a comrade in the course of mutual exchange and encounters. When the situation of exchange gets to the point of distasteful differences of opinion, one is wary of cultivating the seeds of enmity, and allowing the multitude of little resentments reach a climax that could only cause embittered enemies. For thee wrathful deformities of tthe self based on a precedence of pride is mellowed to the level in which one can part deciding that he disagrees vehemently, but can leave with a genuine appreciation, for the differences of opinion shared with another human comrade.

Continually one is faced with the awesomeness of loneliness, even when there is a multitude of people around you. Indeed, though one finds it to be a very inner loneliness which can be obliterated only through inner peace, by taking time to find the self, being very objective, not critical, and decide what is important, what is good, and what will never change. Then you know where you are, and what the options are. One lives life to

Juniatian Elected Pres. of Pennsylvania Student Lobby

Approximately 50 students attended the second meeting of the newly established Pennsylvania Student Lobby. Officers were elected to serve until May 15 when the next state lobby meeting will elect officers for the 1974-75 year. A Juniata student, Bruce Moyer, was elected President with George Givens from Duquesne University as Vice-President and Frank Murca, Penn State, as treasurer.

The State of Pennsylvania was divided into ten regions. Students from the conference will organize regional conferences for the purpose of recruiting other schools.

"The purpose of the Pennsylvan-Student Lobby is to act as a lobbying body in initiating and considering passage of legislation advantageous to students, and to serve as a source of information for all Pennsylvania higher education institutions and to act as a liason between these institutions and the state government. A second but equally important purpose is to maintain the cohesiveness of these students as a recognized viable political force." This purpose was formulated at the first meeting of the Pennsylvania Student Lobby, held at Penn State on February 9, 1974. The Conference held at Juniata was the second meeting held of this newly formed group.

Workshops were held during the conference in the areas of Student Unionism and Collective Bargaining; Financial Aid; The Student Money Crunch; Funding Higher Education in Pennsylvania; and Student Legal Rights.

Speakers for the event were Sue Rosshirt, a fellow Juniatian, who is Regional Director of the National Student Lobby; Arthur Rodbell, Executive Director of the NSA; and Bill Clamon, Director of NSA lobbying.

Wrist Wrestling

As seen on the Wide World of Sports on Television a couple of months ago, wrist wrestling is an exciting and worthwhile sport. Held in Petaluma, California, for the past several years, the world championship wrist wrestling tournament has been drawing larger and larger crowds every year.

This unique and exhilarating sport is now coming to Juniata College. An intramural wrist-wresting tournament is being held, in several weight classes, to determine our own champions at the sport. The competition is open to any student at Juniata, male or female, costs nothing to enter, and gives a chance at a championship and a cash prize yet to be determined. The competition will be held in Memorial Gym, at 7:00 Tuesday night, April 2 , for the eliminations. and the same time Wednesday night, April 3, for the finals. The eliminations should be over in time for the Human Sexual Symposium at 8:00 pm.

Entrants will be competing against another person of the same sex in their own weight class. Rules are posted on the bulletin board in the gym, and entrants may register at the information desk in Ellis Hall.

Justice

I have two complaints— one of an "is this justice?" nature and one that has no great moral backing, but seems unfair to the students who live in the dormitories.

The first complaint is the fact that the president and officers of student government receive a salary which cumulatively comes to $1000 a year. This is a considerable sum. Assuming that student government does perform a beneficial function for the student body (which I question, but there are those who would defend them), I seriously question if it is legitimate for them to pay themselves a salary when they run for office on "unselfish, altruistic" platforms. My personal cynicism aside, I could accept this practice, if it weren't for the fact that they ae rdesperately seeking ways to cut the budget. Budget cut requests to the paper, Center Board, etc., are present attempts to save money. At the beginning of this year, Steve Wentz decided to eliminate the salaries for himself and his business manager. He did this because he felt the salary was unfair when the Alfarata needed all the money it could get. The other heads of media are not paid. I feel that if student government officers are paid the heads of the media also should be paid. or else the next budget cut should be from the officer's salaries to create a just policy of this situation.

My second complaint concerns an appeal which has been made to student government time and time again, the plea for phones in the lobbies of each dormitory. The expense seems to be the obstacle. If 500 students each make one phone call in a given day, the students are spending $50 a day. It seems that the initial investment of the college for phone in the lobbies and lounges would be of great convienience for the students in the dormitories. The students who live in East Houses very convieniently have private phones installed. This is not possible in the dorms (why?), so we must keep dropping dimes in the phones sometimes to call a building 200 yards away.

Streaking?

(A comment on Rob Lopresti's article on streaking by a rather apathetic hedonist who is well imformed, fairly intelligent (I hope) but who just doesn't give a shit about some topics.)

I was talking to a large white rabbit who carried a pocket watch, the other day. For some reason he began discussing college students past and present. (How he knew about them I cannot say). He spoke of goldfish, dance marathons, telephone booths, pantie raids, jock raids, and streaking, of concerts, movies, classes, booze parties and also of what he seemed to feel were a totally different group of activities; campus riots, academic takeovers, foag and draft card burning, the "drug culture," calling out the National Guard, Kent State and the such.

Since our discussion I've come to agree with him, and feel that the wave of political apathy which has swept the college community is one of Blessed Relief. Although I thank those who fought for the end of American fighting in Viet Nam, the end of the draft, and those who pressed for 18 year old sufferage, I feel that protesting and rioting are assinine. We can be involved in government through our votes or even by running for office if we wish to.

Politics is important but it isn't the whole world! Enjoyment of life is more important so if it's cool to streak, do what you enjoy doing. Just don't riot in my school and cause it to close down. If you groove on politics, go right ahead and change the world, but without inconviencing my way of life.

Although Mark Martin provided a soul stirring, florid account of the banalities of the Juniata Campus, I was drawn nearly to the point of illness by the extent of his righteous indignation. Though touched by his wish to maintain his job, I was not sure what that had to do with the absolute moral regulations he seemed to call down from the very heavens. I thought that threats of the Fiery Furnace of Hell were passe, but Mark enlivens them to lead the sheep of J. C. back to the path of righteousness.

Along the Gutter

As I take pen in toe, I think of how I have been revolted by the letter from the alleged Mark Martin. The "letter' about which I am grumbling is an intriguing mystery to us all. What actually was he trying to expound upon in his pretentious text?

I think we who scanned the article agree magnanimously: "huh?" What passion, exclamation against wrong, although he missed motherhood and apple pie; he came out for every reason to be reasonable and just to his fellow man in a superfluous, garrulously passionate way. The preceding will evidence itself as a contradiction in writing manner, and subject matter, reason to all readers with a critically bloodshot eye. Then just when even the skeptical scanner is worked to a fever pitch, Mark makes a threat to his loving fellow man; that he is going to catch them and prosecute them. Again there is a contradiction from the generalized

New Women's Foxfire

By Jean Pollock

New Women's Foxfire, as a regular column in the Juniatian, proposes to expound the issues and aspects of existence as a woman of Western society today, with the hopes of appealing to the general interest (this most definitely including men). Having instigated the column, it is my responsibility that something worthwhile be printed each week, however I expect that this opportunity would be made much more gainful and relevant if I waive any exclusive writing priveledges and from the outset establish the invitation that anyone (this abain including Men) can submit material for the column (editorial, poetry, prose) or request that I research or discuss some particular topic; I only ask that you conform to the general issue of women as stated above.

Why? There's a big world of reality out there beyond Juniata campus and women's role in it is changing considerably. Among Juniata students there appears to be little consciousness, less knowledge, but a great deal of curious interest in this phenomenon, "The Feminist Movement". For example, in one of my classes just last week we were discussing Benthem's utility principal, the weighing of pleasures and pains. One young man offered that there are some situations where it's very difficult to evaluate pleasure and pain, for instance in the case of rape, how do you know that the woman didn't actually enjoy it at least a little? A further comment was to the effect that it's probably better that a woman being so assaulted shouldn't put up a fight and risk serious injury — if possible she should try to relax and make the best of it. We three women in the class were noticeably in insulted disagreement, but as for myself, I couldn't put my reasons into words. The discussions in the Women's Studies tutorial have hit similar rough spots, all because we've just never given much thought to what it means to be a woman and shamefully less communication among ourselves about it, although as I said, everyone appears to be interested in listening.

The prescription of the movement is consciousness raising which entails education, thought, communication and the justification of it all — living it. Oh yes, I've heard that comeback before, "With all the recent laws and amendments against sex discrimination, a woman in the U. S. can do anything she wants if she has the ability." . . . and I must add, an attorney. If the inicidence of rape is increasing and 12-year old girls have to hassle with national television just because they want to play Little League baseball, you can hardly say that it's easy for a woman to do anything she wants.

And in the end the courts will get you your job and equal salary and maternity leave (God bless them), but they can't guarantee that there

Most students on the Juniata campus seem to believe that the drinking age in Pennsylvania should be lowered to eighteen. On the other hand recent surveys have shown that less than half of the students on this campus are registered to vote. We are not justified, therefore, in asking for the lowering of the drinking age unless we exercise the power which can change this situation.

Beginning this week, the Student Government will sponsor a non-partisan voter registration drive to get students registered in Huntingdon. Transportation will be provided to the courthouse on specific days and times that will be posted on the Student Government office door.

Usually, voter registration is poor for primary elections. However, the issues that face this year's state candidates in Pennsylvania are exceptionally important to students. There are clearly discernable alternatives from which to choose. For example, Martin Mullen is running for governor on the Democratic side with a "Morality" platform of no abortions, no premarital sex and plenty of capital punishments. Incumbent Milton Shapp, on the other hand, opposes capital punishment and believes abortion is a woman's decision.

Some students will not bother to register in Huntingdon because they are registered at home. If their home is out-of-state, this gives them no voice on decisions concerning funding of higher education for Pennsylvania colleges.

In addition, if a student at Juniata is registered in another state, that state probably has already passed a lower drinking age than twenty-one. By remaining registered in his home state, he can do nothing at all about the drinking age in this state, where he or she resides nine months of the year.

Furthermore, students registered in other parts of the state could use their voting power more effectively if they voted collectively on issues like the funding for higher education and for candidates that wish to see the drinking age lowered. Scattered student votes across the state do not carry the weight that a collective movement in this area would exert. Students do have the power to help dictate who the next state legislators will be for this particular area.

Moreover, those students who are not registered anywhere have no room to "Bitch" about the drinking age or any other student-related issues. These students are just helping to prove the people right who said that students should not be given the right to vote at eighteen since they are irresponsible, apathetic, and unintelligent. It is time for students to wake up and prove these people wrong.

The winter intermurals came to an exciting close this past week with the basketball, team handball, and volleyball championships all being held this weekend.

The basketball playoffs proved to be very exciting with all 3 games being very close. In the 1st game Up & Coming, the darkhorse in the C League playoffs, pulled off quite an upset in winning the championship 31-29, beating the previously unbeaten Ratzass. In the B League championship Duke City, after knocking off Roguers 10 in the opening playoff nipped Sweet Pea's House of Ill Repute 36-34. In the A League finals Heaven came on strong in the end to overtake last years champs Wizzard, 51-39.

The next night saw the Lazy J's a 17-14 winner over Ant Hill Mob. The game was action packed and the late arrival of Jim Dacy almost turned the game over to the Mob, but it proved to be to little to late as the J's were able to to hold on, to capture championship.

In volleyball US captured the Women's finals winning in straight sets 15-4 and 15-5. Also a correction and an apology goes to the men of Dubois House, the champions in Men's volleyball. It had earlier been proclaimed that Amsterdam Bay & Goosing Co. had won. Sorry fellows. Dubois House won over Morgans in the finals 15-8 in both games.

So the winter intermurals come to a halt. All the champions should be congratulated. I would also like to encourage all to take advantage of the intermural program this spring. There are many various sports and you should find something that appeals to you. By the way look for the champions pictures next week.

Batters Prepare For Season; Scrimmage State

The baseball team is undergoing its final tune up this week against Penn State. The Indians lost 7-1 and tied 0-0 (five innings) as Penn State's Nittany Lions visited our campus Saturday, March 23 for a double header scrimmage. In the first game the Indians were victimized by some lacadazical outfield play as well as a pair of home runs.

The Indian bats were kept silent most of the afternoon. This was rather expected since, to paraphrase Coach Berrier, the pitchers that the team faced playing Penn State will most likely be the best pitchers that the team will face all year.

The Indians will play Penn State three more times before the regular season starts. The best experience is game experience and the Indians baseball team will have had a good taste of competition which can only help them in their quest for the MAC title.

won't be informal antagonisms and power games among the men and women of "low consciousness" that you work with everyday. All the blatant and subtle anti-feminist attitudes stack up into a mountain that won't be moved by laws alone, afterall, it's been how many centuries? And so the movement calls sisterhood. I know, it sounded mushy to me at first too; I was an individual and really didn't have much in common with them, women that is. Wrong. I discovered that mnost of those women out there wee walking around being individuals like me and all it takes is a little honest communication to find out that being an individual and being a woman aren't mutually exculsive; and that ther are a great many experiences, feelings, and attitudes that we women have in common; and when speaking of these things, sometimes for the first time to anyone, we aren't scorned or pitied but rather understood, helped and applauded — afterall, what are sisters for.

I submit that the first thing we have to do is get accustomed to using the word "Women". The only occasion where I've heard female Juniata students refer to themselves as women is the Women's Studies tutorial; it's always been "we girls". No, no, I don't mean that we should hang up our blue jeans and break in our high heeels. The fact is, I have not yet come up with a satisfactory operational definition of "Woman", if that's really at all possible. But as a place to start I suggest that each of us pause to consider how long she's lived, and in that time, how much she's learned, felt, and done; then judge if she's one of the girls or a young woman among other young women, answer to herself why that is the case, and share it with her sister down the hall.

The "why?" of New Women's Foxfire is consciousness raising.

I'd like to thank my special sister, Wendy Bills, for the column title.

concern for Juniata Campus to the very specific (bring in tears and violins) Mark's job. The gorgeous article made no sense at all—it was a precariously strung together style with only confusing contents.

So as not to be misunderstood by the masses the style is satire, the subject matter is comment on contradiction, style and pointlessness of the letter. One more thing: Just like Sodom and Gomorrah, Juniata Campus will be sizzling char if we don't straighten up and I dare Mark to prove me wrong!

By Alice Boomhower

Well, the big issue this week seems to be the student government elections and so it is. I think that I should preface this editorial with a comment on a decision that Student Government made about a week ago. The Student Government decided that all media expenditures should be channeled through Student Government through the voucher system. This would incorporate pretranactional approval of any expenditures of the media by the Student Government. The heads of the media on campus feel that this is a form of censorship and that it violates the constitution of the Communications Board, which the Student Government has approved. Unfortunately, there is no Supreme Court on this campus to interpret in an unbiased manner the meaning of the constitutions of various groups on campus. We as media heads, and majority of the persons serving on Communications Board feel that there should be some control over the expenditure of money, but we feel that this control should be through the Student Government. At the next Student Government meeting we plan to propose a counter-proposal which will hopefully alleviate the problem and satisfy both groups.

As far as the candidates are concerned, I feel that Carl Glaeser and Jim Messner will be the most helpful to the media, and will fight for the media's independence. The media as a total body comprises some 250 plus students, and this group represents substantial number of the students on campus. I, not as a representative of my total staff, but as an editor and a student, will support Carl and Jim.

Carl has not been a voting member of the Senate, but he has worked on many major projects, the panel for impeachment and Student Government Executive Committee. Jim has been a senator for several months, and has served the media well. He has helped the Communications Board.

the fullest and completes the self, as well as eliminating the void of loneliness.

Without giving in to the many impromptu whims that lurk about, one can nurture those changes that come about not only through the self, but others as well. One finds that it is easy to be self-confident, tolerant, kind and happy if you are truly sattisfied with yourself. On the contrary, though, it doesn't mean you never improve, but you have to know your limitations and understand them, as well as your pottentialities. One truly finds his pottentialities through this new found freedom of studying and living abroad, but of course like anything if not used with the utmost care it can be one's very own weapon of destruction, tearing down the very walls that have built one as an individual, who was once capable of distinguishing the very worth of life's pleasures, with a persistent search for completeness and an impregnable wall of continuous understanding about the world around him.

Amidst this year's many changes in and out of the U.S., and the ever-fluctuating American dollar, Europe has afforded many students studying here a rather straining, if not to be considered an extremely interesting year, as far as world affairs are concerned. For a number of us have become increasingly aware and less apathetic about the world around us. All of our firmly established ideas and sentiments have transformed life into something a lot more tangible, and less sheltered and secure as we had once found it to be. Indeed, though, it has been an invaluable aid to our inner growth and individuality.

To list and characterize each and every detail of the typical European way of life would entail an insurmountable amount of time, and in some instances, might even seem superficial to one who does not experience it for himself. So I merely say for those who wish to seek more meaning in his or her life, and who wishes to challenge greater horizons, the opportunity awaits you. One does not need to have an emphaasis either in a language, but can pursue a program in any field possible.

I'm sure that as my junior year abroad draws to an abrupt close I will leave feeling a kind of emptiness, as I conclude another chapter of my life. Certainly it will be one filled with memories that will endure forever. I, too, look forward to returning to Juniata and being a part once again of the small college atmosphere, but always keeping a place open for further adventures into new and different enrichments of life. Indeed what each individual pursues and succeeds in his own life . . . "no man can tear asunder if he would."

THE JUNIATIAN

VOL. XLVII NO. 17 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | APRIL 4, 1974

College's Student Centennial Fund To Include Enthusiastic Volunteers

Last Sunday evening, March 31, 132 Juniata students attended the "kick-off" dinner and meeting for the Centennial Fund Student Campaign. The student volunteers involved in the program, 165 in all, hope to "set the pace" for the college's Centennial Fund, designed to raise some $5 million by 1976.

The volunteers, who have coordinated a three-day effort among their peers, have sought commitments to be paid on a five-year basis following each student's graduation. Contributions received will be used to endow four scholarship funds in the name of each current class.

According to Faith Shoemaker, a member of the Resource Development Committee of the Board of Trustees, the student effort becomes the first phase of the overall Centennial campaign. No other mass appeal, such as those to be made to alumni, parents, faculty, friends, foundations, trustees, or the church, has been made prior to the effort organized by the students.

The third and final portion of Juniata's "Margin of Difference" program begun in 1968, the Centennial Fund is an effort to secure some $5 million to strengthen the college's capacity to provide a sound liberal arts education. The first two phases, raising $5.3 million, funded Ellis Hall, increased Juniata's endowment, and provided funds for general educational advance.

Among the more urgent needs to be met by the current Centennial is that for additional scholarships and loan funds, the goal of the student effort. Also needed is funding for expanded cultural events and opportunities, visiting lectureships and professorships, and additional library support.

According to the Centennial Fund Student Committee brochure, an endowment fund is established for the purpose of generating income by means of interest. The principal of the endowment itself is not touched, while the interest is applied to current needs and projects. "Each year the costs of education continue to rise. Without a substantial endowment, these cost increases must be passed directly to the students, by means of tuition and fees, or more contribution income must be generated. The increased endowment funds will provide support to help make up the difference between increased costs and revenue generated by tuition and fees. Thus, endowment funds will help keep costs to students reasonable, and at the same time help improve the quality of Juniata education."

The Centennial Fund Student Committee, comprised of leaders representing each class within the group of volunteers, is working in consultation with development personnel.

Ben Jonson's "Alchemist" Enacted By Masque Club

In an effort to revive the Masque Club, Sue Schuldiner is presenting "The Alchemist" this weekend in the mini-stage. Ms. Schuldiner, director of the play, feels that many Juniata students have not been exposed to Elizabethan drama very often, and that this play is a very good example of the British theatre of the 15th and 16th centuries.

The story line revolves around a servant, Face (played by Nathan Wagner) who is left in charge of the household when his master leaves London to escape the Plague. Face invites two of his friends, Subtle and Dol-Common (played by David Heberling and Jo Ann Cutillo) to stay with him. The trio set up various con games to make money any way they can, not the least of which is the alchemist's trick of turning stone into gold. Various victims come and go throughout the play, but unexpectedly the master of the house, Lovewit (played by Don Lyman returns to find the scheming of his servants.

This comedy was written by Ben Jonson and first performed in the Globe theatre. It is generally considered to be one of his better plays.

The Masque group will present their performance at 8:15 p.m. at the mini-stage on Thursday, April 4, Saturday, April 6, and Sunday, April 7. There will be no charge for the performance, but no one will be admitted after the play begins. This is because the actors will be using the same entrance as the audience, so get there early, and don't miss a thing.

Nathan Wagner and Leslie Crabtree work on "The Alchemist".

JC Proudly Announces Acclaimed Basso Artist

Five pieces, including works by Verdi, Ibert and Purcell, will be featured in Gary Kendall's recital Thursday night, April 4, at Juniata College.

Kendall, praised throughout the nation for his basso voice, will offer Philip's recitative and aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos;" Purcell's "Lord What is Man?", arranged by Benjamin Britten; Ibert's "Chansons de Don Quichotte;" Hugo Wolf's "Michelangelo Leider;" and Three Shakenspearean Songs, set by Roger Quilter.

A three-day artist-in-residence at Juniata, Kendall will appear through the Edith B. Wertz Visiting Artist Series of the Humanities. His recital is scheduled for 8:15 p.m. in the Ellis Hall Ballroom on campus.

In addition to the recital, Kendall spoke at a Tuesday luncheon of the Rotary Club of Huntingdon. He also speaks Wednesday on the Jo McMeen Show on WHUN Radio.

While at Juniata, Kendall is lecturing to various student groupings, including master classes in music.

In appearances throughout the United States and Canada, Kendall has been lauded for "vigor and thrust," "ease and sonority," "dramatic impact," and "creative and believable" acting. His operatic acting and his operatic roles, numbering more than 20, include Figaro, in the Marriage of Figaro, Mephistopheles, in Faust, and Don Basilio, in the Barbar of Seville.

A reception for Kendall, also in the Ellis Hall Ballroom, will follow his recital.

Culture and Lit. of Russia Offered in Summer School

Juniata College will offer two summer courses in Russian culture and literature, taught by George T. Dolnikowski, a native of the Soviet Union.

The courses are entitled "Aspects of American and Russian Culture" and "Freedom and Happiness in Russian Literature of the 19th Century."

Both are being offered by the Humanities Division of the college in the second summer session, June 24 to Aug. 2. Classes meet for an hour and 45 minutes five days a week.

Tuition is $175 for each course, providing 3.5 semester hours of credit. The summer session is open to area residents, including qualified high school students.

"Aspects of American and Russian Culture" is a comparative course dealing with similarities and differences in the historical trends and cultural characteristics of the two most powerful nations in the world. Among the subjects to be discussed are the economic and political structures, dominant religions, and artistic contributions of the two countries.

Dolnikowski noted that the people of Russia and America know very little about each other. In the course, he plans "to expose the students to the material" and to encourage them to draw their own conclusions.

Authors to be studied in the course entitled "Freedom and Happiness in Russian Literature of the 19th Century" are Pushkin, Gogol Turgenev, Dostoevsky, Tolstoy, Chernyshevsky and Chekhov. Dolnikowski said the theme of freedom and happiness is prevalent in much of the Russian literature of the last century, but that the Russian conception of freedom is quite different than the American. For example, Gogol said man could be happy only if he freed himself from the domination of material possessions and Turgenev described freedom and happiness as temporary illusions, but added that life would be unbearable without them.

An associate professor of Russian and German at Juniata, Dolnikowski was reared in Russia and studied at the Foreign Language Institutes of Voronezh and Moscow. He served in the Soviet Army as a German interpreter during World War II.

Wounded and captured, he spent part of the war in a prison camp in Germany and then came to the United States, with the help of the Church of the Brethren, as a displaced person. Barely able to speak English, he entered Juniata as a part-time student and to help pay his expenses he worked as a part-time janitor.

Within four years, he had earned both his bachelor's degree in history at Juniata and a master's degree in Germanic literature at the University of Pennsylvania. In addition, he did further graduate work at Middlebury College and Harvard University. He has been a member of the Juniata faculty since 1954.

"Aspects of American and Russian Culture" will meet at 8 a.m. and "Freedom and Happiness in Russian Literature of the 19th Century" meets at noon.

A total of 42 courses will be offered during the two Summer Sessions at Juniata, June 3-21 and June 24 to Aug. 2. Requests for additional information may be directed to Dr. Donald T. Hartman, director of the Summer Sessions. Students are encouraged to register in advance.

Manuscript Ed. Gives Collection To JC Library

Juniata College has been given the entire private library of the late Elisabeth Shoemaker of New York City, consisting of some 8,200 hardbound and paperback volumes on a wide range of subjects.

Miss Shoemaker, a manuscript editor for 17 years with the Columbia University Press, was reared in Waynesboro, Pa., and graduated from Juniata in 1936. Before she settled in New York in 1950, she also was employed for a time in the Juniata library, the Mifflin County library in Lewistown and the Middlebury (Vt.) College library.

Robert G. Sabin, director of libraries at Juniata, called her collection "one of the finest personal libraries I have ever seen." Sabin also said the collection was "extremely rich in Oriental art, literature and philosophy" and that this portion of it "will fill a real void" in the library holdings of the college.

In addition, Miss Shoemaker's collection included the complete works of the famous Swiss pioneer in psychoanalysis, Carl Jung, and a number of books about him; many novels by women authors such as Virginia Woolf, Willa Cather, Edna St. Vincent Millay, Eudora Welty, Katharine Mansfield and Katherine Anne Porter; pictorial books of New York City; books on Greek, Chinese and Egyptian mythology; a complete set of "The Golden Bough," a multi-volume work on primative religions, and 361 of the finely bound and attractively printed Heritage Press books containing classic works of literature and philosophy.

A number of the books were autographed and contained personal notes from widely known authors whose work she had helped to prepare for publication. Her correspondence with the authors also is included in the collection. She exchanged letters for years with the late Welsh poet, philosopher and novelist, John Cowper Powys. On one occasion, Powys wrote: "My dear Friend—How proud you make an old author by enquiring so seriously and sincerely about his books!"

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to the article "Advisor System Studied, Found Lacking' by Dave Baer (Juniatian, March 14). Although I by no means want to sound as though I think that the advisor system, or any aspect of the new curriculum for that matter, is completely without fault, I do find Mr. Baer's article disturbing. Given that a grievance is significant, for criticism to be constructive, I think, careful consideration must be given in determining both who is to blame, and what can be done about it. I think that the article failed in both respects.

Mr. Baer's first point is that, in his observation, students do not take their decision of faculty advisors seriously, and I imagine this is true. Just out of high school (usually a very highly structured system), most freshmen have virtually no idea what a faculty advisor is supposed to do (not do they have any idea what they want them to do). However I see no real way of getting around this problem; it merely points to a lack of experience. The freshman seminar is intended to help, and at its very worst it lets a student know whom she does not want as her advisor. So, the situation is one in which one must pick first and then see what happens; but one is not forever bound by this decision — we all can change our minds. Naturally, it is going to take time and effort on the part of both the student and the professor if a truely productive relationship is to develop. But that is the point: it must be developed; it cannot be given.

The complaint that the second advisor merely "assumes the function of a rubber stamp" is well taken. On the other hand, I am not sure that the system is to blame. First of all, it is likely that a student will eventually see her Program of Emphasis advisor better suited to her interests. And, particularly, if one is planning "to be" something as a result of one's four years here (a teacher or a medical student, for example), then there are certain courses that one virtually has to take (the story about the Education Dept. apparently is true; that's a whole thing in itself!). Secondly, as for interaction between the two advisors: first, I think that Mr. Baer is making rather unfair demands on the time of the faculty members, and, secondly, I think that resolving the two "opposing" forces is the student's job, not the advisors'. Isn't that what the whole program is about in the first place? Assuming that the two advisors could work out all the conflicts involved (which I most seriously doubt), I think that such a situation would threaten the student's freedom more than help her; that could turn into the biggest con job ever.

At any rate, I think that Mr. Baer has a knack for stating possibly real and considerable grievances and, in his handling of them, putting to an end any serious attempts at finding solutions. He says "in the name of freedom" as though it were a deity word. The New Program is designed to put greater responsibility on the student in deciding the course of her education. Sometimes, on the part of the faculty,

New Women's Foxfire*

by Jean Pollock

With our traditional May Day celebrations only a month away, I'm printing the following discussion in hopes that it is not too late to have some affect on the planning of this season's festivities.

The highlight of the May Day breakfast and kickoff for the weekend carnival is the announcement of the May Queen, Court, and Prince Charming. A simple glance back into the Juniata heritage shows of the unfortunate but very definite disintegration of the May Day tradition. There was a time when the women students wove the Maypole dance on the lawn in front of Oller Hall as the Queen, Court, and Prince Charming were being crowned on the steps there, who later reigned over the semiformal dance and carnival from a large platform and throne. As a witness to the past two May Day celebrations, I've observed a very different spirit. Although the breakfast is well attended and enjoyed, there is little celebration of the elected May Court; this is evidenced not only by the lack of the formalities of Oller lawn ceremony and the semiformal, but more importantly by the contrasting attitude of ambivalence toward the elections. Some nominees are noticeably undecided as to whether to be honored or embarrassed; I'm told that last year seven individuals flatly declined nomination; only 300 odd students in total bothered to vote in the comparable elections held this past fall for Homecoming Court; and in a casual conversation, one of the administrative secretaries who has attended several recent May Day breakfasts mentioned to me that she'd had a good time but, "I always wondered what exactly it was all about." Of course Juniata is not alone with this phenomenon, a year or two ago University of Delaware's homecoming queen was a chicken (not a chickie).

Some would be quick to blame it all on general student apathy, but to be embarrassed is evidence of at least a negative value, not indifference. And so I'd rather attribute it to changing times, attitudes, and values with which some of our social institutions have failed to keep pace so that what we have is a ritual empty of relevant and valued principles.

If May Day is to be salvaged it is firstly necessary to diagnose its ills. The most obvious drawback is that we can't point to any explicit criteria or purpose for these elections, but by analyzing the structure of the choosing process I would judge that the traditional principle behind the May Day selections is to identify and honor feminine beauty and disposition as it is appealing to men. The obvious evidence to this last clause is that in the past, nominations have always been made by Men's House. This is a clear institutionalization of the traditional sex role stereotypes whereby men are considered the rightful judges of feminity, because the ideal woman pleases men and competes with other women to do so. These distinctions are all vice versa in regards to Prince Charming nominees who were always chosen by Women's House. Juniata students have already expressed their devaluation of these stereotypes by having combined Women's and Men's Houses into one governing body; I assume that the nominating committee this year will likewise be composed equally of women and men, although I fear the old ideology won't be so easily forgotten.

The fact that physical appearance has been a major factor in the nomination and election of Court members is evidenced by the disproportionate number of "beauties" in the yearbook pictures, by the fact that the pictures are displayed during the voting (and the candidates aren't wearing jeans), and by the fact that the pictures are used as a basis for decision especially when the candidate is not known personally (as is the admitted dilemma of many freshmen). I suggest that physical attractiveness be completely eliminated as a criterion for selection, after all, I think we are coming to realize that to commend an individual for their particular biological endowment is equivalent to picking the winning gene combination. It's only important that the individual be endowed enough one way or the other to determine if he/she is eligible for Queen or Prince.

Traditionally, feminine disposition or "personality" has meant cordiality and poise. Certainly these are desirable qualities and a nice person with a sense of humor is harmless enough; but these traits are understood on first impression and if second and third impressions show there to be little else to the individual's character, she is hardly more than a decorative china doll or a well-bred poodle. Today's women aren't content with sitting pretty; we insist on having more definite and positive affect on the world around us. Given this value discrepancy it's not surprising that some modern women are embarrassed or disgusted with May Day. As Dr. Wright would be quick to agree, there is a lot more to personality besides cordiality and poise, at least our May Day selections should consider a good deal more, after all, Juniata is a liberal arts college, not a finishing school.

Although there have been a few informal attempts to bridge this value gap (I note that last election, voters were requested to consider also what the candidates have done for the school), I think we should quit slopping around and formally update the ritual so that it meaningfully represents the personal qualities we as women value and hold up as ideal today. I suggest that the following criteria be considered for adoption as the formal bases for nomination and election of our May Day women and men: (1) carry over the traditional criterion of cordiality and poise; (2) personal competence and achievement (be it musical, atheletic, academic, artistic, etc.) with a liberal, well-rounded background; (3) responsible self-determination and autonomy; (4) service to the community and/or college. No, it's not asking too much; we've all expected to measure up to a minimum standard of these criteria by the time we graduate from this institution—May Day elections are only assuming that some of us are a little ahead of others. In fact, I calculate that if the above are taken as principles, eligibility will be opened up to many more women that when judgement was formally based on popularity and appearance. Besides, it's much easier to improve upon your character than it is your appearance or "reputation".

The major objection I've encountered to this plan is that we will end up with only "brains" on the court. (What a pity that would be.) I assure you that there was no intention of bringing grade point averages into the picture; if an individual's particular talent happens to be academic, his/her abilities should speak for themselves through their affects (actions speak louder than grade points?) Further, there is no inherent system of priority in these four criteria as listed above; it is left to the discretion of each student to vote in accordance with his own value system as to whether service is more important than autonomy, etc.

These changes in principle naturally imply a few changes in our mechanism. As I said before, the nominating committee should be

by Brad Rudy

On the night of February 13, 1945, the city of Dresden was destroyed by a fire storm created by the United States Air Force. Dresden was an undefended German city with little or no military significance. 135,000 people lost their lives as opposed to the 71,000 killed at Hiroshima. Kurt Vonnegut, Jr. was a prisoner-of-war there at the time and was one of the few survivors. In all his novels up to and including Slaughterhouse-5, he attempted to reconcile this attack with the moral and ethical claims of a human society.

S-5 is the only novel in which Vonnegut addresses the Dresden question directly, but I'm not really sure if he succeeds in answering it adequately (or for that matter, whether he evens attempts to answer it adequately). In it, he creates an "Everyman" character who survives Dresden, lives into middle-age, middle-class suburbia, and eventually fantasizes a life on an alien planet with a blue-movie actress. But his attitudes towards his character are extremely ambiguous, especially as regards his sanity:

"Listen:

Billy Pilgrim has come unstuck in time.

. . . He has seen his birth and death many times, he says, and pays random visits to all the events inbetween.

He says."

Billy is essentially a dull, lifeless, almost unlikeable figure. Even his sexual fantasies are standard blah: His "outer space home" is furnished with the latest from Sears & Roebucks and he doesn't engage in the wild sexuality evident in your standard fantasy, but settles down and starts a family with his dream girl.

It is through this "fantasy" that Billy gets all the "answers." As he is "unstuck in time" (a purely psychological aberration) his future affects his present but only with a sense of indifference, as opposed to say the helplessness Emily feels in Wilder's Our Town. His "mentors" explain the uselessness of grieving over dead people, as they are alive and happy in some other time. They tell him not to get upset over Dresden as they have seen the end

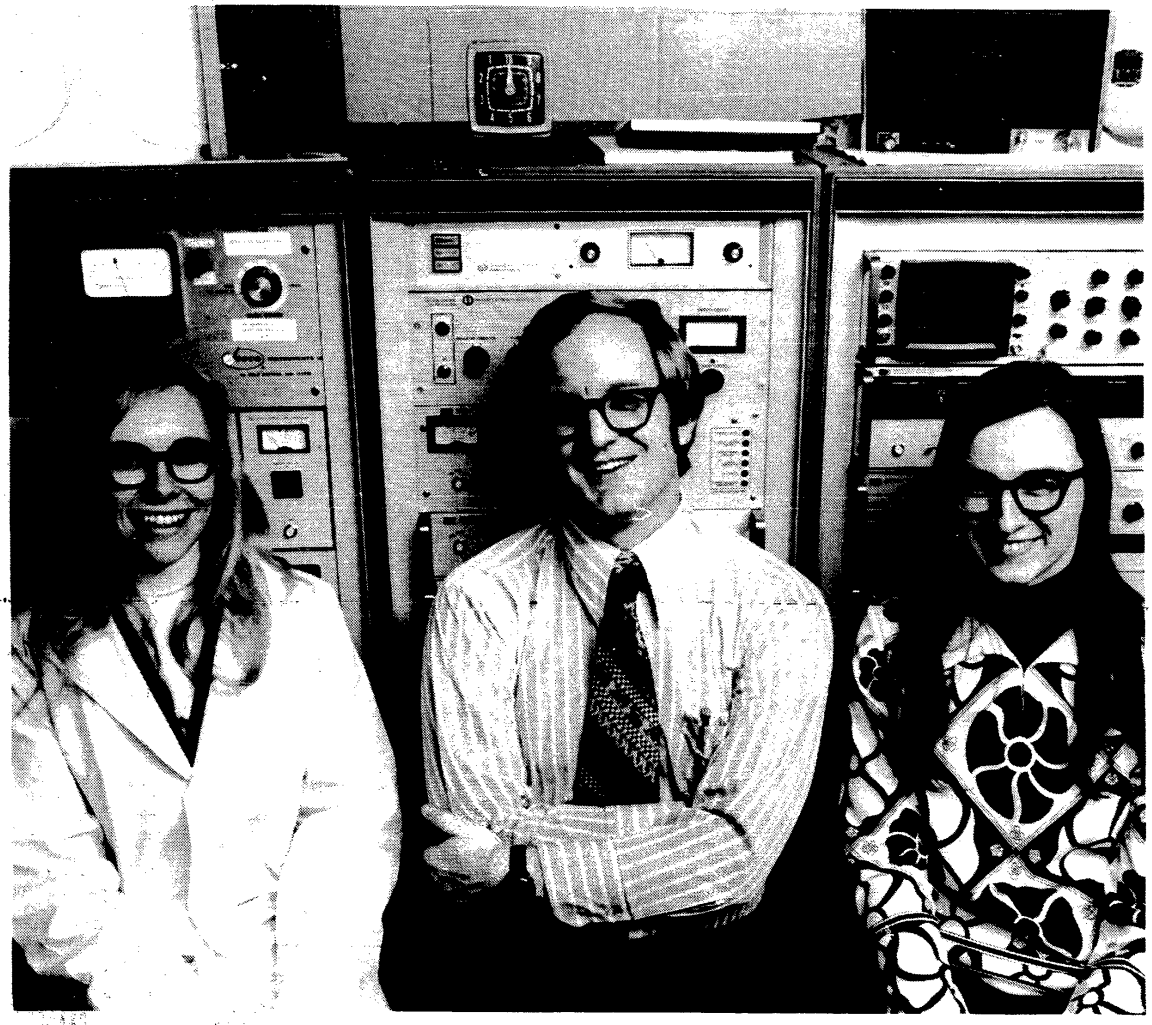
VOL. XLVII NO. 17 — APRIL 4, 1974

When we hired these researchers, we invited them to raise more questions than they answered.



Making your mark in business used to mean carving a comfortable niche for yourself and staying there. Promotion was simply a matter of time, provided you could spend 20 years in the process. But, today, business depends on technology. Technology that can't wait a moment if it's going to keep pace with what's happening.

That's why, at Kodak, our basic reliance on scientific research makes the need for creative young minds more demanding than ever. We must have people with drive and ambition, impatient to put what they've learned into practice. People who get all the freedom and responsibility they can handle, and tackle our problems with their ideas.

Which, we're happy to say, has helped many of our scientists yield important discoveries. For example:

The woman on the left has devised new and improved photographic materials for specialized scientific applications in fields such as astronomy and holography. The young man is an expert on surface analysis. His work in photoelectron spectroscopy helps to identify unknown substances. The woman on the right has a dual background in gas chromatography and trace metal analysis, which she's applied to analyzing pollution in rivers and streams.

They came up with new problems while solving some of our old ones. But they've uncovered some promising answers, too. As they continue their research, you may read about them again. The oldest is just over 30.

Why do we give young men and women so much room to test their ideas? Because good ideas often lead to better products. Which are good for business. And we're in business to make a profit. But in furthering our own business interests, we also further society's interests. Which makes good sense.

After all, our business depends on society. So we care what happens to it.

Sports Stumpin'

This week the Spring Sports swing into full tilt, with the prospects very bright. At the head of the list is the Track team which promises a strong showing and a real shot at MAC honors. This past Saturday several Indians participated in the Penn State Invitational. Although conditions were not very good the team ran exceptionally well and appears to be in good shape for its opening Monday, April 1st against Shippensburg. Juniata then takes on Gettysburg here Saturday and then will face its 1st MAC opponent Delaware Valley, on Wednesday, April 10. Leading the Indians are 7 of last years top 10 dual meet scorers. They include co-captian Bob Zimmerman, pole vault record holder, Mike Slough, 440 record holder, and Carl Koval, 880 record holder. Along with these and many other veterans, a good crop of freshman should aid Coach Dean Rossi in his quest for a 2nd consecutive MAC championship.

Baseball also gets underway this week, weather permiting, when the Indians travel to take on Frostburg State in a doubleheader. With 5 of its biggest games this year lined up in as many days the Indians will be tested early. After the doubleheader at Frostburg the Indians return home to face Shippensburg, Friday and then hit the road for another doubleheader Saturday against Scranton. All 3 opponents, along with the Indians earned postseason tournment bids last year.

The Indians seem to have a good mixture of veterans along with a fine crop of freshman. Leaders from last year include pitchers Mark Amatucci, Lou Eckerl and Jim Slovick, along with the MAC's leading hitter Tom Streightiff and seniors Criag Polardy and Mike McNeal. These veterans along with the freshman should help Coach Bill Berrier at least match last years product. If the team can handle the 1st week it should be well on its way to another fine season.

Also Tennis swings into action this week. Led by Gavin Ford and Andy Vonderheyde the team hopes to improve over last years record. Tuesday the team opens against Lock Haven and then plays Gettysburg Saturday, April 6. The tennis team opens its MAC season Tuesday, April 9, away at Dickinson and then travels to Susquehanna for another key MAC match.

The prospects look bright for the teams this spring and with a little encouragement from the fans we may just have another winner here at Juniata. So get out in the sun, or whatever and give the team a little support.

composed equally of men and women, or perhaps proportioned in favor of women since there are more women than men to be nominated. If appearance is to be discounted as a factor in the voting, it is only reasonable that pictures not be present during the elections but rather, withheld from publicity until after the voting. In place of pictures, it would be wise to substitute posted resumes of each candidate's characteristics and accomplishments according to the new criteria. Several people have suggested to me that in order to make the voting more responsible each student should vote only on the representatives from his class, this would leave the choice of court representatives up to the people who presumably would know them best, their own classmates. An ever more progressive alternative would be to have only women vote for the women and men for the men; this being a more explicit expression of the new consciousness. It would be very nice indeed if we could open the breakfast up to men but practically speaking, there just isn't enough room. (Why don't yo gentlemen organize your own?) M last suggestion is that perhaps th men of the J-Club would like t share their privileged duty of se ving the breakfast with the othe college men who have applie themselves in areas other than in ter-collegiate atheletics.

The flowers, music, and sororit of May Day breakfast is a high light in the lives of all campu women, and I expect that thes changes can only add to our cele bration of femininity. How refresh ing it would be to see Juniat women bloom a new flower thi May.

of the world and this is just a spark compared with that final holocaust: To show this indifference on Billy's part, but reveal his own helplessness, Vonnegut uses the expression "so it goes:" Billy's wife dies. So it goes. His friend Edgar Derby dies. So it goes. The water lies in dead puddles in the rubble. So it goes. 135,000 people get burned to death. So it goes. Get the picture? In the film, director George Roy Hill shows the same ambiguity with his subtle montage of segments of Billy's life and the narration of the "aliens." I suppose, then, the final reconciliation comes to Billy and only to Billy. But Billy is mad. Or is he? His fantasies are made to look real, I think they are fantasies. You may not. So, I suppose the final answer to Dresden comes within the individual, and for it to come, the individual must go mad. So it goes.

The film Slaughterhouse-5 will be shown in Oller Hall, Friday, April 5 at 8:00 P.M. Admission is $1.00 (sorry, inflation, you know). Come and enjoy.

THE JUNIATIAN

VOL. XLVII NO. 18 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | APRIL 26, 1974

New Offerings: Peace and Conflict Studies on Next Year's Schedules

Next Fall, Juniata will join a growing number of colleges and universities that are making the study of peace and conflict resolution an integral part of higher education curriculum. Several courses to be offered in the academic year 1974-75 will be listed under peace and conflict studies. Dr. Kihl's course "Violence and the Political Order" will be concerned with an analysis of the phenomena of violence in politics with a view to its forms, causes, uses and consequences. In Dr. Da Silva's course "International Politics" the student will be exposed to such issues as nuclear deterrence, arms control, disarmament, international trade, aid and development, and problems of regional integration. Dr. Kipphan's research seminar on "The Trials of the Major Nazi War Criminals" will review the historical evolution of the "Laws of War", their reflection in the London Charter of 1945 and their application upon the defeated Nazi leadership at the end of the Second World War. Independent studies on the subject of peace and conflict can also be arranged with Dr. Heberling.

In addition to these, a course entitled "Introduction to Peace Studies" is being coordinated by Dr. Martin Clark and the Rev. Andrew Murray with special assistance from Dr. Young Kihl. It will emphasize an interdisciplinary approach to peace studies drawing input from the areas of biology, anthropology, sociology, psychology, political science and education. Besides the coordinators, special lecturers for the course will include Professors Kihl, Heberling, Gooch, Dolnikowski and Harrison. Chris Moore, a Juniata alumnus ('69) now working full-time as an educator for non-violent social change, will also be helping with the study. Students should gain from the course a familiarity with the main displinary fields that are currently engaged in peace research, some of the concepts, ideas, techniques and data that are involved, and some of the questions that have to be faced in each area of study. There will also be an opportunity for each student to conceive, develop and defend a proposal for research or a plan of action that might help to make peace more probable. Besides lectures and discussion, the course will also make use of films, simulation games and psycho-drama as learning techniques.

The class will meet Monday through Friday at 3:00 p.m. the Fall term of 1974. There are no prerequisites. The course will be listed among the Socology offerings.

Chuck Knox of LA Rams Wins Achievement Award

Chuck Knox, head coach of the Los Angeles Rams and consensus selection as professional football coach of the year, is the 1973-74 winner of Juniata College's National Alumni Association Achievement Award.

The award will be presented to Knox, a 1954 graduate of Juniata, at the college's annual all-sports banquet Sunday evening, May 12. The banquet is being dedicated to Knox this year and he'll be the main speaker.

Los Angeles posted a 12-2 record last fall in Knox's first season as a head coach in the National Football League. He was named coach of the year by the AP, UPI, Pro Football Weekly, the Pro Football Writers Association and the Touchdown Club of Washington, D.C., among others.

The UPI story announcing the selection of Knox for its award noted that he had received 30 of the 39 votes cast by a panel of sportswriters in NFL cities and also pointed out that he "could have a shot of matching Don Shula's record of 105 victories in his first decade as a head coach." In addition, the story pointed out that Shula, who guided Miami to back-to-back Super Bowl championships during the past two years, won eight and lost six in his initial season.

Knox was selected for Juniata's annual alumni achievement award by a committee of the Alumni Council. Last year's winner was Charles C. Ellis of the class of 1940, senior vice president for finance of RCA.

As an undergraduate, Knox studied history and political science and maintained a "B" average. He weighed only 180 pounds, but was a starting tackle and co-captain of Juniata's first undefeated team in 1953.

He stuck around for a year after his graduation, serving as an assistant coach under Bob Hicks. They led Juniata to an 8-0 record in 1954.

Juniata also had an outstanding team last fall. The Indians, now coached by Denison University graduate Walt Nadzak, had a 9-1 record on regularly scheduled competition and then defeated the University of Bridgeport 35-14 in the NCAA Division III Eastern Regional title game. However, they lost to Wittenberg 41-0 in the Division III national finals, the Amos Alonzo Stagg Bowl at Phenix City, Ala.

In addition, Knox met his wife, the former Shirley Rhine of Huntingdon, while he was at Juniata. They now have three daughters and a son.

He spent another year as an assistant coach at nearby Tyrone High School, three seasons as head coach at Ellwood City (Pa.) High, two years on the staff at Wake Forest University and two more at the University of Kentucky before he landed his first job in the NFL with the New York Jets.

While he was with the Jets, Knox helped to sign fellow Western Pennsylvanian Joe Namath for an estimated $400,000 in cash and other benfits. At the time, it was the largest financial package ever offered to an athlete. Knox also was credited with developing the offensive line which did an outstanding job protecting the brittle-kneed Namath.

Knox stayed with the Jets for four seasons and then moved to Detroit where he was an aide to the Lions' Joe Schmidt for six years. Schmidt resigned after the 1972 season, but the Lions didn't offer the head job to Knox and he headed west to Los Angeles.

Rams' owner Carroll Rosenbloom later described how he had hired Knox.

"We flew him (Knox) out from Detroit five different times and he convinced me more each time," Rosenbloom said.

Rosenbloom said Knox kept insisting: "I can win for you."

New Privileges Allowed During Year Abroad

Academic Year Abroad, the foremost educational service organization to provide individualized study programs in Paris and Madrid, has announced radically new patterns of participation. This change is in response to the demands of college students today for greater independence.

Up till now college students and selected pre-college students who were accepted for a year or semester abroad paid a single fee which covered tuition, housing and activities. Beginning with the Fall term, 1974, college students may now choose what services they wish from A.Y.A. Heretofore they were obliged to live in French or Spanish homes; henceforth they may live where they wish—in an apartment or in a dorm or in a home. Up until now the A.Y.A. fee included an extensive extracurricular program which included cooking, wine-testing, culture along with theatre, concert and opera, all paid from the AYA unit fee. From now on the participant may opt for:

1) the basic fee covering tuition, and recommendations;
2) Basic plus housing, i.e., with room and board;
3) Basic plus activities, i.e., with the extracurriculars; or
4) the full program; with a range in cost for a year from $1,000. to $3,950. Further information is available from the Registrar, Academic Year Abroad, 221 East 50th Street, N.Y.C., N. Y. 10022

Mini Course in Income Taxes given this Summer

Juniata College will offer a three-week summer "mini-course" designed to help the average taxpayer understand some of the federal income tax.

The course will meet on Tuesday and Thursday evenings during the First Session (June 3-21) of Juniata's 1974 summer program. John J. Jarzab, instructor in economics and business administration, will teach the non-credit offering.

Designed by the Department of Economics and Business Administration at Juniata, in cooperation with the Internal Revenue Service, the course has two main segments, the first of which focuses on information needed for preparing individual returns.

Topics to be covered in this segment include gross income, adjustments to gross income and deductions from adjusted gross income. Among specific deductions examined will be standard deductions, medical costs, taxes, charitable contributions, interest payments, casualty or theft losses, and child or dependent care expense.

The second half of the course will examine areas of capital gains, rental, retirement and annuity incomes and income averaging. If there is sufficient time and the students are interested, estate and trust planning also may be discussed. Still another possible topic is tax control for small businesses.

Jarzab joined the Juniata faculty last fall. A graduate of Alliance College, he earned his master of business administration degree at the University of Pittsburgh, concentrating in accounting and finance. He received his teaching certification from Clarion State College.

Inquiries concerning summer courses at Juniata may be directed to Dr. Donald T. Hartman, director of the Summer Sessions and associate academic dean.

Zimmerer Elected Regional Pres. of Microbiologists

Dr. Robert P. Zimmerer, associate professor of biology at Juniata College, was recently elected president of the Allegheny Branch, American Society for Microbiology.

Covering western Pennsylvania and eastern West Virginia, the Allegheny Branch includes microbiologists from the University of West Virginia, the University of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania State University, Hershey Medical Center and other institutions and industries throughout the region.

Dr. Zimmerer, a consultant in microbiology at J. C. Blair Memorial Hospital, has held a number of research, teaching and consulting positions in the field, including work with the U.S. Department of Agriculture in Washington, D.C.

He chaired the spring meeting of the Allegheny Branch, ASM, held last April on the Juniata campus. He also chaired a discussion section of the 24th meeting of the American Institute of Biological Sciences, also last April, at the University of Massachusetts.

The author of many papers, Zimmerer received his Ph.D. from the Pennsylvania State University in 1966. His master's degree in plant physiology is from Cornell University, 1961, and his bachelor's degree in botany is from the University of Wisconsin, 1954.

Zimmerer is a member of the American Society of Plant Physiologists, and the Pennsylvania Academy of Science.

Graphics Shown At Shoemaker During April

Paintings and graphics by Helen Gerardia, winner of more than 50 awards for her work, will be on display during all of April in the Shoemaker Galleries, Juniata College.

Working with simple, hard-edged geometric shapes, primarily in black and white, Ms. Gerardia deals abstractly with themes such as time, movement and astral bodies.

Her work may be found in some 64 museum and college collections, including the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Fogg Museum and the Brooklyn Museum. Her pieces have been shown in group exhibitions at the Whitney Museum, Corcoran Gallery, National Gallery, Pennsylvania Academy, and the Cincinnati and San Francisco Museums.

Traveling shows by Ms. Gerardia, who works out of New York City and Woodstock, have been shown in 185 museums, colleges and art centers in all 50 states. Recipient of 54 awards to date, her work has appeared at the Ueno Park Museum in Tokyo, the Stedjlike Museum, the New Dehli Cultural Center, the Pierre Albord Museum in Algiers and the Modern Museum in Brazil.

Critics have variously praised her work for "pure, intense color and handsome compositions that suggest great speed and a feeling of the unknown;" "clarity and preci-

Fassiotto to Speak at International Colloquim

Marie-Jose Fassiotto, Instructor in French at Juniata College, has been invited by the Society of 18th Century French Specialists to deliver a paper at their International Colloqium which will be held this October at the University of Reims, France. The Colloquim will be centered around the Works and Times of Jean Meslier, an atheist priest of the early 18th century. Ms. Fassiotto's topic at the conference will be the concept of happiness in the works of Meslier and the 18th Century.

Jean Meslier was a parish priest in a small village near Reims, who left as a last will and testament to his parishoners, his Memories, in which he professes his aetheism and develops his concept of the ideal materialist state. During the 18th century Meslier's work was known only in clandestine and bowdlerized varsions which in turn stressed his materialism and his aetheism. regarded as a philosophical precur-Interest in Meslier has been revived in the Soviet Union where he is, in the 20th century, particularly sor Marx and a spiritual precursor of the 1917 Revolution. The Russion work and renewed Western scholarship, which has tended to trace his influence on the French Philosophes, has led to the first critical and unabridged version of his Memories in 1970.

by Alice Boomhower

Well, this will be my last editorial, and I can't say that I am sorry. Next week you will hear from the new editor, Gary Gillen, commonly known to his friends as Stumpy. Stumpy has been the Sports Editor for the past year, and has written the column Sports Stumpin'.

There are a number of things that I wanted to achieve in the last year that I was not able to do, but this week there is one thing that I would especially like to hit, and that is sex dicrimination in jobs at this college. Specifically, I am speaking of the lower salaries paid to the cleaning women over those paid to the cleaning men. The cleaning women get 52¢ less per hour than the cleaning men. The question of sex discrimination is taken care of in the job descriptions. Women are hired for working indoors, cleaning the dorms, and the men's jobs are described as working in the dorms and buildings and if needed, out-of-doors. In other words, men are hired for one type of job description, and women are hired for another.

Anyone with eyes will realize that Lesher is a much better kept dorm than North. This is partly due to the persons who live in them, but I am told by men living in North that there is mold on the walls of the bathrooms. Undoubtedly, this does not spring up overnight. I feel that there is a serious problem with the priorities of the school. I realize that to keep a hall spotless takes more time than the cleaning personel are given, yet there seems to be a problem with some of the personnel not working efficiently in the time that they are given.

Another minus to the system is that the contract of the cleaning personnel runs out in July, during Summer School. This means that these people cannot get enough student support for their cause.

Realistically, I am not calling for a lowering of the cleaning men salaries, but I do feel that the women are being discriminated against, and that they should have equal salaries with the men. These women work very hard, and deserve the same payment as men for equal work.

I also feel that if the person is not doing his or her job properly, they should no longer be employed. The only way to make the administration and business office aware of this is to write letters, contact Student Government, fight for equal rights, and push for the bettering of living conditions.

Ed Straub Promoted To Food Director

Edward J. Straub has been promoted to food service director at Juniata College.

Straub, who has been at Juniata since September of 1972, is employed by Hallmark Management Service, the firm which serves as the caterer for the college.

Reared in Lakewood, Ohio, a suburb of Cleveland, Straub played football and basketball, participated in dramatics, and was ranked in the top 10 per cent of his class at St. Edward High School. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Francis Straub, 1454 Roycroft Ave., Lakewood.

A graduate of Kenyon College, he married the former Sheila Brown, also of Lakewood, after his freshman year in college and held a variety of jobs as an undergraduate. He worked for the food service at Kenyon and was student coordinator for the intramural athletic program. In addition, during his summer vacations, he was a laborer in a steel mill and a railroad fireman and brakeman. He majored in economics.

Straub also has been employed as a paint department supervisor for a steel fabricating firm in Wooster, Ohio, and as a business analyst for Dun and Bradstreet, Inc., in Cleveland.

Choir Member Questions The Priorities Of State House

by Laurie Peacher

Did you know that your college choir has another to add to its list of accomplishments? The choir often seems to be a non-existent part of the campus, coming out on Parents Weekend and Commencement Weekend, then diving back into the gloomy depths of Lesher basement for another year.

Not many realize the honor that the choir recently received when they were invited to sing at the Capitol Building in Harrisburg. Most choirs sing in the Rotunda, but we were asked by Representative Sam Hayes to sing in the Chamber where the representatives meet. We were (o rshould have been) the first group to ever perform in the Chamber and the first private college to perform in the Pennsylvania capital. It was quite an honor, something the college should be proud of.

Then politics entered in. Penn State's Choir was singing in the Rotunda as our choir flocked by to sing in the Chamber. Why, said Penn State, should a dumb-little privately-owned college be allowed to Sing in the Chamber when they, a big state-supported University, have to sing in the Rotunda? After Penn State complained enough, they were alowed to sing one song in the Chamber. Even though Penn State was allowed to sing, we did have one consolation. They sang before roll call, we sang after, so technically the House was not in session when Penn State sang.

What irritated me is that the House in Harrisburg felt a greater obligation to its state-supported school than to the invitation they had issued to a privately-supported institution. Realistically, Juniata does not have the wide selection of voices that Penn State has but I feel our choir is of the same caliber.

As a choir member, I am very proud of our group. Our trip to Harrisburg clearly showed the representatives that a small privately-owned school can equal the achievements of a state-supported school. This was clearly shown by the standing ovation given by the House at the close of the program. The choir's experience was just one example of how private schools are looked upon by the State.

The instigator of this week's article is my very good woman-friend, Denise Hartman, who has suggested I investigate the subject of a report by a Dr. Okey—the subject, none other than the cure for the common cramp. The remedy is simply calcium supplement pills, the rationale being that toward the end of the menstral cycle and especially during the first days of menstration the calcium level in the bloodstream drops considerably, causing cramps and nervous tension. Unfortunately, this information, given to Denise by a friend, came from a short clipping from a larger article to which we could find no references. Indeed, the issue was worth pursuing, so I consulted Dr. Senft, professor of physiology, for some clarification and criticism. He read our short clipping with a smile and a glitter in his eye (I knew we were on to something) and then commented, "Very feasible, very possible." (Hot-dam!) The theory goes as follows:

As most atheletes knows, muscle activity produces lactic acid; if lactic acid builds up in your muscles it causes stiffness and cramps (e.g., the day after your first spring bike hike). Further, an article by Ferris N. Pitts, Jr., published in "Scientific American", Feb. 1969, reports on the high corelation between excessive lactate in the bloodstream and tension, especially in patients with anxiety neurosis. The lactic acid ion combines very readily with free calcium ions to produce the relatively inert compound calcium lactate, thus removing lactic acid from the system. In applying these few axioms to the explanation of menstral discomfort, we can see it is feasible that if, as Dr. Okey purports to have measured, menstration is accompanied by a drop in the calcium level of the bloodstream, the lactic acid villain has more chance to cause trouble (e.g., cramps and nervous tension) because the odds are in its favor, unless we bring more calcium, our heroine, to the rescue to counterbalance it and restore peace and tranquility. Perhaps the cativity of the uterine muscles at menstration produces enough lactic acid to touch off this imbalance.

I have five private testimonies that 3 or 4 calcium tablets taken when cramps first start brings immediate relief. It might be necessary to take another three tablets the next day if cramps return, and Dr. Okey suggests that women who suffer severe discomfort should also take one tablet as a daily supplement for the week or two before menstration. The only side effect from taking calcium supplements might be constipating; most dairy products have the same effect. Consequently, it's preferable to buy tablets that are 25% magnesium, or if you can't locate these, any laxative will do, e.g., milk of magnesia. Dr. Senft assured me that there was no danger of building up calcium deposits from the recommended calcium dosages. He also made the qualification that just because you take calcium supplements doesn't guarantee that it will be absorbed into your system. There will be a small minority of women whose metabolism just is not geared for adjusting proper calcium levels in the blood stream. Also a reminder, that this cure is proposed for the common cramp; menstral discomfort can be caused by other things, e.g., a malfunctioning ovary, which of course should be checked out thoroughly by a gynecologist.

In that there's no harm in it, I think it's worth a good try. And I'd very much appreciate hearing what sort of satisfaction comes of it. My thanks to Denise, Dr. Senft, and also Sarah Young, my physiology coach.

Dustin Hoffman Shines in Movie "Little Big Man"

by Stella

Dustin Hoffman is a super-magnificent actor. Always totally believable in any part, wonderfully versatile, he has easily become one of the most — perhaps the most — accomplished actor of this decade. And, after a deservedly remarkable amount of praise and acclaim for his part in Midnight Cowboy, he proved himself worthy of the praise by taking on the title role in the film Little Big Man.

Jack Crabb is an elderly man at the beginning of this flick but, in flashback sequences we watch his whole life in the old West. He is adopted by an Indian tribe and quickly becomes as much red-man as white. He has a little more trouble trying to emulate the big-time gunslingers, of the time but, as in everything he does, he makes a valient attempt. With the cleverest of make-up men to aid him, Hoffman makes each of his misadventures as interesting and comic as the one before, gradually leading back to his old age.

It's a wonderful movie because of Dustin Hoffman. He is exactly what he should be in each instance. Oh, the directing by Arthur Penn is excellent, and all of the other actors, especially Chief Dan George, are fine, but I don't think they could have done it without Hoffman in the lead role. I loved him! To see just why I'm so enthusiastic, see Little Big Man, on Friday, April 26, in Oller Hall. Admission is $1.00 and well worth the price!

Intramural Sports Standing as of April 22

As spring intramurals wind down to their last two weeks we have some very good battles for first place in the various divisions. In men's softball: Flight One the lead is presently shared by The Ball Busters and Emmert House both with perfect 5 and 0 records. If neither team loses to another team the apparent show down for first place will occur on April 29, at 6:30 on field four. If either team picks up their first loss before the show-down an upset by the second place Ball Busters or Emmert would cause a 4 way tie for first with Third Degree Burs and The Bird Men. These four teams appear to be the playoff contenders with an outside chance given to Sherwood Athletics.

In Flight Two there is also a very good race for first with the Rogners at 3-0 being chased by Cool, Maybe, and Wads II, all at 3-1 and Fields of Ambrosia at 2-1. Here again as in Flight One upsets by some of the non-contention teams could cause a tie for first.

Concerning six man soccer the Net Men are the only undefeated team remaining in a five team field with a 4-0 record. Clubfeet and Santer of Brazil both check in with one loss and both figure to press The Net Men in the last week. As for Barking Spider they seem to be barking up the wrong tree and the Crippler VI appears to have lost their crutches.

In Women's Softball it looks like Good Losers and Today are better winners than the rest of the field and should be the favorites for the title.

Pa. Student Lobby Meeting Attended By J.C. Students

The Pennsylvania Student Lobby is now being organized under the skillful direction of Bruce Moyer. A meeting was recently held at one of the seven regional schools. This meeting was for the organization of the lobby. Unfortunately, only two schools showed up for the meeting, so it was decided that teams would divide and go out to the not-present schools and talk with their Student Government people.

To a large degree this was a failure, because many of the Student Government's were not really interested, nor did they want to get involved in the Lobby. It would appear that Saturday afternoon is not the best time to find Student Government people.

Bruce says, "Our goal is not to have every school in Pennsylvania a member of the Lobby, although it would be nice. Right now what we are doing, is to get the support of enough campuses and students to start operations in Harrisburg.

Bruce states the goals of the Lobby as a group to lobby for student concerns. He points out that many states, California for example, have very effective Student Lobbying groups and are able to achieve much for students. More specifically, the lobby will be working for more funding of higher education, better opportunities for college students, and possibly the lowering of the drinking age.

Girls Intercollegate Tennis at Juniata Begins Rookie Season

by Deb Worrall

If you haven't seen a few ridiculous signs around lately like "Don't just play love games, play women's intercollegiate tennis instead!" Or hear over the loudspeaker in the cafeteria, — Thank you! A revolution is in store for J. C., yes ma'm it's Women's Intercollegiate Tennis.

Finally, after a few years of just sowing the field (so to speak) this controversial sport with such amateurs as Billy Jean King active in the field, can be seen on the four courts next to Ellis practicing every night from six to seven-thirty. Alas, thanks go to Walt Nadzak who has contributed extensively to getting a team on its feet again, not to menion Dr. Ernest Post and the coach of the team, Dr. Pfrogner.

Currently, the first match is scheduled for Friday, April 26, home against Altoona of Penn State, and then its an away match at Dickinson on Monday. After that, there is an away match against Altoona-Penn State on May 8, and Shippensburg on May 10. There are 12 hard working players and a ladder consisting of three singles and two doubles. The team members are: Anne Hennebach (Doc), Lynne Grove, Alice Herritt, Debie Worrall, Cindy Hill, Deb Smith, Ellie Valentine, Elaine Botta, Pam Weaver, Mary Stauffer, Sue Smith, and Jacque Prentiss.

If anyone is interested in "kabitzing" (a team reserved for Dr. Pfrogner) it's still not too late to join up and bolster the team when the going gets rough.

New Co-Captains

Coach Walt Nadzak has announced the selection of offensive and defensive co-captains for the 1974 season.

Sean Ryan a guard and Carmen De Francesco, a tail-back will represent the offense as Steve Lehman and Dan Ereditario, a pair of linebackers will captain the defense. Ryan and De Francesco will be seniors, Lehman and Ereditario will be juniors.

There was action everywhere as the Juniata sports complex was in full swing as the baseball and track had a full day planned. In somewhat of a surprise Lock Haven arrived for a track meet, the only trouble was that Juniata had a meet already scheduled with Albright. Well it worked out very well as Juniata, running against both at the same time, sweep to 2 victories. Led by Mike Slough and Kim Witmer, who recorded 4 1st and a 2nd in each meet, the Indians raised their record to 4-1. Had it not been a freak incident with Witmer losing the baton earlier in the year JC would be undefeated. Other top performers so far this season have been Rick Rudolf (100,220), Carl Koval (880), and Mike Winterstein (javelin).

The Indians have run into some trouble on the baseball diamond so far this season. JC hurt by some costly errors lost an extra inning game to Indiana Saturday, 10-6. The lost lowered their to 4-6, however the Indians have lost 4 games by 1 run and another by 2. The Indians stand a little better in MAC competition as they have posted a 3-2 mark in the MAC's. Paced by seniors Mike McNeal and Craig Palardy the Indians have outscored their opponents 60-47, the runs however have not been there when needed.

Like the track & baseball teams the tennis team has had some rather tough battles. After dropping their 1st 2 matches the Indians came back strong to defeat Delaware Valley at home last Thursday. The team is led by Gavin Ford, Andy Vonderhyde and Mont Rice, who have been playing the top 3 spots.

This week will see the teams quite busy as the track team has 2 meets with the next home meet May 1, against Lycoming. The baseball team hosts Albright Friday then travels to Wilkes for a doubleheader Saturday then returns home to face Penn State May 1. The tennis team will close out its regular season this week with matches at Scranton April 26, return home vs. Shippensburg on April 29, and then finishes up with an away match at Albright on May 2.

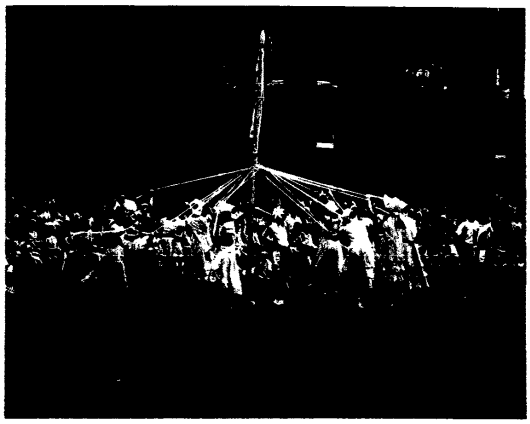
During May Day Weekend

Festival Of Arts Provides Entertainment



How May Day was celebrated at Juniata in 1933.

by Gary Moore
by Mike McElhinney

The tense, pressured, and rapid pace of today will come to a halt this week as the Fine Arts crumble the all too scientific walls of Juniata College. In an attempt to integrate the Arts with life on campus, the Humanities Division is sponsoring A Festival of the Arts. Its purpose: to make the Arts a part of daily life on campus: to show that the beauty of literature and music and drama does not begin and end in the classroom, but is part of our everyday environment. The Arts must be something which the students of Juniata can relate to in this sometimes hurried and narrowed scholastic community.

Organized by the faculty and given by the students, the Festival promises to set you in a state of "natural high". The "high" is achieved in the sudden realization that the beauty and aesthetic quality of literature, art, and music is created by the human mind; natural in the respect that art, culture, and music are a part of the soul of men. The Festival will help one discover the spirit of the Arts and allow one to witness the inner grace and intimacy of literature and music. You will laugh aloud as you see plays from the Medieval era and your mind will be place in deep cogitation as you discuss pholisophical problems concerning you own "freedom and individuality".

Gerald Croce and Gloria Friedman are responsible for the creation of the Festival and they must be applauded. However, one must realize that the Festival is given by the students and is for the entire college community. The students involved have realized that there is something missing from their everyday lives. They wish to slow down their hurried pace and find tranquility in an exciting, stimulating, and aesthetic manner. Examine and analyze your own everyday schedule. Perhaps you too will see a need to find your own artistic spirit. So laugh and shout out loud during the week of the Festival of the Art! Allow it to end your 9 to 5 lecture-filled day, and begin the integration of your body and artistic soul.

A Medieval Synesthesia

A synesthesia is a phenomena which intertwines sights and sounds to produce a total experience. Such a phenomena, using medieval music and art, conducted by Mr. Croce and Ms. Friedman in Shoemaker Gallery on Saturday, May 4th at 3:00.

Medieval music of the 12th and 13th centuries including Gregorian chants, dance music and songs from France and Germany will be played. Much of the music was recorded by monks in monasteries and cathedrals which gives it an awesome, spiritual quality and results in sensations which blend with the colorful slides. Cathedrals, tapestries, monasteries, and stained glass windows will be projected and will be uninterrupted by any commentary or lectures.

Drama Performances, Art Of Russia Exhibited At JC

According to Mr. Dolnikowski, "Art is a representation of feeling." and Russian Art is no exception. Feelings of hopelessness and suffering permeate the slides of art of 18th century Russian which Mr. Dolnikowski will show on Friday, May 3rd at 8:00 in Shoemaker Gallery. Mr. Dolnikowski characterized Russian Art as realistic— it is not difficult to understand; simplistic—there is no grand designs and few details; and nationalistic—almost all elements are exclusively Russian and deal with subjects such as history, landscape, people, and social customs.

In addition, Larry Davis, Mike Sencindiver, and Mr. Dolnikowski have prepared an exhibit of Russian Art of the 18th century which will be on display in Shoemaker Gallery May 1st through May 6th. The exhibit will include books, postcards, artbooks, portraits, journals, and encyclopedia volumes of Russian Art.

Mr. Dolnikowski's program and the week-long art exhibit will offer people a rare opportunity to see Russian Art here at Juniata. So if you're tired of the same old sketches and watercolors or if you have never been inside Shoemaker Gallery stop in for a new and unique experience, the purpose of the Festival of the Arts.

Recital, Concert Demonstrate Musical Abilities Of JC Students At Festival

Stop! Think really hard. How many quarters have you put into that juke box down at the Golden Nuggett? Quite a few eh? Well I've got the perfect remedy for keeping some of those quarters in your pocket the next time you go for a pitcher or two. On Saturday May 4th at 8:15 P.M., the Juniata Chamber Singers will sing madrigal's from the Baroque era, in an informal and pleasant atmosphere in Shoemaker Gallery. These are songs which were sung while "making merry" in "Ye Ole Tavern" some centuries ago. So come and enjoy yourself. Listen and learn these fun and enjoyable songs, sung in the 19th and 20th century style. Make merry while tipping a glass of beer and singing these madrigals the next time your at "Ye Ole Golden Nuggett." The songs will be sung in Italian, Latin, and English. But don't let that worry you. After that first pitcher, who cares if you improvise "a little?"

The students are enthustiastic about their part in the Festival of the Arts. Their thinking is, "what could be closer to the Fine Arts than music?" The rich and fine tones of their voices will come from their bodies. But the feeling with which they will sing will come from their souls. In essence, they will encompass the beauty of the Festival of the Arts.

Relax, enjoy, and listen to these unaccompanied vocalist during the Festival of the Arts. Save those quarters for another pitcher of beer.

Between numbers, while the Chamber Singers are resting their vocal chords, there will be a Brass Ensemble playing music from the Baroque era. Also, "Underground" sources have it that the Music Division is trying to stimulate interest on campus to gain new members in their instrumental department. Talk to Dr. Hirsch if your interested. Or even if your not, just stop by and let the Brass Ensemble give you a good time.

Roman Togas Replace Jeans In Ms. Lewis' Freedom Class

"Look, on the grass! Are they Romans, ghosts, or the Ku Klux Klan?!" No, it's Janet Lewis and her philosophy class, strolling along the green Juniata campus in togas and sandals. That's right! During the Festival of the Arts, Janet Lewis and her astute "Freedom and Individuality" class will walk along the campus expounding and discussing philosophical problems. Encamping every now and then under the shade of a tree, the class hopes to encounter students who are interested in pondering the questions of philosophy. Join them and "sit a spell". Match wisdom and knowledge against the people who aspire to gain an Aristotelian-like mind.

The Festival of the Arts will truly come to life as Ms. Lewis and her class set the campus in an atmosphere of the year 347 B.C. Vivid, colorful, and alive will be the air surrounding the Greek-type setting.

Are your nerves strong enough, your mind keen enough to challenge the wits and perception of these Platonic thinkers? Janet Lewis and her class will prove to you that philosophy is not limited to Good Hall but is part of our everyday surroundings. So come out and rap a while! Get high on some fresh air and fun! Just think, by the time you leave these ingenious philosophers your mind will be wracked from seeking answers and finding nothing but more questions.

SIGN UP NOW AT THE INFORMATION DESK FOR THE RAFT RACE ON MAY 11.

Steps of Oller Hall Is Scene of Play

Have you passed Oller Hall some afternoon in the last week or two and seen a bunch of people sitting on the grass or on the front steps? That congregation is Mrs. Goehring's "Discovery Through Acting" class and they aren't planning a demonstration. They are rehearsing for two plays which they will present on Friday, May 3rd at 3:00 on the steps of Oller Hall.

"The Second Shepard's Play" and "The Wakefield Noah" are from the medieval period and deal with religious subjects, a common characteristic of medieval plays. "The Second Shepherd's Play" offers an interesting and comical variation of the birth of Christ when a deviant shepherd "leaves" the scene. "The Wakefield Noah" has been revised by the class to give it a contemporary, Bill Cosby style.

After a week of classes you need a break so come on over to Oller Hall on Friday afternoon, sit on the grass and soak up the rays, and see what you can Discover Through Acting.

Music Dept. Adds A Touch of Class

The Department of Music will present a student recital at 8:15 on Thursday, May 2nd at Shoemaker Gallery. Piano, harpsichord and vocal solos by prominent composers of several centuries will add a touch of class and beauty to the evening. Students of Mary Ruth Linton and Marjorie and Bruce Hirsch will sing original compositions specially created for this event.

Pottery Classes To Display Ceramics Outside Ellis Hall

The theme is creativity, the subject is sharing. Jack Troy and students of his advanced classes will display and sell their colorful ceramics on the veranda of Ellis Hall, Wednesday through Friday. Though the pottery is for sale, the student's main interest is to interact with the rest of the campus. The students of Jack Troy are excited and anxious to learn of the campus' reaction to their art. The purpose is to break away the esoteric barrier and allow the campus to study and observe the work which goes into this beautiful handicraft. This embodies and generates the true spirit of the Festival. Ceramics are created by the mind, but "wheeled" and fashioned by hand—a complete union of mental and physical ability.

A small kile will be built and "fired up" on the south side of Ellis Hall by Jack Troy and his students. This is called a raku demonstration and is a special kind of pottery. Visit with these creative people for a while. They'll enjoy your company, and I'm sure you'll enjoy theirs.

WJC Replies

Dear Editor:

During the past several months, we at WJC have been under a constant barrage of criticism for not being on the air on AM. I would be the last one to say that anyone is above criticism, however, I would like to set a few things straight.

First, the one and only reason we were not on the air, is that our AM transmitters did not comply with part 15.7 of the F.C.C. rules and regulations. The F.C.C. cited us for this violation on July 11, 1973. If we had returned to the air in violation of this citation and been caught, the result could have been anything from another warning to fining the college and confiscating our equipment. Thus, the only responsible action we could take was to remain off the air until the problem was remedied.

Secondly, despite rumers to the contrary, WJC did not have vast sums of money to spend on the problem. In fact, after last year's budget cuts and adjustments, WJC was left with the smallest budget we had received in the past four years. The money we were alloted, barely covered operating costs, let alone having money to spend on the transmitters. In fact, the only reason we are now on the air is because of the heroic efforts of the WJC Advertising Staff.

Thirdly, I would like to comment on the rumor that we have not been actively trying to fix the problem. The transmitter problem is not a new one and has hung over our heads for several years. After exhausting on campus sources of help, we hired a Professional Consulting-Engineer from Philadelphia. After paying him handsomely for his services, we followed his recommendations, only to find the situation worse than before. We then hired another engineer (out of Washington, D.C.) who came up and studied the situation. He made different recommendations and supplied us with the information to carry them out. The only problem was that the equipment necessary to follow these recommendations was both complicated and expensive. We did not even acquire the final piece of equipment needed until late in December, 1973. It then took time and effort to master its complexities. Around the end of February, we found that even this second set of recommendations did not completely solve the problem. It was only recently that I found a system which appeared as if it would work, and tried it out over Easter vacation. The results can be read about elsewhere in the paper.

So we have been far from inactive. I personally have spent the last four major vacations working on the transmitters full-time, not counting the hours spent while the college is in session. Even now, we do not have all the equipment necessary, and have to borrow parts from an area station, in short irregular sessions.

In conclusion, I feel that we at WJC have followed the only responsible course of action open to us. My only regret is that many of the self-declared experts on campus did not have the courtesy (or maybe the intelligence?) to come and ask before spouting off on hearsay evidence. I would also like to thank all the loyal listeners and especially the staff at WJC, who have stuck with us throughout this ordeal.

Sincerely,
David S. Hoover

For this week's column I set out to find a snapshot of what social scientists term the sex role stereotypes of our Western society. In her book, Masculine/Feminine or Human?, Janet Saltzman Chafety publishes this list of surveyed sex role traits, further classified according to how helpful or harmful each is in acquiring and performing in prestigious occupational roles.

FEMININE-Helpful: compassionate; intuitive; humanistic; perceptive; idealistic; patient; gentle. Harmful: worry about appearance & age; sensual; domestic; flirtatious; emotional & sentimental; nervous & insecure; scatterbrained & frivolous; impractical; petty, coy, & gossipy; dependent; follower & submissive; self-conscious & easily intimidated; not aggressive; tardy; noncompetitive.

MASCULINE-Helpful: breadwinner; unemotional; logical, objective, & scientific; practical; mechanical; public awareness; leader; disciplinarian; independent; demanding; aggressive; ambitious; proud & confident; trustworthy; decisive; competitive; adventurous. Harmful: sloppy; dogmatic.

Observe that where there are 15 feminine traits classified as "harmful", there are only 2 masculine traits so designated. Conversely, masculine "helpful" traits outnumber feminine "helpful" traits 17 to 5. Stereotypically, there is a definite trade-off between being feminine and being successful; i.e., the more one conforms to "feminity", the less able is she of functioning in other than domestic roles, and the more one aspires to successful and prestigious occupations, the more she must compromise her "femininity" and take on "masculine" traits.

Phyllis Chesler shows this picture from a slightly different angle when in her book, Women and Madness, she describes a study done by Inge Broverman et al. (1970). Seventy-nine clinicians (46 male, 33 female psychiatrists, psychologists, and social workers) completed a sex role stereotype questionaire. Instructions were to check off those characteristics that represent healthy male, healthy female, and healthy adult (sex unspecified) behavior.

The results are evidence of the still existent Freudian double standard of mental health. The clinicians suggested that healthy women differ from healthy men by being more submissive, less independent, less adventurous, more easily influtnced, less aggressive, less competitive, more excitable in minor crises, more easily hurt, more emotional, more conceited about their appearances, less objective, and less interested in math and science. (That is, if a female does not conform to the above, she may likly be judged mentally unhealthy!)

To add insult to injury, there was a very high correlation between the clinicians' concepts of healthy men, healthy, mature adults (sex unspecified), and several scales of social desirability. That is, not only is there a double standard of sexual mental health, but the single standard of adult human mental health is maschline. Here again is another trade-off: to be a mentally healthy woman is to not be a healthy, mathre adult, and to be a healthy, adult human being is to compromise your "femininity" and be more "masculine".

Thus, a snapshot of the social some of their implications. I rescience sex role stereotypes and mind you that these are stereotypes: they are only as powerful factually as our belief in them.

WJC Returns To 620 AM

WJC, 620 AM and 108 FM, has returned to the AM airways. After an absence of most of this year, WJC can be received on AM in the following dorms: Flory-Kline; Long-Miller; North and Tussey-Terrace. The reception in Tussey-Terrance is spotty and we are endeavoring to improve it. If your reception is poor, you can try moving your radio around the room. Often, due to the steel structure and, in East Houses, the electric heat, there are dead spots in the rooms. Moving your radio can usually alleviate this problem. The rest of the dormitories need additional work, however, we hope to have most of them on the air before this summer, and all of them on the air by September.

Students Offered Voice and Vote

Important positions on faculty committees are open for students. These students will have a full voice and vote on these committees and have valuable input into questions of tenure, course offerings, changes in the new curriculum, and others. Students may sign up for these positions either at the issues desk or in the student government office. The Pres. of Student Gov. with Senate approval will make the final selections.

The positions available are the folowing: 2 students on the Executive Committee, 2 students for the Academic Planning Committee, 2 students on the Academic Program Committee, 5 students on the Academic Standards Committee, 3 students on the Personnel Committee. All positions are for one year.

Furthur information can be obtained in the government office or at the issues desk, or by contacting a member of the Senate.

How The Demands of Others Can Affect Personalities Subject of Weekend Movie

by Brad Rudy

There are many sorts of characters in life with whom we must live, but who are also so demanding that they wary our own personalities. There are many ways to cope with them: Sometimes, we ignore them and hope they'll go away; sometimes we withdraw into a world of our own making, shutting the rest of the world out completely; or sometimes, as most often happens, we go mad.

Paul Zindel's Pulitzer Prize winning play, The Effect of Gamma Rays on Man-in-the-moon Marigolds, shows such a situation, and Paul Newman has enriched it greatly in transcribing it to the screen. The plot centers around Beatrice Hunsdorfer, a neurotic, beer-drinking, chain-smoking divorcee whose abnormal behavior causes her two teenage daughters to escape to worlds of their own. Tillie, the younger of the two, withdraws to the world of science. Too shy to even raise her face in anyone's presence, she finds greater solace in the cold and logical world of atoms and radiation than in the more complex realm of social relations. (The title, besides describing metaphorically the entire plot, describes the experiment she creates to win a science fair award.) Ruth, the older, escapes by attacking her mother with ancient insults ("Betty the Loon"), or more painfully, by burlesquing her in a class skit. When all else fails, she falls into epileptic psychosomatic seizures.

Ironically, though, Beatrice commands more sympathy than condemnation on the part of the audience. She is as much a victim of her environment as her daughters. Abandoned by her husband, she must struggle to support her children in a totally unsympathetic, almost a hostile world. Indeed, what "maddens" her are the depths to

Wide Variety Offered During Summer, Include Courses in Business, Accouting

Juniata College is offering a summer course dealing with the collection and analyzing of accounting data needed for business decisions.

The course, entitled "Accounting for Management Control I," will be taught by Charles W. Wise, instructor in economics and business administration.

It is being offered during the six-week Second Session (June 24 to Aug. 2) of the 1974 summer program at Juniata. Classes will meet Monday, Tuesday and Thursday evenings from 7 to 9.

The tuition for the course, which provides 3.5 semester hours of college credit, is $175.

Topics to be discussed include the classification and summarization of business transactions, the preparation of financial statements, data requirements and interpretations necessary for decision-making, and management planning and control.

Wise, who joined the Juniata faculty last fall, holds the bachelor of arts degree from Ohio University and the master of business administration degree from the University of Pittsburgh.

He also acquired experience in industry as a supervisor of employment, safety and training at a glass fabrication plant in Tipton, Pa.

All summer courses at Juniata are open to students from other colleges, adults, and high school students with superior records. Requests for application forms or additional information may be addressed to Dr. Donald T. Hartman, director of the Summer Sessions and associate academic dean.

which she must descend in order to survive: Selling dancing lessons over the phone, converting her shabby house into a store, or taking care of old and sick people whose own families are too busy to even bother. ("I never thought I'd end up playing nursemaid to a zombie.")

Joanne Woodward brings to the role of Beatrice an acid poignancy that raises the film from the level of melodramatic soap-opera. (She was named the best actress at last summer's Cannes film festival for the role.) She can give a phony schtickish line like "My heart is full" a feeling and truth that demands respect. The rest of the cast is highlited by Roberta Wallach as Ruth and Lell Potts (Newman and Woodward's daughter) as Tillie. The latter seems much too young for a high school age girl, but she still manages to convey the shy inwardness needed for the part.

The film will be shown Friday, May 3, at 8 P.M. in Alumni Hall, admission being 50¢ without a series subscription ticket. It may be a depressing film to start off May Day weekend with, but it is still well worth your time.

Shorty Does It Again

Susan L. Rosshirt, a junior at Juniata College, has been elected treasurer of the board of directors of the National Student Lobby. Her election came at a meeting of the board last weekend in Washington, D.C.

A native of Rising Sun, Md., Ms. Rosshirt will serve on the NSL's Executive Committee, which meets again in the nation's capital in June.

Ms. Rosshirt, who serves as one of two coordinators for the NSL's Region 5, was elected to the board in March at the lobby's 3rd Annual Conference. Region 5 consists of Michigan, Ohio, West Virginia, Delaware, Maryland and Pennsylvania.

Among the issues considered by the lobby are widening of student loans and grants for college expenses, minimun wage legislation and availability of travel discounts for students and those over 65 years of age.

The March conference of the NSL was attended by more than 800 students from throughout the United States. Among its speakers were Rep. Paul N. McCloskey, Jr., former vice-president Hubert H. Humphrey, Sen. George McGovern, newsman Don Rather and Robert Woodward.

With this issue I will conclude my career as "Sports Stumpin'" and take a step, in which direction I'm not quite sure yet, but either way a step. Now I would like to thank all those who helped with sports this year and hope that next year will see their return to the scene. I would also like to thank all those who read along with me this past year and also hope that next year will see a continuation of this. This past year has given me much enjoyment and I hope that you have enjoyed it also.

I guess in my last article I could recall all the highlights of the past year, but now that I sit here and think about it, it seems that to do that would be to spend most of my time talking about football, and right now it's too hot to talk about football so I will forget about that. Then I thought that I might make my pitch to enlist all you to come to the aid of your newspaper. However I figure it's only 3 weeks till summer and you probably don't feel like hearing it. Like I said it's too hot. Besides if I gave you my pitch now I would have to give it again to the freshman in the fall and then you would become bored.

Now that I've wasted a little space I thought I might say something about the All College Invitational Track Meet. A lot of credit must go to Coaches Rossi and Reilly for the super job they have done with the intramural program. Saturday's festivites went extremely well and everybody that cared to participate was welcome. The coordination between the I.M. office and the food service went very well and we didn't even have to show our meal tickets, but I guess that's another story. I.M.'s have become a very big thing here at Juniata and with Coaches Rossi and Reilly the future is bigger and better.

Well, as I sit here, I really can't think of to much more to add. The year has just about run its course and the time has come for this Sports Stumpin' to sign off.

JC Batters Show Persistence In Overcoming Rough Albright Team

The baseball team showed that persistence pays off as they scored in 6 of the 8 innings in which they battled to overcome the eight run lead which Albright ammassed in the first inning of the game.

Craig Palardy showed the Albright Lions a flaming bat as he went 5 for 5 including two home runs. (which ties an MAC record). Barry Hartley and Mike McNeal also displayed hot bats with Hartley going 4 for 5 and knocking in the tying and winning runs in the 8th inning and McNeal going 3 for 5 and scoring each time he reached base.

Paul Sosnowski, Jim Kudel, and Dennis Henriques pitched good relief ball after Lou Eckerl was roughed up in the first inning. Jimmy Kudel picked up the victory for the Indians.

The Indians then traveled to Wilkes Barre to confront Wilkes College with hopes of gaining a twin killing and thus remain very much alive in the MAC title race. All that the Indians could manage was a split of the doubleheader Saturday afternoon winning the front game 12-2 behind a strong effort by Mark Amatucci, but bowing in the night-cap 10-0 as a result of a fine effort by the Wilkes pitcher who tossed a 1 hitter. Jim Slovick was once again a victim of the Indians inability to score runs behind him as he suffered the mound loss. The team now stands 5 & 4 in MAC's and 6 & 8 overall, far below expectations.

The Indians host Delaware Valley in a twin bill Saturday May 4th. The first game starts at 1:00 P.M. The Indians then wind up their season on the road with games at Pitt (Johnstown), Indiana, and Gettysburg.

Seniors Reaching End Of Journey- Festival Planned

A "Celebration for Seniors," including the annual senior awards presentation, highlighted the Spring Academic Festival at Juniata College, Tuesday and Wednesday, May 7 and 8.

The festival began Tuesday evening in Alumni Hall. Dr. James L. Gooch, assistant professor of biology, delivered a paper. "Scientia and Scientism," at 8 p.m. Dr. Paul D. Schettler, Jr., associate professor of chemistry, commented on the work.

The paper was one of three offered during the two-day program. All were designed to develop the theme "Vocations — Life Styles; What To Do?", a college-wide focus initiated this year by the Division of Humanities.

According to Dr. Robert E. Wagoner, assistant academic dean, "the aim of the papers, following yearlong research, was to articulate as clearly as possible the special vocation of the humanities, social sciences and natural sciences in terms of each discipline's characteristic modes of thought and perceptions."

Other essays were offered by Dr. James J. Lakso, assistant professor of economics and business administration, and Dr. Mark R. Hochberg, assistant professor of English. Lakso spoke of "The Vocation of the Social Sciences" at 9:30 a.m. Wednesday in Alumni Hall. Dr. Martin Clark, assistant professor of religion, commented.

Hochberg, speaking Wednesday at 1:30 p.m., also in Alumni Hall, delivered his essay "To Celebrate the Merely Human." Dr. Donald T. Hartman, assistant professor of philosophy and associate academic dean, made the commentary. Smaller-group discussions of all three papers folowed at 3 p.m.

The "Celebration for Seniors" began with a picnic in front of Oller Hall Wednesday at 11:15 a.m. Organized by M. Andrew Murray, instructor in religion and campus minister, the picnic was open to all students and members of the faculty. A band played and street theatre was provided.

The picnic was followed at 12:30 p.m. by an academic procession of unique design. Faculty and seniors, gowned as usual, were joined by underclassmen in groups of their choosing. The latter were invited to dress in some costume symbolic of his or her life at Juniata. Placards identified groups.

The Senior Awards ceremony began at 12:45 in Oller Hall. Among the prizes received were the Alice G. Blaisdell Prizes in Geology and Mathematic, and Dr. Andrew B. and Maria F. Brumbaugh Science Prize, the Juniata Marstellar Langdon Prize, the Wilbur W. Oaks Prize, the William S. Price Social Sciences Prize, the Charles M. Rice Accounting Prize, the John R. and Emma G. Wald Humanities Prize, and the Chemical Rubber Handbook Prize.

The undergraduate winner of the Charles C. Ellis Memorial Scholarship was also to be announced at the ceremony.

A production of Dylan Thomas' "Under Millewood," developed by the Masque Readers Theatre, closed the festival at 7 p.m. Wednesday in the Mini Theatre, Ellis Hall.

U.S. Over-Spending For Defense? Come to Colloquy to Hear Sides

Brig. Gen. John F. Forrest and Sanford Gottlieb of SANE will be two of the speakers at a "Colloquy on War and Peace" Friday afternoon and evening, May 10, in Oller Hall at Juniata College.

The colloquy begins at 1:30 p.m. and will continue, with an intermission at 5 o'clock and a break from 5 to 6:30 for supper, until 8 p.m.

Topics to be discussed in the afternoon sessions are "How Much Defense?" and "How to Structure World Peace." The evening session will be devoted to rebuttal.

Dr. Harry F. Klug, professor of political science at Juniata and coordinator of the colloquy, said he expects to announce the names of two other speakers within the next fewdays.

Much of the discussion will be based on the Nixon administration's budget request of $81.1 billion for defense— $5.7 billion more than the current military budget. Many critics feel an increase is unnecessary because the United States is no longer fighting in Vietnam and since there has been an improvement in relations with the Soviet Union and mainland China. However, others maintain that an increase is necessary because of inflation and the added costs of an all-volunteer army.

Gen. Forrest is expected to defend the President's request for greater military expenditures. He presently serves as director of officer personnel at the U.S. Army Military Personnel Center in Alexandria, Va.

A graduate of the U.S. Military Academy, Gen. Forrest also holds the master of science degree in journalism from the University of Wisconsin and has studied at the Army War College at Carlisle, Pa., and at several other military schools.

His previous assignments included duty as a staff officer and then as chief of the Policy Branch, Policy and Programs Division, in the Office of the Chief of Information at Washington, D.C., and a year as a personnel staff officer at the U.S. Military Assistance Command in Vietnam.

Sanford Gottlieb is the executive director of SANE, a nationwide organization advocating reductions in military spending, disarmament agreements, and the negotiated settlement of international disputes. He joined SANE in 1960 and became executive director in 1967.

Gottlieb has testified frequently before Congressional committees and has presented SANE's views to the platform committees of both political parties. In addition, he has lectured and participated in panel discussions and debates at colleges and universities across the country and on numerous radio and television shows.

In November of 1972 The Washingtonian magazine called him one of the most important members of the "lobbying establishment" and last year his name appeared on the highly publicized White House "Enemies List." He also was one of four SANE representatives denied visas to Moscow last fall because of their support of Soviet dissidents.

Gottlieb served as adviser in 1965 to an interdenominational group of clergymen who visited South Vietnam on a fact-finding mission sponsored by the Fellowship of Reconciliation. He met annually from 1965 to 1968 with representatives of North Vietnam and the South Vietnamese National Liberation Front in Paris, Algiers, Prague and Moscow.

He coordinated a "March on Washington" which brought a re-

Dr. Fisher Slops Through Okeefenokee With Dwarts

by Brad Glassmoyer

Was it Shermann's army marching to the sea? A band of pack rats looking for shiny objects? No, it was Dr. Fisher and the other Dwarts infiltrating the South. The vertebrate zoology class traveled South to the Okeefenokee Swamp in Georgia on a nine day trip over the Easter break. The trip took us to the swamp, the Great Smokey Mountains, various state parks and forest, and the Atlantic coast.

Eighteen people acting insane, wearing shirts with the strange name Juniata on them, scurried about turning over rocks and logs, waded through roadside ditches, observed swamps while standing in them, and left no habitat unexamined. The purpose was to observe animals in their natural habitats and to collect live specimens. Even road kills were examined to see if they were in good shape.

We spent three days at the Okeefenokee Swamp area in Georgia. One day was spent on a walk through part of the Swamp and to a tower overlooking a section of

Dave Baer Completes Year in Office Reflects Upon It's Accomplishments

Since being out of office now for one week, I've had time to pause and reflect upon the year. I'm still too jaded to give a proper perspective so I'll not attempt to evaluate. Rather I would like to share some insights into Juniata College that few students recieve the opportunity to experience.

Prior to this year if somebody would have asked me "Whats so great about Juniata College?", I would in a reflex replied that the New Curriculum was at the heart of the matter and then go on to explain. I couldn't offer that same neat answer now. It doesn't do justice to the college. Certainly the New Curriculum would rank promently in priority and rightly so. I've encountered many students from other colleges and Universities this year and none were as involved or as excited about the programs at their institutions as students are here. Juniata was one of the first colleges in the nation to attempt such an innovative undertaking. Furthermore, we have succeded admirably in this endeaver while others have failed because two years were spent in extensive and comprehensive planning before the program was accepted by the faculty.

I think however, we must keep the new curriculum in perspective. It's not an academic panacea nor was it intended to be. I'm certain it brought more problems than the old curriculum and has placed greater burdens on students and faculty. At an alumni meeting recently I found that its not the first "New Curriculum" at Juniata. Its the product of dilligent efforts of a progressive college thats done an impeccable job of keeping pace with society. It's not a program that stamps out people with a renaissance ideology and a "liberal" education. Penn State takes care of that at less expense.

Rather its a philosophy of an academic community that allows a student to become a member of that community and not a warm body in seat 17. The success of the new Curriculum at this point depends on how sincerely we regard it as a philosophy and not as a program. The attitudes and values intrinsic in the New Curriculum can't be institutionalized into a program or a sterile classroom, but only from people interacting with people in an intelligent meaningful manner.

From my vantage point of a year in office, I can see that the paramount value of Juniata College lies not in the New Curri-

Stud. Gov't Voices Hopes For Future

As the 1974-75 term for Student Government begins, it is necessary not only to look at new things that need to be accomplished, but also evaluation of what has been done in the past. The new Student Government has a solid base to work from. We students have representatives to two of the primary decision making bodies, the faculty committees and the Board of Trustee's committees. We also have an established rapport with the Deans and President Stauffer. But still many decisions that affect the students are made behind closed doors. Our primary goal is opening those doors so you students can be heard. As a student government we want to be not only a representative link between different organizations on campus, but a voice for those ideas you support, and service to meet your needs on campus.

Work has begun on the student co-op. The primary emphasis has been towards selling used books and selling or renting of refrigerators. Many other projects such as course evaluations, selection of representatives to faculty committees, reasons for R.A. selection and others are being looked into and the results can be found at the issues desk Monday, Wednesday and Friday during dinner.

Finally we wish to express our appreciation for your support. It is only a beginning. Your cooperation is needed so that the government can best fulfill the needs of students. Our interest is in you.

Since this is the last "Juniatian" of the school year, I thought it appropriate to share with you some responses I've received to this column as a sort of informal assessment of its reception.

I must admit at the offset that your opening article or column was quite good, (at least it inspired me enough to write this rebuttal) but the concepts involved seemed to become blurred from the luminous glow of your goal. It seems you strive for the new 'individuality' or consciousness raising which you talk about in your article. It also seems from the article that this 'individuality' which you speak of is something that men instinctively have and something the women really doubt if there are many men of this society have to work for. I who have this 'individuality' or freedoms you seem to hold with such honor. In the end we are merely products of our society and to be a part of this society one must play the roles that society dictates. I don't agree with this way of living but it seems I can't escape the society than has dictated my role. There I admit I play a role and you must too and I really doubt my role is any better than yours. No one is any more individualistic than another, just a different role. At this state the best that can be hoped for is to realize the roles you play and realize their limitations. Of course, this is wrong and needs to be changed but I would think a much more successful path would be the enlistment of both men and women to change society for the better. I really doubt any significant changes will take place in our generation or the next but maybe in a century or so we will see the change. Why? Because our generation has already by the previous generation. Just as had most of their ideals impounded our educational system has effected our generation so will our educational system effect the next. I see no clear and easy path. I realize there are a lot of bumps on the road to a better society, but can we the people afford to separate into clans and try to combat the problem individually or must both men and women, brothers and sisters not just sisters work on the problem of a corrupt society to get any reasonable results. —An ACTOR in society.

MY REPLY: I agree whole-heartly with your idealism, but practically, we must break this blanket "problem of a corrupt society" into chewable bites, and organize, not "separate", into "clans" according to interest in these delineated aspects of our "problem"; sometimes, of course not necessarily, these interests will closely coincide with sex, or race, or religion, or. . .

Miller Honored for Service

Florence Miller was honored at a reception in the Faculty Club on April 30 for her 47 years of service to Juniata College. She was presented with a certificate of appreciation "for serving countless meals to Juniata students from 1927 to 1974." Her length of service is a record at Juniata and with earlier retirements becoming more common it may never be surpassed. A resident of Saxton, she plans to retire later this year.

Bergman Triumphs With "Smiles of a Summer Night"

I'm glad, since we're having Ingmar Bergman's Cries and Whispers this term, that we're also having Smiles of A Summer Night. Bergman has gotten increasingly somber, bitter, cynical and despairing. His movies are fantastic and beautiful but one comes away thinking: "How true — how TERRIBLE" But Smiles of a Summer Night, which is some twenty years old, isn't like that. It's real Bergman but it's so much happier. After all, Smiles of a Summer Night is the basis for the Broadway show A Little Night Music' and the plot, while greatly simplified, is much the same. I don't think that there is any other Bergman film which could be turned into a musical comedy without radical changes. Not even one that you'd dream of trying but this one really works.

Of course, there's a lot below the surface in Smiles. It looks on the outside like froth and mad-cap comedy and it is . . . to some extent. But there's a lot that isn't all as happily-ever-after as it looks.

Let me explain, the plot is as follow: Fredrik Egerman is a widow, forty-ish, who has remarried an eighteen year old wife. She is shy and unsure and he, not wanting to be too demanding, lets her try to decide far herself what she wants, so . . . some two years have passed and Anne, the bride, is still a virgin. To complicate matters, Fredrik's son, by his first marriage, is home from theological school and he is also a virgin — torn between natural desire and his religious training. He's trying to "get acquainted" with the maid, Petra, but since she is all "woman of the world" — knowing, he's not doing too well Fredrik, to break the monotony of his daily life with Anne — not that he doesn't love her — goes to see an old flame, Desiree Armfeldt, who is an actress. She, in the meantime, has taken up with one Count Malcolm, who is very jealous and has a very jealous wife, Charlotte, who just happens to know Anne. Sounds a little like "As the World Turns," doesn't it? And, Desiree's ancient, supercool mother gets them all together at a week-end party. Isn't that nice?

I know it sounds contrived and too very soap-operish but its really great. The characters are well-defined and real and the acting is all very good. It comes off as a really fine film. And the ending, while it seemed a little less than perfect when I thought about it, is workable and a thousand times more hopeful than the ending of any other Bergman flick.

Anyway, see both films to get an idea of both sides of Bergman because f you just see Smiles of a Summer Night you'll think he's a Swedish Vincente Minelli and if you just see Cries and Whispers you'll really wonder where his mind is. Of course, you may see both and still wonder but give it a try. Smiles of a Summer Night will be shown in Alumni Hall on Friday, May 10, at 8:00 p.m. Admission will be $.25 without a ticket.

"Cries and Whispers": Fantastic! A Must! Not To Be Missed!

by Brad Rudy

I realize that when superlatives are used in any critical writing, skepticism on the part of the reader is expected. But we are affected by different films in different ways, and can therefore make a heirarchy of quality in the art. So, without any hesitation, I can say that Ingmar Bergman's Cries and Whispers is the best movie I've seen. I have never seen a more visually stunning film, four more perfectly created characters, and I have never been so emotionally affected by any other film or work of literature

Now, you very justly ask, "What is this paragon of cinematic art about?" Not very much: at its most superficial levels, merely life, death, love, self-deception, dying aristocracy, maternal apathy, sibling rivalry, marital infidelity, and sexual and emotional frigidity. As in many Bergman films, the plot is deceptively simple: Two women, Karin and Maria, go to the house of their sister Agnes, who is dying of cancer of the womb. The only other occupant of the house is Anna, a silent and overweight maidservant. Through the use of flashbacks, each of these women is analytically detailed, particularly their relative capacities for love. When Agnes finally dies, she can't find any solace, so her corpse comes to life to seek the love of her sisters. Rejected by them, she finds eventual rest through the affections of Anna, who, ironically, has been rejected by all three aristocratic sisters.

What is truly remarkable about the film, though, is the complexity with which each of the four women is revealed. What they have in common is that they are all trapped by their physical bodies; they are spiritually superior to all the men in their lives (appearing only in flashbacks), but they are ultimately destroyed or rewarded by their physical womanhood. Agnes dies of womb cancer—a problem no male can possibly suffer. Karin is repelled by her own body, becoming both physically and emotionally frigid. She castrates herself to escape the sexuality of her priggish husband, revelling in her freedom despite her pain. Maria is opposite: She is sexually excited by anything physical, capable of being seduced by merely watching her lover eating. Her physica needs trap her in her own body, making her incapable of any real or deeply felt emotion. She drives her husband to suicide by her affairs, yet she can show no emotion at his death except maybe a perverse satisfaction.

It is through Agnes that Bergman shows us woman's greatest capacity for love. Being deprived of any affection by her mother (She is seldom permitted to even touch her), she can turn only to her sisters for emotional satisfaction. No man can possibly give her enough fulfillment, so she remains unmarried until her death. But even death is no comfort; her corpse must reach out to her sisters for still more love. They reject her. It is only through the cow-like Anna that Agnes can finally find peace. Anna, who is rejected because of her lower class, who suffered the loss of her daughter, loves Agnes as if she were her own. But, ironically, it is the touch of Anna's body that settles Agnes. In the final analysis, then, she too wss more physical than "ethereal"—she too craved physical fulfillment, but in a strangely unperverse perverse manner. After all, it was her mother's touch which she craved.

Throughout, then, the only one who acheives any sort of emotional victory is Anna, though it is lost right away. She who is rejected by everyone, finds the love she lost with her daughter. It is she who receives Agnes' life—the diary she kept throughout her illness. The sisters get everything of Agnes, but Anna gets Agnes. Anna, in the final moments of the film, reads from the diary that it was only when Agnes was with the love of her sisters that she could "Experience perfection."

Cries and Whispers was nominated for five academy awards this year (including best picture), winning one for Sven Nykvist's incredible cinematography which makes the lush reds and whites of the house and costumes seem to bleed off the screen. Last year, the film was named best picture by the New York film critics. It stars Bergman regulars Liv Ullman (Maria), Ingrid Thulin (Karin), and Harriet Anderson (Agnes) with Kari Sylwan making an impressive debut as Anna. It will be shown Saturday, May 11 at 8 P.M. in Alumni Hall, admision being 50¢ without a series ticket. I think one of the most impressive shots I've seen in any film is that of Anna cradling the dead Agnes against her huge body—it captures in a single moment the anguish and freedom of both women.

Sabbaticals Granted to Professors

Sabbatical leave for the 1974-75 academic year has been granted to: Dr. Kenneth W. Crosby, professor of history, to study in South America; William L. Hofelt, Jr., assistant professor of English, to do doctoral research in England; Dr. Richard E. Hunter, professor of English, to edit a book entitled The Anatomy of Melancholy; Dr. Kenneth H. Rockwell, professor of biology, to study at Stanford; Dr. Paul D. Schettler, Jr., professor of chemistry, to do research in metal- ammonia solutions and travel to Catholic University, Lille, France.

Leave of absence has been granted to: Dr. Robert B. Hall, assistant professor of physics, solar energy research at the University of Delaware; Dr. Esther M. Doyle, Dana Supported Professor of English, to edit the second volume of Studies in Interpretation; Dr. Evelyn G. Guss, Brumbaugh Professor of Classics, to spend another year teaching English at Birzeit College in Israeli-occupied Jordan; Dr. Duane F. Stroman, associate professor of sociology and assistant academic dean, to take studies in sociology and social science; Dr. Robert H. Washburn, associate professor of geology, studies in science.

McDonald Reads From "Tiger Express"

"Tiger Express," a spoken collection of poetry by Jim McDonald, will be presented by Kynsic, the JC literary magazine on May 14, Tuesday, at 8:15 p.m. The reading will take place in the Ellis Hall Mini-stage. Everyone is invited. There is no charge.

McDonald is a JC senior who has been writing for several years. This year he has done a three term independent study with Mr. Church His last reading was at Cornell University last spring.

McDonald will read a variety of poems including "Reminiscing With A Student Rebel," "A Distant Place," a poem that looks at an amputee clinic, "Old Enough TO be A Messiah," a kind of birthday poem, "My Name's Burt. I Race Bikes," a dramatic narrative concerning a professional motocross racer and other.

McDonald has been awarded a University Graduate Scholarship from the University of Cincinnatti for next year.

Five boats were used and each boat could go their own way. The third day we went to Jekyll Island State Park which is a beach. Returning North we stopped at Rabun Lake in Georgia and then moved on to the Great Smokies. While in the Smokies we drove through a snow storm at the tops of the mountains.

Each night after we had cooked our meals we could do as we wished but a nightly event was the awarding of the Dwart. (to find out what a Dwart is ask one or take the trip next year)

This trip was a highlite of my four years at JC for what you learn in the classroom you get to see in the real world. A GREAT TRIP!

Know Rules Before You Drown!

1. The regatta will be held Saturday, May 11, 1974, starting at 1:00 p.m. location to be announced.
2. The race is open to the total college community.
3. Cash prizes will be awarded to student rafts only.
4. Rafts must be constructed by the entrants and carry at least two persons.
5. Minimum dimensions of rafts will be 6 feet x 6 feet.
6. Any means of propulsion may be used as long as it is human powered.
7. Each raft must begin and end with the same number of people on the raft.
8. Each person riding on the raft must wear an approved life jacket. A limited supply of jackets wil be supplied by the committee. If any person on a raft does not have a life jacket, that raft will be eliminated from the race.
9. Complete course must be traveled in the water.
10. There will be no willful destruction of opponents rafts.
11. No canoes, kayaks of any type, or commercially manufactured water vehicles will be permitted to enter.
12. A truck will be available to transport rafts to and from the race, start and finish. Times open for delivery and return are available at the information desk in Ellis Hall. These are the only times available for delivery and return by the truck. You must be ready at your chosen times or you will forfeit your chance for delivery or return by this truck. Sufficient help must be provided by each raft crew to transport the raft.
13. All rafts must be removed from the finish area within 48 hours after the finish of the race.
14. Each raft crew must provide one person to help clean up the start area immediately after the last raft has started.
15. There will be a five dollar deposit paid at registration time. This deposit will be forfeited if rules 13 and 14 are not followed.
16. Each raft and crew member with that raft must clearly indicate the registration number assigned to them.
17. Rafts will be judged in the following areas: Construction, theme and position of finish in the race. Judging will be done throughout the total race.
18. There will be three judges. They will each assign points in the following ways:

    Total points to be awarded — 100 points per judge — 300 points

    Theme — 1st 35
    Originality of Design — 2nd 30
    Commensurate with theme — 3rd 25, 4th 20, 5th 15

    Total points to be awarded — 115 points per judge — 345 points

    Race finish (fastest time from "go" to touching land) — 1st 200, 2nd 150, 3rd 100, 4th 50, 5th 25

    Total points to be awarded — 525
19. Prizes are: 1st, $100.00; 2nd, $50.00; 3rd, $25.00; 4th, $15.00; 5th, $10.00
20. All rafts must be registered by May 8, 1974.

Center Board Elections??

Due to the lack of interest or iniatiave on the part of most students most of the positions on next years center board have been chosen. No you didn't miss the election, there wasn't one. It seems that for all but one of the positions only one person turned in a petition. The position of Secretary-Treasurer has drawn a blank as no one seems interested. Anyone willing to take the position should contact Bruce Bader or stop off at the information desk. The lone contest for center board will be for the position of concert committee. The election for center board along with the election for class officers will be held next Tuesday, May 13. The following are the positions and the new officials: General Chairman: Sam Sirianni, Fine Arts Chairman: Dave Brown, Film Series Chairman: Brad Rudy, Concert Committee: John Comerford vs Music Committee: John Andoniades, Recreation: Lynn Newton, Coffeehouse: Judy Huss, Special Activities: Ellen Vallentine.

"Under Milkwood" on Mini-Stage

To begin at the beginning Milkwood. a tiny hamlet under Llareggub Hill in Wales, provides the homes for various persons of unquestionable vitality: Mae Rose Cottage, seventeen and never been kissed ho ho; Dai Bread with two wives (one for day. one for night); Polly Garter who has a problem with babies; Organ Morgan who has a problem with Bach; Myfamwy Price and Mog Edwards, two lovers to ever marry; Blind Captain Cat, who knows the rituals of the town by heart; Mr. Pugh, who secretly plans to poison his nagging wife; and, of course, the Cherry Owens who just live. This is only a handful of the characters you will meet in the Masque Club's reader's too much in love with their money theater production of Under Milkwood by Dylan Thomas.

There's Still Hope!

by Dave Judd

With Saturdays sweep of the double-header with Delaware Valley the baseball team rekindled their post season playoffs hopes. The Indians may have a chance at an invitation to the ECAC playoffs if they finish their 1974 season in a flurry.

Mark Amatucci pitched a strong five hitter going the distance in the opening game to best Delaware Valley 12-1. Jim Slovick pitched an equally fine game, (also going the distance) but was not assured a victory until in the bottom of the seventh inning Barry Hartley knocked across the winning run with a shot to deep left center field.

The baseball team winds up their regular season Saturday, May 11, with Lock Haven, game time is 1:00.

culum, the Science building or in 10 million dollars of endowment. Its real value lies in the human forces which have been and will be collectely united in the realization of Juniata's outstanding assets and facilities.

I would suspect that a typical student reaction is "what's he high on?". I guess I'm high on watching Alumni, Faculty, administration, Trustees, Friends of the College and EVEN STUDENTS give a hell of a lot of themselves with no expectation of return. Combined they pay for a third of the operating costs of the college, but more importantly they offer an inestimatable wealth in talents and resourses. It was the human element in the past that made Juniata an outstanding institution and the same element presents its only hope for the future.

I wish to sincerely thank all the individuals who made my year in office possible and hope that they will continue to lend support to the new administration in Student Government.

It will be presented this week on Wednesday at 7 and on Thursday at 8 in the Ellis Hall mini-stage This "play for voices" folows a day in the life of this not-too-ordinary town from the "moonless night, starless and bible-black" until "the suddenly wind-shaken wood springs awake for the second time this one spring day.'"

Track Stumbles At MAC'S; Zimmerman Lone Champ

To say that the Indians had a bad day would be putting it mildly! Juniata in its bid to repeat as MAC champions fell on some hard times last Saturday at Dickinson. Costly injuries to Kim Witmer and Mike Slough proved to be too much for the Indians to overcome as the Indians, without their 2 top pointsman, were able to accumulate only 13 points.

Bob Zimmerman proved to be the only member to perform up to par as he sweep the pole vault for the 4th straight year. In fact the pole vault proved to be the key area for the team as Juniata registered 3 places, 1st, 3rd and 5th. (3rd and 5th went to Dan Bausher and Bruce Bowen) Carl Koval got the only other place for the team as he finished 4th in the 880. One school record fell in the meet as Kim Witmer ran his fastest time in the 440 and broke the school record with a 49.4, breaking Slough's record by a tenth of a second. Thus the season came to a halt on a rather dismal note as the team had high expectations and hopes for a 2nd consecutive championship.

State Revises Financial Aid

The Pennsylvania Higher Education Assistance Agency (PHEAA) said Thursday that college students from families with annual incomes of up to $18,000 would be eligible for state grants, beginning with the 1974-1975 academic year.

In the past, students whose family incomes were more than $15,000 a year were usually ineligible for state grants administered by the PHEAA.

This change affects not only money from the PHEAA, but the money processed through the Juniata College financial aid office. If you have any questions please contact Ron Shunk, Director of Financial Aid, Founders Hall.

THE JUNIATIAN

VOL. XLVIII NO. 1 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | SEPTEMBER 26, 1974

Reflections of Junior Year Abroad

by Students of Marburg

After a tumultuous year studing at Phillips Universitat in Marburg/Lahn, West Germany, Nancy Burke, Mike Held, Jeanne McStay, Karin Ritchie and Courtnaye Rhone contemplated a year of exploring not only the world, but themselves as individuals. Each of them were indeed ambassadors in their own right exchanging ideas, hopes, desires and culture as they searched for a universal understanding in mankind; destroying the American myth that cast a very negative light on Americans in general and giving to the German people ourselves as proof that one can't stereotype a nation or a people, but that each individual is a separate and free entity, emitting a pulsating life force to be recognized by anyone objective enough to understand that these are the people who make up a nation, who make up the world.

We quickly focus our immediate attentions on not only ourselves as American citizens, but on our nation as well. We left this country at a tie when the nation was in the midst of innumerable crises and we admit freely that it was frightening not knowing all the details that were involved in the news, but we took the initiative to find out and question ourselves. We were cognizant of how secure we felt at home and in ways apathetic to our domestic problems. Indeed as we conducted a self-awareness as individuals, we also examined our home life with great concern and many times with good constructive criticism. It was evident too, how politics was an institution that we took for granted and never expressed interest, but we found in the German people that politics was something that the people lived day-in and day-out. It expressed an identity in each individual from the very conservation to the most radical, and we too, become more objective to various political parties and the deep meanings that each held, because the people that we met had political affiliations as vast and different as the people themselves.

The atmosphere of Germany was found to be one of casualness and warmth, with the general pace of life equal to that of a snail's pace. People would take time for cake and coffee at anyone of the numerous cafes to discuss and put life into perspective after a hetic day of classes or just because the urge struck you. We found ourselves in a world of people, enjoyed doing things spontaneously, like going to a student pub, taking in a movie, hiking, cooking together in our hall kitchens that brought together the pulse of the hall and its students of various fields, not to mention our numerous parties which seldom offered a dull moment. One must readily admit that our co-ed life style offered a lot in the way of enjoying and accepting the joys of life outside that of academics. It was found to be more a more natural way of living, and we gained a respect for each other as people, not in terms of male and female entities.

One might read this and wonder if we were ever students, and we give a very emphatic "yes!" Our various programs were extremely diverse and we found studing at the university with the German students a challenge beyond comprehension. Each semester we had two weeks to visit classes before we made a permanent decision on course selections, and we confronted the profs privately to make them aware that we had to take exams for a grade to be transferred back to J.C. Many profs treated us no differently than other students and exams were quite an experience, to say the least. In general, because of the difference in the educational structures between our two countries, we noted the Germans' true devotion to education because of interests, and not plagued by issues of studying for a good average, with a goal of working to make lots of money. Self-satisfaction was their prime goal, and accomplishing, themselves as a people, was more of an issue after having been stringently disciplined academically before reaching the university, and taking a special test which qualifies them to study at the institution, which makes the SAT's look like a scene out of Sesame Street. We are proud to say that we can see the worth of our liberal arts education in the U.S., because many Germans that we met, study a particular field with no practical emphasis on other areas of study, giving them a narrow scope in academics.

After having returned, we notice how we did without many material goods and once we arrived home, we were sapable of relating to the extravagances in our lives. Not that we'd give these things up, now that we've returned, but it's good to know that we can do without a lot of our items of "need".

In closing, we'd like to express to JC, our happiness in being back home seeing old friends and feeling like we belong, as if we had never

by Perry Habecker

The quantity and quality of the stereos on campus boggles the mind. In addition to this, the collection of recordings probably represent an investment equal to the stereo system. Would it be an understatement to say that Juniata is musically oriented? I don't think so. In fact I'll go so far as to speculate that there is a bit of a musician in every serious music listener. Now if we conservatively propose that for every ten music listeners there is one amateur instrumentalist, there must be nearly 100 people on campus who play musical instruments. But where are they? This is the question the members of the concert band have been asking.

This year we have a new music department professor dedicated to the organization of instrumental music. Mr. Ibrook Tower has done just about everything he can do to recruit instrumentalists, except wander through the dorms listening for stereos. (Do you remember throwing out that two-page letter you received in the mail?) He already has the nucleus of a band, but many more talents are needed. And, Yes, he knows that concert band music is not the type of stuff that gets put on turntables. This, however, should not be an excuse for not picking up the horn you dropped after high school. If the band idea doesn't interest you, other opportunities are available. A collegium musicum and various ensembles are being planned. Private lessons on instruments are available for credit.

Don't be a miser with your time. Band takes up four hours per week at the most. The band has been meeting Tuesdays and Thursdays in the basement of Lesher at 6 o'clock.

Mr. Tower is a native of the Washington, D.C. area. He is a conservatory, trained musician having studied at Peabody in Baltimore and Temple University in Philadelphia. He was formerly band director at Muhlenburg College. He has taught at Moravian College and Wilmington Music School.

'Goat Island' Offers Many Exciting Parts

Professor Clayton Briggs, Associate Professor of Speech and Theatre, announces it is time for the campus to stage a nice family drama on campus, something like "Apple's Way", "All in the Family" and "The Walton's". He has selected a modern Italian play by Ugo Betti. It is affectionately called "CRIME ON GOAT ISLAND". It has all the ingredients a modern audience expects from good TV drama; lonliness, hatred, jealousy, love, seduction and murder.

"CRIME ON GOAT ISLAND" has been compared with Pirandello's SIX CHARACTERS IN SEARCH OF AN AUTHOR as one of the most original contributions to the modern Italian Theatre. There are excellent character roles for three women and two men.

Betti's story concerns a soldier who appears at the home of a dead colleague-in-arms. This soldier was told the most intimate details of the sexual relationship between the wife and the deceased soldier. He usurps his comrades position in the wife's affections, as well as seduces the sister and daughter before finally meeting his own end in a dramatically electrifying final scene. Betti develops his story into a convincing demonstration of the self-destroying power of untrammelled se .al power.

Open tryouts will be held Tuesday and Wednesday from 4-5:30 in the basement of Oller Hall and is open to all students, faculty and staff without regard to previous experience.

Government Wants Your Views Heard

by Tim Reimer

Student Government can be viewed as a "lobbying" group for the students; as the Student Government is the only constant organization available to the students through which they can hope to influence the faculty and administration. To perform as a "lobbying" group the Student Government needs to hear students opinion. Unless students are aware of the issues and activities going down on the campus they can't form any opinion. This weekly article is intended to help students be informed about what is happening in Student Government. Keep us on the track by sending questions, complaints and concerns about the content and effectiveness of this article, to Box 155 or call Tim Reimer at 643-9864.

The Issues Desk is now in operation Monday through Friday from 5:30 to 6:30. Stop there to find out what is new in Student Government and to let Student Government know what you think about it. At the Issues Desk this week you can sign up for the Admissions Committee. This committee will consist of 5 women and 5 men, who will work under the Director of Admissions in helping to coordinate the Admissions Program. The Student Legal Rights Committee is forming again this year. To become a member sign the list outside the Student Government Office door. If you have any questions concerning the S. L. R. Economy, Faculty Concern JC Government This Year

by Carl Glaeser

The Student Government this year will attempt to accomplish several goals. With the combined talents of the college community the government will continue to assist the student consumer, help enhance the student-faculty relationship and to improve communication within the student body.

Traditionally, the designated purpose of the Student Government was to serve as a lobbying organization. This year the Student Government will strive to serve its designated purpose and continue its traditional effort to eliminate injustices found in social policies.

In the days of inflation, with a stagnant economy, student consumerism is a necessary step to help students stay in today's marketplace. The Student Government, realizing this need, has instituded a refrigerator leasing program that realizes a savings of 50% over local prices for students. Also, the Student Government is giving initial help to begin work on a co-operative for the purpose of buying records. This is just a beginning to what we hope will be a continuing effort to help students with the problems they are facing in today's economy.

Juniata has a tradition of a close relationship between faculty and students. We feel that this relationship has been enhanced by the students serving on faculty committees, and could be still further enhanced by informal social gatherings and full participation in college sponsered events.

In order for this, or any form of government, to operate at or near optimum level of performance, it is imperative that the decision-making process be in the hands of the people that are directly affected by its decisions. This is the ideal concept behind the issues desk, a place where the electorate/student body has the opportunity to question the accountability of their representatives and discuss with the representatives issues that they think are important. Issues concerning the food service, policies on drinking, etc. have been discussed at the desk. At the present students may see need to question the Student Affairs Staff concerning their new "clarification of policies," with roving R. A.'s and emergency service on weekends.

It is necessary for students to show concern about the issues that affect their lives on a day to day basis. The issues desk is just one place where students have the opportunity to discuss things that are

by Brad Rudy

There has been a lot of discussion going around as to the relative quality of this year's films series. As I am not the only one taking heat, I feel this article is necessary, both to make clear my attitudes towards the series, and, as an apology to other members of Center Board who may be taking criticism meant for me.

First of all, a complaint has been aired that all the films were picked by me without consulting a committee or the student body. My only defense is hat this is the way it's always been done. Up until last year, the series was picked by an appointee with nothing but budgetary connections with Center Board. This was originally a faculty member, but, as student interest in film grew, the duties were transferred and that system was in effect until last year, when the "powers-that-be" decided that the series would be chosen by committee, namely, the Board's Fine Arts Committee. The results were expected. Everyone on the committee wanted to get his or her favorite movies and thus, nothing was accomplished. The wealth of movies available predicted this result. Then, the idea of the "extra" movies was devised. Fine! A committee is effective in drawing up a list of varying interest for a mass-student vote. (interestingly though, less than half of these were ever returned!) It still remained, though, that the regular series was picked by one person (with much advise). This created a more unified series than would have been expected with a committee. The "extras" provided popular entertainment which paid for itself from higher admissions. Unfortunately, those "powers-that-be" decided this year that Center Board was making too much money for a non-profit organization (In the case of the film series, we were allotted a $3000 budget, we spent around $6000 and took in maybe $3500). Therefore, they imposed a $14,500 deficit which must be paid before we can start making money!!! ??? This means the money we take in goes into this deficit fund rather than back into the series, which means that extra films had to be eliminated (at least for the time being).

Now, the main complaint everyone has is "Why is the film series lousier than last year?" For some odd reason, though, when asked which films are "lousy", which these people have seen, they can't answer. It seems they are imposing value judgments such as "lousy" on films they've never seen, and, for the most part, haven't heard of. This attitude seems strangely inconsistent with the liberal open-mindedness usually prevalent in a college-level environment. The truth of the matter is that content-wise, style-wise, value-wise, and even entertainment-wise, most of this year's films are far better than the majority of last year's. I feel I have chosen examples of some of the greatest filmmakers in the world (Visconti, Ozu, Kubrick, Fellini, Anderson, Lumet, Capra, Minnelli, Troll, and Wyler), examples of some of the greatest performers in the world (Danny Kaye, Dirk Bogarde, Peter Sellers, Giulietta Masina, Marcello Mastroianni, Anthony Quinn, Malcolm McDowell, Howard Keel, Liv Ullman, and Max von Sndow), and some of the most popular and entertaining movies ever made ("It Happened One Night," "Dr. Strange-love," and "Seven Brides for Seven Brothers"). The fact that many of the titles are obscure to many people surprises me, but the fact that they pass negative judgments on them because of their obscurity surprises me even more. I suppose this attitude really can't be helped, but our committee is working hard to provide enough information on the movies in advance. All we ask is that you take the time to read this information.

Finally, one of the most absurd arguments I've heard is that many of the films are highly intellectual in style and content, and that the students want to go to a movie they know and can relax with. To some extent, this may be so, but it would be defeating the purpose of the series to cater to it, wasting money on entertainment that is available to the students any time and anywhere. We provide information to please such students, namely, where they can go for such escapism, and opinion on current films, but our main purpose is to broaden the students' appreciation of film, not confine it to a few recent or popular favorites. We do this mainly with "obscure" titles—these have all been critically successful and represent a broad range of topics, styles, moods, and even languages. We believe that the more familiar the student is with the art in film, the more he can appreciate his favorites. But, if we get no audience, we fail. We get no audience because the students don't want to "try out" something new. So, to attract you, the next few films will be free, and, after we start charging again, the more difficult films will remain free (this alone will help you know the demands the movie will make on you). Also, beginning soon, we will be running a serial—something on the line of those old "Perils of Pauline"-style cliffhanger epics. (This will be chosen by my committee, not by me alone.)

In conclusion, then, I can't expect you to enjoy every movie—the variety is too great to please anyone but the most enthusiastic fanatic every week. But, I guarantee you will enjoy some, and the ones you don't, well, at least you'll have the satisfaction of seeing for yourself why the critics were wrong. My interest in films was created by past series, and I hope yours will be by the present.

by Henry Siedzikowski

Since inheriting this column, I have given quite a bit of thought to themes that I might follow. I have finally decided to dedicate this year to the "sense of Community" at old JC. So this year, you will be seeing various articles on this theme under this by-line.

This theme will not become a limiting factor, however. The next column will be dedicated to the drinking policy and its ramifications on our sense of community.

This week, however, I have a topic that is of interest to everyone, namely money. Specifically in question, is the $3800 that we pay for the privilege of attending Juniata College for a year. Now, even though this represents a new high, I am not complaining about it, per se.

This year, however, we have all returned to find belts tightning. With rampant inflation, this is easily understandable. But since we students are part of the Juniata "community", it does not seem unreasonable that we should have some say in where the cuts are made.

I can already hear the administration protesting that the Student Government was consulted. In the literal sense, this may be true. But, I question how any student could provide intelligent input into this process when none of us are allowed to see the breakdown of where our money goes.

Therefore, I am offering as my first suggestion towards improving Juniata's "sense of community," that the Budget Office provide any interested student with this information concerning their inclusive fee. This does not seem unreasonable if we are indeed equal members of a community. Now, we will find out if the administration views things this way, or perhaps they have latent visions of superiority.

P.S. If anyone is strongly moved by my columns, please write to me in care of the Juniatian.Perhaps we can print a few of the best.

Rec. Facilities For Students

by David Corman

Do you like to spend a leisure afternoon canoeing, but just can't seem to find space in your room for a canoe? Do you think it would be great to go camping some night, but don't have the equipment? Well, thanks to the Center Board recreation committee you can! Canoes can be provided by the Student Center.

But that's not all the recreation committee does! They maintain the pool tables and pinball machine in the College Center and television viewing in dorm lounge areas. The committee also sponsors a Bicycle Rally, Soap-Box Derby, a Raft Race, and several tournaments.

This years Center Board, through its recreation committee, hopes to expand its recreational facilities for

— EDITORIAL —

As we begin a new year here at Juniata I see many needs that must be fullfilled if we are to grow as a community. One of the major needs is that of efficent communication throughout the campus. As editor of the Juniatian I intend to have a bias in favor of the Juniatian as the best means in attaining this goal.

The paper has been somewhat rejuvenated in the past few years and now seems to be solidly on its' feet, at least for the moment. I feel that the newly formed editorial staff we will be able to provide the leadership that is necessary to make the Juniatian the effective media that it has the potentiol to become. If we are to realize this potential however it must be a group effort, that group being the entire Juniata community. This may seem a somewhat unrealistic viewpoint but if we are to succeed we need the help of all, not only as workers but as readers, who make the work all worthwhile.

For the coming year We the editorial staff of the Juniatian have an appropriate theme, "Juniata for the student." We feel that Juniata is more than just 15 hours of classes a week and a bullentin board with lists of rides home. Juniata is what each of us make it to be. This year we feel it is our job to let all students know just what is going not only through a weekly calendar of events, but through reports of why things are happening and when. This hopefully will range from academic policies to social events on campus, each equally important in making Juniata what it will be in the year 1974-5.

As for what exactly goes into the paper every week is pretty much up to you. We are open to any and all suggestions, however if you do not communicate these ideas to us the paper will remain pretty much what we, the editors, want it to be. So I leave it at that, we are open to you, now it is your decision. For those who decide in favor of the paper we welcome your help. Drop an idea or reaction in Box 1024 and we will be off and running.

Center Board And Anthropologist Desire Higher Student Standards

Margaret Mead, the anthropologist, has pointed out the prevailing, desolating fact that most of our young people live "partial lives," seeking only what is called "getting something out of life"—in a hurry, while there is still time—and not much concerned with putting something back. Margaret Mead, unfortunately, is right. Recent studies of student attitudes across the country show that a job and personal acceptability (which usually means marrying well) head the rewards students seek from their higher education. Only 17% except that being active in their communities will be even one of three goals really important in their outlook.

Well, Center Board committeemen are not living partial lives. They are clearly among the 17% who care. And this the Center has something explicitly to do with. Because showing how to put something back is what the Center exists for.

We don't advertise it in the campus newspaper or on our posters, but the other official name for the Center is the Division of Social Education. Now this doesn't mean education in the social amenities, though some of the inhabitants of the campus and this building could stand a five credit course in this . . . It means, in short, education in bringing one's personal talents to bear as social forces—learning, as Margaret Mead urged, how to help to carry civilization forward.

—"The Meaning of Union Committee Work"

The question that Center enterprise poses, in effect, is: "Good grades, degree, maybe honors — so what? What does this mean to anybody else, to society? What else do you plan to do?"

The students who volunteer for center work don't wait to answer the question some other time. College, to them, is not just a "preparation for citizenship," as the saying goes — something to get at sometime in the future, maybe. Taking on social responsibility is here and now.

The Center building is, of course, the great facilitator — a visible, matchless opportunity for giving as well as getting — with all the doors wide open for students to come together to make good things happen.

But why in the end should anyone respond to the call for long hours of volunteer service without much recognition? Why should you? Why not just hit the books? Or get married, settle down, and forget it all?

Some of you, no doubt, seek a sense of accomplishment, a change of pace from the workaday world, maybe self-expression, or to make new friends, or only to belong. As a Canadian writer said, there is no better way to avoid feelings of futility or to counteract the depressing effects of world crises, or personal crises, than by engaging in thoughtful work with or for others. Our richest experiences come when we are acting with other people to achieve some common goal. The end result is self-fulfillment — which is different from self-interest and on a higher plane.

But there is more to it than self-fulfillment, or even the romantic idea of giving one's self to a cause. Self-fulfillment cannot be separated from the interests of the rest of the community. The contribution made by individuals and groups voluntarily is the real foundation of a democratic society . . . .

It is fundamental in democracy that citizens must take part. Every person in a free society can help in his individual way to shape it — by working with other on a social need and offering the help it is in his power to give. We do what we can because it is the thing to do — the essence of a self-governing society. And it counts. The unofficial Peace Corps motto is "I am only one, but still I am one. I cannot do everything, but still I can do something." And Longfellow said: "Give what you have. To someone, it may be better than you dare think."

This is the meaning of your committee work and the long hours you spend.

The College Center offers a rich and varied life. We hope you'll enjoy its many opportunities.

Nothing Like Getting Involved

by Steve Townsend

I set my suit case down in front of Cloister. I was very glad a new year had dawned at Juniata. Upon entering the room, the layers of dust quickly told me that not a whole lot was new except an additional 500 dollars for this year's academic sunrise. But I was in no mood to translate that figure into total hours in the dishroom. I wanted sleep. The ride to Huntingdon was long, and a '62 black Mercury that looks and performs like a religious relic didn't speed up the trip at all.

I was almost asleep when my roommate arrived and jumped on the top bunk. His 190 lbs. did everything but send the upper bunk crashing against my nose.

"Holy shit! Did you see that!? The bed almost collapsed on my face!!"

The supports to our bunk were very nearly non-existent. Thanks to some saving grace I was spared from becoming a grease spot on an already heavily stained mattress.

"For 3,800 dollars I can put up with filthy bathrooms, advanced boredom, and virtually no girls, but I'm not going to risk my life everytime I go to bed!"

The bed was the final straw. Right on the spot I vowed upon my sacred copy of Hunter S. Thompson's Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas that this year would bring changes. No more apathy. The word for 1974 was involvement.

My first step toward becoming "involved" was to attend a meeting of Juniata's dynamic Student Government. Familiarize myself with the wheels of politics. Develop a style of my own. Bring needed changes through action packed confrontation politics. With note pad in hand I attended this year's second; controversial meeting. I was amazed to discover that a great variety of pressing issues were discussed.

The Student Concerns Committee was proud to point out that last year's seniors favored the semester system by a startling 45-43 percent margin.

The Public Relations Committee reported that they were making signs.

The legal status of student felons was debated, and a Juniata representative to the National Student Lobby reported that the were "quite surprised" that the convention elected women to the posts of President and Vice-President.

A speaker representing Center Board reported that Art Garfunkel could be brought to campus if they had another 1,500 dollars. He was given tentative approval to look for more money.

And finally it was stated that the Provost was "sitting on" an amendment to the co-habitation policy.

With so many life and death issues urgently needing attention, I had a hard time deciding where my services would be most useful. I finally decided that the liberal cause would be best served if I fixed my bunks. After all, things could be worse. I could be sleeping on the floor, and Student Government could be debating whether or not to officially support Shirley Temple for President.

gone. One thing we missed last year, was hearing the latest news from JC, and we would suggest to the administration, to keep those students studying abroad this year, and in years to come, informed as to campus news, such as student affairs, course offerings, and available life styles. We encourage anyone who wishes to inquire about our year to feel free, because we'd like to share our travels and experiences with you, if you are interested.

happening. All Senate meetings are open to the college community, the senators and all representatives are accountable to the body that elects them.

The Student Government will continue to serve the students in the direction in which they desire.

Feelings About Freshmen

by Christie Coyne

What do you think of the Freshman class?

Kathy King, a sophomore, thinks the freshman are friendly.

Mark Smith, a sophomore, thinks the freshman have adapted fairly well so far. They're finding out what college is about and seem to be getting used to it. He says only time will tell if this friendly class is going to get it together or flop.

Petra Theodos, a junior, doesn't know too many freshmen. She has noticed that there are a lot of freshman girls going out for field hockey. As an overall opinion she thinks this class isn't sure of themselves, which, she added, is typical of every freshmen class.

Dave Antolik, a junior, thinks the freshman are a little more rowdy than other years. He sums up his feelings by stating that this class is just alright.

Junior, Diane Dawson, feels the freshmen are getting involved in school activities. She says they show enthusiasm. They seem to want to go out and do something instead of sitting around.

Sue Armes, a junior, sums up her opinion of the freshmen class saying they have a lot of perspective.

Nancy Floyd, a senior, says that out of the freshmen she knows, she thinks they're getting involved in the different activities. She thinks they're taking care of themselves pretty well.

you. Already, the possibility of tournament competition on reginal, state, and national levels in billiards, bridge, chess, and table tennis is being investigated. But the committee needs your help. A meeting for interested students will be held in the near future— so watch for announcements of the time and place. See you there!

may be checked out at the Center Main Desk.

Campus activities are coordinated here and a calendar of events is available.

Students Organizations busily occupy offices on the Ground Floor as well as the Bookstore, Post Office, dark room, and television lounge. The first and second floors offer rooms for committee meetings, lectures, discussions, films, receptions, and luncheons. The Campus Minister and Food Service have their offices in the Center.

The Snack Bar, especially between classes and during lunch, is a good place to see people. Relatively quick snacks—but relatively long talks. And always the hot coffee!

The Center is pleased to announce that again this year the Middle School Pool is open to Juniata students. The fee is 25¢ per person. On Friday evenings, the pool is available for group rental. Contact Mr. Paul Moore, Acting Middle School Principal for scheduling information.

Standing Stone Golf Course will offer student rates except on weekends and holidays to Juniata College students during their open season. Students must show their ID cards. The rates will be: $4.00—18 holes; $3.00—9 holes. A group of 10 or 12 may schedule a time and date with the Management.

Reflections Of A Runner, Why I Run

by Bill Kibler

Cross country can lend strength and support, like a girder, to one's daily life. A runner who practices every day has a daily task to do, and the daily satisfaction of doing it. And a daily task, with its daily satisfaction can give strength to a person's life.

But because running does not take up a full day's measure of time and energy during the day, it needs another activity to complement it. At college, study complements running very well. Running taxes the body and relaxes the mind. It flushes the body and makes one eager to read and write. Study taxes the mind and makes the body thick and viscous. It makes one eager for the purge of running. A person can run and study everyday, and fill up his days with a balance of the two activities, and go to bed at night with a feeling of accomplishment. Running, alone with study, can give support for a stable existence.

Running can create extraordinary feelings. I first ran as a sophomore in high school for the track team. One time that year, I ran five miles on the road with a senior. I ran in sneakers all year, and at that particular time, part way along the inside of both sneakers, the soles were split from the canvas. Thus, the sneakers bent easily with my feet. They were old and light, and they served as track shoes.

When I started, I was afraid I would not keep up, so I wasted no motion as I ran. As we ran though, I caught a rhythm and began to lope along side my teammate easily. But I was afraid of losing the rhythm.

I tried to hold the same frame of mind in order to keep the rhythm, and as I ran, I kept my gaze fastened to the sidewalk at a point several feet in front of me. I did keep the rhythm, running easily. Concentrating, I kept my will apart, suspended above my body, suspended above the workings of the mysterious rhythm that I had caught. As I ran, my body worked independently of my will.

I managed to stay with my teammates to the end. When I finished, I was elated. There were other times that year when similar things happened. Once I ran five miles on the track in a group. Again, I got into a rhythm. I kept my eyes fastened to the bottom of one of my teammate Carmen Allegra's green sweatpants and I came under a spell of its movement, its steady rise and fall. Again, I ran easily, and strained to keep my will from interfering with the rhythmic working of the body. I remember telling my teammate, while I ran, that I was hypnotized by Carmen's leg.

Similar things happened a few times that year when I run speedwork on the track. Once I ran a number of 660 yard runs. I struggled through a group of better runners. But, to close the practice, we ran some110's. In running these, I led the others. I did not struggle at all. Running faster, than I had ever run before, with disciplined calm I controlled my speed, and moved just fast enough to stay in front. I ran within my strength. My will was a delicate regulator, like the throttle on a car, distant from the power beneath it, which it controlled.

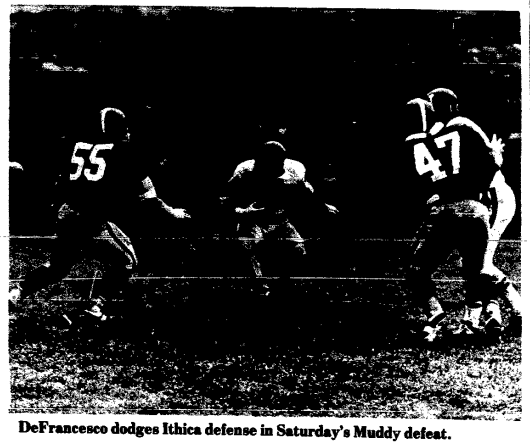
On one 110, a sprinter came up and began to overtake me. Deliberately, with the utmost restraint, I allowed my body more speed and stayed in front. I felt that I could increase my speed indefinitely. I exercised a delicate control, and it was exhilerating. It was a little like flying down hill on a sled holding hands with someone on another sled.

I learned to run races properly only after I came to college. Before I learned, I sometimes choked up in races from trying too hard. A race demands one's best effort. I tried harder: excited and impatient, I crammed effort into the race as I ran. In doing this, I fouled myself up. However, I eliminated this bad habit around the summer between my freshman and sophomore years at college. I ran five miles road race in N.J. early that summer. I stood at the line with a field of about twenty people from high school age to middle age. At the start, the others bolted out and I fell quickly behind all of them. I was running hard. But I had been training only slow distance since track at Juniata had ended.

I had an impulse to strain and try to make my way from far behind back into the crowd. The race was five miles long, and we had just started. So I forced myself to calm down and run as I knew how to run. I knew how a good practice effort felt, and I knew I could sustain such an effort over a long distance. So I set myself a pace that I felt I could keep for five miles.and I ran.

And soon, I began to gain on the stragglers, and then to pass them. I began to move through the runners strung out ahead of me as if I were climbing a ladder. As I overtook each runner, I paused and ran awhile with him for respite, and then went on. If one of them fought with me, I partially ignored him. I kept my pace with firm control. I varied it only gradually and with care. I kept my pace to what I felt I could sustain. I refused to be governed by anyone else's pace. I did not want to paralyze myself with an overdose of effort. When I finished, I had passed about half the field. I got a medal for my effort.

I have run for six years, and running has taught me a number of things. I have learned that it is fruitless for me in most endeavors to strain to go beyond the limits of my ability, and I have learned to resign myself to these limits. By running I have come to know certain intense aesthetically satisfying experiences that I might have never known. And running has served as material for constructing the sort of well-ordered life in which I live best.



DeFrancesco dodges Ithica defense in Saturday's Muddy defeat.

Indians Upset By Ithaca Home Opener Saturday

by John Paulshock

What was to be Juniata's 1974 football opener on Saturday, seemmore like a Huntingdon County Greased Pig Festival, as both teams spent the afternoon tracking down the game ball in an arena of mud. The outcome showed the Ithaca Bombers handing Juniata a 53-13 pounding, the Indians second worst defeat in the school's history.

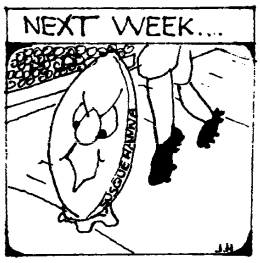
Although Ithaca reported to the game sporting a front offensive line averaging about 220 lbs. per player and a crafty signal caller, Juniata was damaged more severely by their own goofs, which were a product of constant rain and wind.

The circus began on the second play of the game when the ball squirted from the hands of Bobby Conyun, and Ithaca gained possession. The defense, however, followed the act by nabbing an interception, but the offense had to later punt it away. "Chico" Cortazo then stole the center ring and grabbed another interception, which quarterback Dave Wickerowski and the offense turned into a nice 60 yd. drive and the first score of the day. The Bombers (or shall I say the Bummers) boomed right back and put up 13 points to close out the first period, and put the Indians down by a T.D.

The second quarter spelled out m-i-s-e-r-y for Juniata. Ithaca was in total control as their Q.B. led them to three touchdowns in two minutes; whereas the Indians' Jim Rossi could score only once on a nine yard dash. The "bummers" teamed up with "old man weather" for two of their scores when senior tailback Carmen DeFrancesco lost a one-on-one bout with the ball on the kick-off (resulting in an Ithaca T.D.), and Wickerowski fumbled on the forty yard mark, setting up another score. Attempts to establish a passing game in the sloppy conditions proved fruitless, as Juniata receivers Pete Lantini and Jim Rossi and Tim Suppola all could find no way of making contact with the ball. Halftime score: 34-13, J.C. down... WAY DOWN.

The second half brought nothing more than perpetual rains, three Bomber touchdowns, and dispair for the Indians. DeFrancesco and freshman running back Kris DeJeet showed some signs of a good potential ground game, but they couldn't turn their rushing efforts into scores. All in all the last thirty minutes of playing time were like an instant replay of the first half; the Indians doing a continous juggling act, and Ithaca turning blunders into points. The final result, scorewise, was somewhat of a massacre in Indian lingo, but actionwise the game was more like twenty-two men chasing after a greasy, fat pig in the mud at a county farm fair. Final Score: Juniata 13—Ithaca Bummers 53.

But Juniata is far from being out of the running. C.W. Post, Bridgeport, and national champion Wittenburg, have all lost their 1974 opening games. But let's not wait for our team to pull it together alone. Now is the time when we need a mascot to shout and call our students together. Not to do this would be a sacrilege. The entire student body — not the football team — claimed the title of "champions" last year. The team is desperately trying to do it's part, let's do ours.



Coach Nadzak Predicts Moving Year In Sports

by Alan D. Wirt

Just how is the sports scene shaping up at Juniata for the 1974-75 year? In a recent interview with head football coach and athletic director Walt Nadzak, I tried to get some answers.

Let's start with football. Almost everyone knows about Juniata's phenomenal success last year. The Indians accomplished a feat that some schools will never achieve in their entire history, that is, to finish the season as Middle Atlantic Conference-Nothern Division champions, and ultimately became the second best Division III college football team in the nation.

To have this kind of reputation can be both good and bad. The good points are obvious; the national exposure, television revenues from bowl games, increased alumni support, etc. But as Coach Nadzak is quick to point out, "This year, Juniata is everybody's big game." This puts increased pressure on a team, a young team especially, who is trying to live up to last year's status.

The pressure has already shown itself on other teams in the same boat as Juniata. Namely, C. W. Post, Bridgeport,and national champion Wittenberg who were all powers in 1973, and have all lost their opening game in 1974.

How well the Indians adjust to the new pressures of being a champion, and how well they do against their first, and probably toughest foe, Ithaca, will be an excellent indicator of things to come.

Coach Nadzak forsees "two exiting basketball seasons" this winter. The women are fresh off an impressive 6-2 year, and beefed up their schedule to include some tougher opponents. The Squaws will also be competing in the first Middle Atlantic Women'sbasketball Tournamenr.

As far as Men's basketball—it's a whole new year, with a whole new attitude under first year coach Carl Medich. Basketball strong boy, Bucknell, is once again on the schedule, and Juniata will send its men to Ohio to play in a pre-Christmas tournament also this winter.

Coach Nadzak anticipates the same level of excellence in the baseball and track teams that has been exibited in the past. The women's field hockey team is on the up-swing, and Coach Nadzak is concerned this year with trying to get "improved opportunities for women, where there is justifiable interest."

Wrestling this year? Well, there's only one way to go, and that's up.

No new varsity sports are forseeable in the immediate future. Swimming, soccer, and lacrosse were suggestions that are not possible either because of lack of facilities or inadequate student interest.

"Overall, it's moving," Coach Nadzak said in reference to the whole athletic program at Juniata College.

Hockey Women Look Good

by Jacque Prentiss
Kim Norris

The women's field hockey team has returned for their 1974 season, their second year of intercollegiate competition, with the loss of only one varsity member. In addition to the returning squads there are many freshman who show promising talent and potential. Overlooking the poor condition of the field, due to the heat of the summer, the first two weeks of practice have been ones of optimism and enthusiasm.

Although early in its development, the team has just received an allied membership in the United States Field Hockey Association, and is planning to join the Susquehanna Field Hockey Association.

According to Coach JoAnne Reilly, perhaps only the lack of confidence kept the team from a winning season last fall. She feels that the added poise and experience gained should lead the team to a successful season in 1974.

A pre-season scrimmage with Huntingdon H. S. was a good omen, in that the offensive forward line exhibited controlled teamwork and strategy. In addition to this, the impenetrable defense refused to allow a goal to be scored. Although the attitude of the team in general is serious, the practice sessions, drills and conditioning have been both productive and enjoyable.

This years upperclassmen and positions are: D. Anita Kustanbauter (RW), Robin Bepler (RW), Jan Snyder (RW), Kyle Messick (RI), LuAnn Steiner (CF), D. J. Lingafelt (LI), Petra Theodos (LW), Linda Savage (LW), Bev Martin (RH), Kim Norris (CH), Jacque Prentiss (RF), Noreen O'Connell (LF), Katie Middleton (LF), Marjorie Morgan (LF), Pam Weaver (G), Janet Kelsall (LI).

The freshmen prospectives are: Audrey Seasholtz (RI), Pam Julius (CF), Janet Bechtal (LW), Colleen Oates (RH), Michelle Bomont (RH), Randie Cain (CH), Barbara Reifeis (CH), Bonnie Books (LH), Jan Edgan (LH), Wendy Jacobus (LF), Claire Swaverly (G).

The season opener is September 30th, away, with Susquehanna College. The first of the three home games is with Indiana U. of Penn. on October 10th at 3 P.M. Come out and support the up and coming women's field hockey team!

Not Only Students Are Freshmen

by Wendy Jacobus

Although many of the freshmen think it's pretty tough to adjust to college life, consider another group that is adjusting to Juniata for the first time also: new professors. While wandering from class to class throughout the past few weeks, the upperclassmen probably noted fifteen new faces on the college faculty. Because there are so many new professors, this article will deal only with the new science teachers.

The computer science department welcomes a new assistant professor, Johnathan Broido. Mr. Broido received his bachelors degree from the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and was a graduate student at the University of Pittsburgh. He has been teaching for seven years, most recently at the University of Pittsburgh. While at Juniata, he will concurrently be teaching a course relating the sciences and humanities at Penn State. Mr. Broido enjoys cooking, painting and chess in his spare time. Although he feels he is too new to have any valid opinions of the college, he enjoys teaching here.

Nickolas Despo is the new assistant instructor in Biology. He has received a bachelors degree from Penn State, a Masters from Duquesne University and a PHD from Rutgers University. He is a native of Pennsylvania who enjoys golf and handball. Mr. Despo is married but has no children. Because he is accustomed to a large university setting, it was quite a change for him to come to Juniata. But, he has been favorably impressed by the interaction between faculty and students.

Dr. and Ms. Lerman are the new addition to the chemistry department. Ms. Lerman was an undergraduate student at Wheaton College in Massachusetts and a graduate student at Harvard University. At Juniata, Judy Lerman is the leader of the freshman seminar, Women in Professions. She also teaches Analysis Chemistry and Advanced Organic Chemistry. When asked her opinion of the college, Ms. Lerman said, "The students at Juniata are delightful. They are extremely conscientious and cooperative. I really enjoy working with them." Ms. Lerman will receive her doctorate in November. Dr. Charles Lerman is a native of New Jersey and a graduate of Yale and Harvard Universities. He is a sports enthusiast (rugby, cross country, skiing) and is the advisor for the rugby club team. He also enjoys photography in his spare time. Although Dr. Lerman has had limited contact with the students, mostly science majors, he feels they work very hard. Mr. and Ms. Lerman have both had previous teaching experience at Harvard.

Dr. Rompala, the new member of the physics staff, has been hired as a one year replacement for Dr. Hall. Mr. Rompala was an undergraduate student at DePaul University in Chicago and a graduate student at Clemson University in South Carolina. He is a native of Illinois, who enjoys woodworking and furniture making. (Bench-warmers take note!) He is also a frustrated athlete. Dr. Rompala, assistant professor of physics, feels students and faculty alike at Juniata are very dedicated and enthusiastic about learning. He is looking forward to making his contribution to Juniata, in whatever way he can.

Robert Rettke and Philip Sipling are the new attractions to the geology department. Mr. Rettke is an undergraduate of Case Western Reserve in Ohio and graduate student of the State University of New York at Buffalo. He has had previous teaching experience at Case Western Reserve as a teaching assistant. Like Dr. Rompala, he is here on a one year replacement. His hobby is automobile racing on road courses. Mr. Rettke was very impressed by the friendliness of the students. Mr. Sipling, a native of West York, Pennsylvania, graduated from Juniata in 1969 with honors in geology. He received his masters degree from Brown University in 1971 and is completing the requirements for his PhD. In his leisure time he enjoys golf, tennis, and ping-pong. At Juniata, Mr. Sipling is a Freshman Seminar Leader and will be teaching (spring term) a value centered unit in Mineral Economics, Politics, and Law. Mr. Sipling said, "It is refreshing to return to the person-centered atmosphere of Juniata College. In my absence, the college has undergone only minor face-lifting, but it has undergone major internal surgery both with regard to structure and program. It will take some time to fully evaluate the strengths and weaknesses of this new program."

The Juniatian wishes these teachers a rewarding year and hopes all students will make them feel welcome.

Transcendental Meditation A Chance To Use Modes?

by Bill Brooks

Transcendental meditation is somewhat like the stock market; the issue everyone talks about, but knows relatively little about.

T.M. is a natural method of procuring a very tranquil physical state. It is analogous to sleep. This pacified state is a period of releasing tensions and rejuvenating the nervous system. By alleviating stresses, perceptive inhibitors, one expands his awareness of his environment and self. This expanded comprehension is the essence of this technique.

Scientific data supporting these claims has been obtained. The oxygen consumption and metabolic rate of the practitioner engaged in transcendental meditation is less than a person in a deep sleep. An obvious effect is the reduction of cardiac output. These manifest the idea of a very relaxed state. Blood lactate, a substance which has been associated with anxiety, decreases appreciably during meditation. This indicates the release of tention and removal of anxiety.

Contrary to prominent illusions, T.M. is not religious nor mystical in nature. The Maharishi is not worshiped. In fact, the Maharishi is not even an integral part of meditation. The meditation procedure begins with the individual in a very relaxed sitting posture. This is followed by the meditator simply closing his eyes for approximately two minutes, a period in which thoughts are very spontaneous. A mantra (a sound with no inherent meaning and unique to the particular person) is then mentally chanted free from any synchronized pattern, rather haphazardly. The mantra is the mechanism by which the individual is transformed into the tranquil state previously mentioned. T.M. is distinquished from other forms of meditation by the fact the practitioner does not concentrate on any aspect of his meditation. If a thought interupts the repetition of the mantra, the meditator does not have to neglect the thought, but he must always revert back to the mantra after the thought is completed. For T.M. to be at maximum effectiveness, it requires two twenty minute sessions a day.

To analyze one's meditation is contradictory to the fundamental nature of T.M. because concentration is supposedly nonexistent in meditation. Despite this, what does the meditator actually experience? Thoughts interrupt the mantra in a discursive manner with no apparent coherentness. This condition is similar to daydreaming. Unlike sleep, the meditator feels the transition into this pacified physical state because he is conscious. This condition is somewhat intangible and almost defies description. However, I can say that it is most gratifying. Other empiricisms include, shallow breathing, reduced heart pace, and sometimes the slouching of the head as the meditator proceedes into the relaxed condition.

The purpose of this conglomeration of words is obviously informative with the intent to abolish some of stereotypes held by students ignorant of transcendental meditation. If you ask a student unaware or misinformed about T.M. to associate something with it, he will do so by probably stating the Maharishi.

Student Gov't Odds & Ends

by Jim Messner

This column is an outlet for information on what student government is doing for the student.

The roving R.A.'s situation is being investigated. As a first step, the names of R.A.'s and when they are on duty will soon be posted throughout the campus. Clarifications of this policy and the new warning system are being pursued through the Dean of Students Office.

The Issues Desk will be open two nights a week, Monday and Thursday, during dinner, as an information liason between students govern ment and the student body.

Students Government is sponsoring a Voters Registration drive in order to make democracy work for the Juniata students. We have a right to vote in local, as well as state and national elections. We must show the candidates that we are a voting force that they must answer. Juniata has the potential to become a large and powerful voting force, but it will only remain as a potential unless you go into Huntingdon and register.

Student government has organized the class officers to provide a greater social life for the students. The different classes will be responsible for organizing diverse events both on and off campus as a supplement to Center Board activities. This situation has been necessitated because of school policies which limit certain types of social gatherings.

Results of Freshman Class Steering Committee elections: Doreen Patras (73), Jeanie Ahearn (78), Debbie Whittington (68), Coleen Oates (88), Diane Loomis (64), Greg Boyd (113), Brian Ashworth (113), Carolyn Setzer (76), Ruthie Rogers (85). At the first meeting held Monday evening, Brian Ashworth was elected chairman, Ruthie Rogers was selected as Secretary and Coleen Oates as Treasurer.

Art Historian Looks At Italy's Debt To Greece

by Courtnaye B. Rhone

Faculty and student members of Juniata College will be proud to know that Ms. Gloria D. Friedman, the art historian of the J.C. art department, was cordially invited to lecture at the annual 16th Century Studies Conference, in St. Louis, Missouri at the Concordia Seminary, October 25-26, 1974.

The conference is being sponsored by the Center for Reformation Research and will entail the gathering of about 35 lecturers from all over the U.S., in such fields as literature, theology, history and numerous other areas. Two lectures from this distinguished group will be in the field of art history which is a new idea to be added to the conference, and Ms. Friedman is indeed proud to have been requested to participate.

Ms. Friedman's lecture will be on Symbolism and the Florentine Wall Tomb. On October 4, 1974, Friday night at 7:00 P.M., in the Shoemaker Gallery, she will present a preview of the talk. It will also comprise a slide presentation to be informal, and rather short in nature, not more than an hour in length.

It would be Mrs. Friedman's fondest wish to have members of the student body to attend, and she says, "It would be interesting for anyoe studying the classics, and renaissance art history, or anyone who wishes to see how art history functions," to attend this preview presentation on Friday, October 4, 1974.

Cheap Refrigeration Meets The Open-armed Juniatians

by Rob Lopresti and Tom Kutz

If you provide a cheap refrigerator Juniata students will beat a path to your door. That was the lesson the student government learned as it began the first year of its refrigerator leasing program.

On September 12th almost one hundred refrigerators were rented out. This, according to government president Carl Glaeser, is good for the program's first year.

They were rented from the Planet Leasing Company at a cost of $40 for the school year and an $8 refundable security deposit. This is approximately a 50% saving over the ones available downtown or from State College.

According to one student who had previously rented from a Huntingdon store the Planet refrigerators are cheaper and "more suitable to a dorm room."

Research for the program began last year when student government surveys found out the going rates for refrigerator rentals and decided there could be a strong interest in a refrigerator co-op. After investigating several systems the leasing program proved to have a co-op's advantages without the risk of the government being left with extra refrigerators. Furthermore, as sponsoring agent the government gets $3 from the company for each refrigerator leased, which goes back into student programs.

According to Carl Glaeser and George Trapp the government will continue the leasing program next year and for as long as the students are interested.

Letters to the editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatian. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name.

Since the Juniatian's revival several years ago, it has sunk into traditional levels of apathy that seem to be rife for many campus activities. With the incidence of a new active freshman class this year, the newspaper has, for once, acquired a larger and more involved staff, or so I am told. In other words, there is supposedly more push behind the newspaper: evidenced by the fact that (I have heard) the first issue had too much material rather than too little to fill its pages.

Assuming this to be true and that "Stumpy" will make a more active and independent editor, I would like to propose that the newspaper change its format to better serve the student body. In particular reference, I mean using a cheaper, lower grade paper— anything down to newsprint— and expanding the paper in terms of size with the money saved. I can see no reason to use a high grade stock for this publication, other than for appearances: being that this restricts its format.

Another proposal I think apt is the payment of yearly stipend to the newspaper editor and WJC manager. The heads of student government are paid, after all. And, though I have no wish here to degrade the student government, I submit that these media managers have much more continuing work to perform if they do their job well. Such a stipend would be an impetus to this end, tending to foster more willingness to put time, effort, and independence into the media.

I do not know to whom to put these proposals to for the proper handling; but as I see it, they should be offered perhaps as a referendum to the student body at large.

by John Knouse

Editor Replys

I would like to thank John for his compliments and reaffirm my desire to be an active, independent editor. Hopefully his response will be a sign of the time supporting our work to fight the apathy and to state ideas that will allow Juniata to grow.

As for the proposals to expand the paper by using cheap paper in production, I can only say that we have checked into newsprint instead of the glossy paper currently used by the "Juniatian." Resting on the word of Mr. Steven Warner, our printer, we were advised that the use of newsprint would demand the purchase of large rolls and be printed on a large press equipped to handle these rolls, which is not very economical for our purpose. In today's paper market sheeted newsprint is not readily available, and even when it is available the cost is not low enough to warrant its purhase and use.

As to expanding the paper again we are stuck by the current money crunch. To expand means added cost which our budget will not allow at the present time.

Concerning a salary for the positions of Editor and Station Manager of WJC, I feel that this is an area which should be explored. A unit of credit for a years work may also be an idea. How to go about this problem is something I am not quite sure of the present time however is interesting and deserves future consideration.

Why Don't You Just Come And See It?

by Brad Rudy

To most critics—culturalesque and escapesque both—"It Happened One Night" has been customarily dismissed as naughty but the prototype screwballesque comedy. What these pseudointellectualites fail to perceive are the deeply ingrained and profound allusions to psychosexuosociologicoreligious implications of a cosmogony-shattering profundity escalating from beneath its deceptively frothy surface. How can the walls of Jericho be reconciled with the decreasing religiosity of the character of middepressionesque American? Is not the showing of the knee a plea for escape from an ultimately sexist and nubilely mobile ethos? Does not the donut dunking lesson metaphorically allegorize Ellie's complete immersion in the capitalesque mores of her bourgeois class as well as show Peter's escape or decline (ambiguesque?) into the bilge of rabid proletarianism? How can our petty hypocritical society even dare to laugh? Our tears should be of selfintrospective empathesque relevation, not of muddle brained televisionesque escapism.

Our first clue that there is something special in IHON (notice the symbesque iconistic acronym) is the plot. Logic does not prevail, so we must assume director Capra is seeking to do more than entertain. How can anyone expect to entertain our jaded philosophesque milieu with a sanslogic plot? Follow: Peter and Ellie meet on a bus (a symbol of picaresque manifestations?). They spend the night in the same room (smutesque implications?) seperated only by the symbolic walls of Jericho (a much too blatantesque obviosity for my infinitely superior tastes). Through a series of misadventures (Freudianesque Skinnerism?) they are attracted and married (still more religiosocialesque shadings).

But why? Does not logic demand that this match be marred by the proletaribourgeois cleavage? Does not logic expound the absurdity of the somewhat incongruesque inconsistencies which abound? Does not logic show that a sensitive director (viz. Capra) will use such conventions for his own darkesque purposes? Does not logic fall flat on its gluteal extremity in a situation such as this? Or is the logic, as critic Gavin Millarr describes the ambiguity, over there in a box (which indeed it should), overflowing with its absurdesque inconsistencies?

To risk the snobbesque attitude of polliculating my proboscule sque appendage at the lot of you, I sincerely believe no one but the most profound viewer (viz. myself) can answer such shoalpatulesque interrogations. But you are cordially invited to display your lack of perceptivesque breeding by laughing at IHON on Friday, October 4th, at 7 postmeridianesque. The evening's enrichment shall be gratisesque.

What Is There To Do?

BY Rosemary Tai and Nancy Nordberg

What's happening at Juniata this week? It looks like it's going to be an exciting week. You don't want to miss the events, so note the times and plan ahead.

Have you chosen your partner for the dance marathon? Tomorrow's the night when the action begins at 9:00 P.M. in the Ellis Ballroom. The cost per couple entering the contest is $2.00. If you prefer just to dance and be a spectator the cost is $.25. The marathon will last for 12 hours and the winning couple will receive $20.00. As the hours of the morning tick away some strange things could happen. . . . .and you wouldn't want to miss them. Come try your luck.

Classes will be cancelled Wednesday, October 9 (weather permitting). Some of you might take advantage of this day to catch up on your sleep or the piles of work you have accumulated. We all need to get away from J.C. for a while. The traditional Mountain Day will provide a great opportunity. The college community moves to the state park to enjoy a day of activity and relaxation. Transportation and a barbecue lunch is provided for all along with activities such as volleyball, hiking, etc. The traditional football game, tug of war between the classes, egg throwing contest, and numerous other events will fill spots in the day. Come out and enjoy yourself at Mountain Day '74.

Curious about politics? What's going on in the 30th district? You have a chance to listen to a debate between Bob Jubelirer, Republican candidate, and Denny Bixler, Democratic candidate for state senator. The debate will be in Oller Hall on Thursday, October 10 at 7:30 P.M. It's a great opportunity to see and meet the candidates for whom you may be casting your vote.

Other events at Juniata throughout the week include:

Friday, October 4—Movie 7:00P.M.
"It Happened One Night"

Saturday, October 5 1:30 P.M.
Football game at Lycoming
Cross-country at Susquehanna

Sunday, October 6 3:30 P.M.

As promised, this week I intend to look at Juniata's drinking policy. Specifically, I want to examine the reasons why it exists, and whether it should continue to exist. Since I have chosen community as my theme, I want to give special consideration to the drinking policy as a factor in this sense of community.

On examining the policy, one finds that first of all, it is strictly a social policy. It has nothing to do with our education at all. It seems perfectly reasonable that the college prohibit alcohol in the educational buildings. However, the prohibition in the residence halls is a different story. In these halls, the college merely serves as a landlord to student tenants. In a free society, very few landlords can exercise this kind of control, a fact we can take pride in..

Now there are several arguments the college uses in defense of their policy. First, one hears about in loco parentis. This is a concept that is virtually dead. Even our administration tries not to use it.

The second argument concerns the educational value of the policy. Here, practical experience demonstrates the absurdity of this argument. The only thing people have learned is to perhaps become more discreet about their drinking. Even this is not taught effectively.

The one argument that deserves some consideration is the one saying that elimination of the drinking policy would put the college in the position of promoting underage drinking. I don't buy this one though. As I see it, the college would simply be doing what other landlords do. They would simply give their tenants the responsibility to follow state laws or take their chances.

The administration often generalizes this argument to the college drinking policy. This seems weak though. As citizens, we have our effect on the laws of the state. It is already clear that, although we are the ones directly affected, we are given no real part in affecting this policy.

In conclusion, I would like to state some arguments for the elimination of the drinking policy. First, there is really very little in the way of social life here except the parties. Perhaps it is educationally valuble for us to do this, but to deny us a major avenue for creating social life seems absurd.

The other arguments concerns the nature of a liberal arts college, whose stated purpose is to develop the individual. One of the most important ingredients in that process is independent decision making. It seems a contradiction in terms for the college to try and force students to decide an issue in a particular way.

In summation then, the drinking policy divides the students from the administration, not to mention those students who are stuck with enforcing the policy. Something needs to be done. Perhaps a special committee could be formed, representing the entire Juniata community,that would be able to study the problem and make a meaningful proposal to the Trustees. It would at least be a step in the right direction.

Compton, New Dean At JC

by David Mitchell

Those students who are acquainted with the campus administration will have noted by now that there is a new face in Founder's Hall. It belongs to William Compton, the new Director of Residence for Juniata College.

Mr. Compton grew up in Secane situated in the Philadelphia area of Pennsylvania. He graduated from Ridley High School in 1968 and then attended Shippensburg State College where he was active in student government. He received his bachelor of science degree in business administration in 1972 and then went on to the University of Vermont where he obtained his masters degree and was employed for two years.

The Director of Residence position is a new one, created this year. The primary functions are to train and supervise resident assistants, advise dormitory government, work on the programming and lifestyles of residence halls, and to be an aid to students in problems dealing with residence hall living.

Mr. Compton is no stranger to Juniata. As an undergrad at SSC he frequented our campus on many weekends while visiting friends who were at that time Juniata students. One of the first things that impressed him at Juniata was the friendly atmosphere that pervaded among the students and administration personnel.

As goals for this year, he has stated the following:

"I would like to see established a strong residence assistant program and to develop more programming in the residence halls. After all, the average students spends eight to ten hours a day in his dormitory. That's four weeks out of a ten week term. Residence halls are just more than a place to sleep or study, they're a place to live. And we must design the life style with that in mind."

Perhaps Mr. Compton is an indicator of changes to come in the standards of conduct prescribed to us by the administration.

Perhaps not.

Only time will tell.

Festus Speaks

Cohabitation: Do's and Don'ts

by Steve Townsend

Under the section entitled "Welcome", the Pathfinder, Juniata's student handbook speaks gloriously of "fullfillment" and "fitting right in". But unfortunately an unsuspecting Freshman may get the wrong impression and feel that obtaining "fullfillment" may not be as easy as he was led to believe. For no sooner does poor character becomes absolutely ecstatic over the possibility of developing a deeply satisfying personal relationship, than he discovers another heading labled "Visitation Policy". With one sentence Juniata transforms itself from higher educational facility to surrogate mother: "The policy prohibits members of the opposite sex from sleeping overnite in the residence halls".

As frightening as this cohabitation policy may sound, all upperclassmen realize that it simply does not present any major sexual barrier. But don't we all know that experience is the best teacher. So in order that our new crop of students go about their first cohabitation properly, I have compiled a list of do's, don'ts and important items to remember.

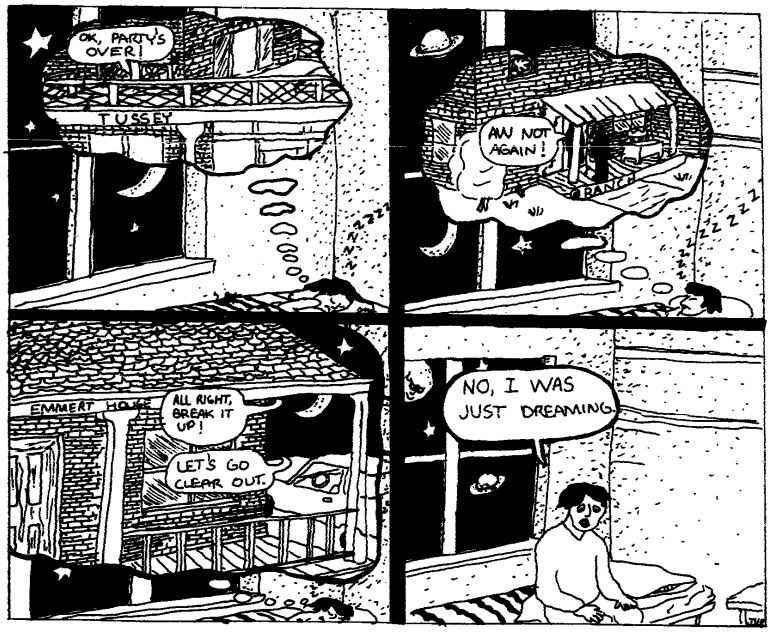
First and foremost in the mind of a student co-habitator should be the fact that the policy only prohibits sleeping with a member of the opposite sex, it makes no mention of the sex act itself. Those of you with homosexual tendencies, or the stamina to continue until daybreak need not read further. But if you are one of the many who are neither homosexual, nor superman, you may find yourself saddled with an overwhelming desire to pleasantly drift to sleep in your lovers arms. If this be the case do so without fear, for you're only liable if you get caught and getting caught is very hard if one takes some minor precautions.

The first of these precautions is a very simple rule; don't draw unnecessary attention to the fact that you're a violator of school policy. As basic as this may seem you would be amazed to discover the number of couples who habitually cover themselves with large, conspicuous, welt-like hickeys and then try to pass them off as a ringworm infection.

Secondly, sleep noiselessly. In other words, if you have a propensity towards orchestrating the act with music take care to disengage the stereo before floating off to dreamland. The sound of the "1812 Overture" being played over and over on your automatic changer may create some bad feelings among your neighbors.

Last, but definitely not least, be certain that the door to the room is securely shut and bolted. Though most people tend to knock before entering, there are those who both knock and enter in the same motion. The last thing you need is to be caught totally unconcious in post-orgasmic bliss by the R.A. who only came to borrow a tea bag.

With just a little common sense it is easy to see that maybe the handbook wasn't lying when it guaranteed everyone "fullfillment". In fact, with a little imagination one can almost see threatening cohabitation warning changing to read an old cliche, "if you've got it, flaunt it, but rest it cautiously."



Minorities Speak: Fight For Rights!

The following is the first of a series of articles dealing with the perdicament of Women, Blacks and other minorities.

by Arvil "Chip" Lovett

Due to the exposure of Woman and Minorities from our Society, each has been in the "spotlight," one way or another, either by demonstration, protest or riots. These acts, including television coverage, create special attention, giving them recognition.

You hear Martin Luther King; speech or radio, you see Billy Jean King play Bobby Riggs and you read "Bury My Heart at Wounded Knee" —Minorities are receiving attention.

To correlate or parallel would be unfair. Should we compare a black man being lynched to a woman being raped and killed? Black men were lynched because they were getting out of place. Women are raped and killed because they are women. These examples can illustrate the harm unequal thinking has done. I feel I am free to say that economic, social, and psychological problems stem from unequal rights and opportunities.

One only needs to look in any psychology book and one will find that these problems may destroy a person's respect, dignity, and life.

Unequal rights and opportunities mean different terms to each group. It would take many pages of writing to define these terms. However, I have said what may lead to unequal rights and opportunities.

Personally, I feel people take Woman's Liberation as some sort of joke. Women and Minorities are still considered second-class citizens. So the battle is on and people better watch out, a change is coming very rapidly. During the past it was History. Now it is Black, Puerto Rican, and Indian History. Progress is being made slowly, but the battle will be won.

Minorities and Women are fighting for the goals although not together. They may merge when the battle is won, if not, separation may take place.

Colloquy Theme To Be "Women"

by Janie Dillen

WOMEN is the theme for this year's Colloquy. There will be several workshops, discussions, and displays concerning the many roles of women. We need help in order to make this event a success. Any time and effort you could volunteer would be greatly appreciated. We need about ten to fifteen girls and with this many it won't be much work for any single one. Also, if anyone would be interested in writing a column for any issue of the Juniatian we have many topics to choose from or you can use your own (as long as it concerns Women of course!) There are many things to be done so please help make this year's Colloquy a success. Any remember—any help you give will be acknowledged in the Juniatian.

Indians Start Off With Big Victory

by Jim Kudel

The Indians won their first game of the season by beating the Crusaders of Susquehanna 21-7. The game for the players began at 1:30 P.M. on Saturday. The 'game' for the people behind the scenes began a lot earlier. When I speak of the people behind the scenes I mean the trainers and managers.

The managers 'game' began early Saturday morning. It is spent preparing for the game this afternoon. For the most part the work required is routine. This includes getting the players fresh towels. T-shirts and the other miscellaneous. It also includes find out from the trainer and head coach what kind of refreshments he wants down on the field, usually, it is ice and cold water but, you can't be too sure. All of this is routine which causes no concern to the managers.

Although most of the work is routine there is always the expected unexpected. On this Saturday (Susquehanna game) there was a bit of the unexpected. There is always a few players, who find just before the game that their spikes are worn down so much that they need to be replaced. Others find broken shoelaces. Helmets are another problem. For the most part, it is just a minor repair, but for the people who hit hard, a new helmet must be found to replace the damaged one.

One interesting item arose before the game. Rusty Eembrinsk, a reserve quarterback, noticed he could not get his game jersey over his pads. This posed a problem. To remedy this, head coach, Walt Nadzak, allowed a switch in numbers between Rusty and another reserve QB. This caused no problem.

While this is all going, the Susquehanna team is arriving. This only requires to show them where they are to dress, where the field is and other procedure.

On this same day a Crusader forgot to bring his shoulder pads along with him. No problem. See the opposing managers, they should have extra pads. Getting the pads are no problem but it takes up a lot of valuable time for a manager especially just right before the game time.

By this time everything is ready to go. The utility van is packed.

The game started with the Indians kicking off. Stan Nosel booted a knuckleball down to the seven yard line which only got a three yard return. The game looked to be a hard-fought game all the way. Afteran exchange of punts, the Crusaders punted once. This time the Indians marched down the field behind the running of RB Carmen DeFrancesco and full back, Rich Madey. The drive was capped by a 6 yard run by Jim Roosi. Bob Knavel booted the point after to put the Indians out front 7-0.

The next kick off proved to be a costly one for Juniata when they lost their starting center, Freshman Charlie Koren due to a knee injury. The game now became a defensive battle. The Crusaders could only manage two unsuccessful field goal tries. The Indians had their chances to score, but both times stopped once own their mistakes, a fumble on the snap from center. The half ended with Juniata clinging to their 7-0 lead.

The second half had a few changes. Charles Zorger, the starting tackle moved to center to replace Bill Drexler who replaced the injured Koren. Joe Smek moved to tackle, this was to bolster the offensive line.

The third quarter was almost all defensive. The Indians did get a drive started late in the quarter. The drive was completed when Carmen bulled over from the one just a few seconds into the fourth quarter.

The scoring drive took its toll on injuries. This time full back, Rich Madey suffered some badly bruised ribs. He set out the remainder of the game. After an exchange of punts, the Crusaders started a scoring drive of their own. It was highlighed when the Juniata defensive back were caught napping.

The Crusaders were back in the game trailing by only 7 points. After Juniata received they were forced to punt deep in their territory. However, Stu Jackson went way over the receivers head and gave the defense some breathing room. The defense showed signs of weakening as the Crusaders marched down the field. The defense got tough and forced a Crusader fumble which they recovered.

The game was halted when a dog ran onto the field. Walt Nadzak yelled for someone to get the dog off the playing field. It was the manager coming to get the dog. What do you do when you catch the dog? The answer, give it to one of the cheerleaders, they have little to do.

When play was resumed Juniata found itself deep into its own territory and was later forced to punt one more time. Again the Crusaders drove down field before fumbling it and when Juniata took over it wasted little time to score. David Wiekerowski found Peter Lentini open down the side line and then Pete outran the Crusader's defensive backs.

The game had only a little more than a minute to go but the Indians were confident of victory. The Crusaders got the ball for the last time but were unable to score. It ended in a victory for the Indians 21-7.

The transcendental meditation movement is solely responsible for this misconception. It seems they utilize him as a gimmick for publicity purposes. This in itself turns many potential meditators away. Let me reiterate, the Maharishi is not an integral part of one's meditation! Because of the sixty-five dollars inclusive fee, which is far from nominal, for learning the techniques of T.M., the decision to meditate is totally left to your discretion without outside beguilement from me. I only ask that you approach this with an open mind and utilize the analytical procedure laid before you in Modes; inquire.

Let's Talk Football With Coach Rossi

by John Paulshock

The old concrete bench (donated by class of '51, by the way) in front of the gym, was the setting for a little talk about football with offensive coach, Dean Rossi. I'm no Howard Cossell, so rather than making it an interrogation, I merely asked a few general questions and allowed coach Rossi to answer as he felt. The time of the interview was after Juniata's defeat to Ithaca, and prior to the team's 21-7 victory over Susquehanna.

Question: How would you compare this year's squad to last year's championship team?

Rossi: I hate to compare teams from year to year, because you have your senior members leaving, and new freshman arriving; so it makes it tough for an individual to rate a team's quality from season to season. Talent is different as well as the size of the athletes.

Question: Overall, then, what is the condition of this year's offense?

Rossi: This season we have an extremely young team; especially at quarterback where we have sophomore Dave Wickerowsky and five freshman back-ups. At center we have a sophomore, Bill Drexler with a frosh behind him; and playing split-end is freshman Kim Sypola.

Offense is primarily a matter of getting your timing and synchronizing together, and with a young team such as ours, it is often hard to accomplish this. You must be sure of where your going, and you have to play with intensity. Mistakes can overwhelm a team that is under pressure. Young ball players sometimes revert to their earlier learned techniques, which cause a breakdown in the offense as a single and complete unit. It takes patience, time, and hard work for a team to melt together and play good football.

Question: What about the running backs?

Rossi: Last year's backs played together for two straight years and new each other's styles and capabilities. This season we are starting all over with sophomores Cunnion and Madey, and frosh DeJeet. Wicherowsky, of course, is playing his first season as the signal caller; so we have a lot of fine young talent to work with. It takes time for youngsters to learn each other's class of football.

Question: How about senior Carmen DeFrancesco?

Rossi: Carmen loves to play football, and he's a great small college player. He likes the competition, and works hard to be good. He isn't a big fellow, but his intense work has made him a fine runner, and a co-captain whom all the players respect.

Question: Any comments on the coaching staff?

Rossi: I feel it's a good system. The three of us have been together for three years, and get along quite well. Coach Nadzak always has the last word on decisions, but he considers all our suggestions and gripes. All in all, we work things out together, each listening to the other. I like coaching here.

Coach Rossi then finished up by saying that big losses (such as the one to Ithaca) put a team down, but it's here where your mistakes can be found. Susquehanna is the start of M.A.C. competition, and our team's real potential will be exhibited then.

That's about it. I thanked the coach for his time, and bid him a "good luck" for the rest of the season. With the young team that Juniata has, it should be interesting as to what the future football scene will be like here on campus.

Call Me A Masochist?

by Carmen DeFrancesco

Being a running back for a college football team is a very unique experience. Many people have asked me the question, why do I put my body through the constant punishment that a running back takes everytime he carries the ball. I can only answer that question in one way. I'm too small to play in the line, I don't have the terrific hands needed to be a receiver and I don't have the good ball sense needed to be a defensive halfback. What DO I have? I do have a great liking and desire for running with a football.

I believe that a running back learns to enjoy the physical contact that he experiences when he runs into the opposition's line. As a running back in high school, I tried to run around a lot of people but in college it's different because most of the lineman and defensive backs are just as fast as you are. So, I learned if you can't run around them, you run through them. Being able to meet a tackler head on and knock him flat on his back while running with the football gives me a great feeling inside that can't be explained.

The attitude that I have developed in regards to running the ball is this; make the tackler absorb more of the shock than you. You deliver the blow on him instead of hitting you. I don't want to make it sound like I'm the type of runner that looks for a defensive player to run into. At 5'7", 170 lbs. I don't proclaim to be a punishing runner. If I had my choice of either running by a defender or through him, I definitely would choose to run by him.

Football is a great game and offensive running back is a great position. There are many reasons why myself and thousands of other young men throughout the country like myself play college football. One reason is a true love for the game. Another has to be the recognition. I believe every football player enjoys the recognition that he receives while he's participating. A running back in particular receives a lot of publicity because he's the one who gains the yards and scores the touchdowns. However, he knows that he would be nothing at all if he didn't have those 10 other guys trying to protect him while he's running. A lot of fans tend to forget that the linemen are the real heartbeat of an offensive team because they're too involved in watching backs make long runs and ends make great catches. My last reason for playing is that I believe it builds character and teaches you a lot of lessons about life. If I had to start my life all over again, you bet football would be a part of it.

THE JUNIATIAN

VOL. XLVIII NO. 3 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | OCTOBER 10, 1974

JC Offers Variety of New Professors

by Wendy Jacobus

Although Juniata's academic claim to fame probably lies in the science-related fields, many other departments are instrumental to the college's goal to provide a true liberal arts education. Therefore, when evaluating the overall college scene, these departments should be seriously considered. This year, there has been some revamping in these areas in the form of seven new faculty members.

The first, Dr. Caroline Baker, is Juniata's new catalog librarian. For the past six years, Dr. Baker has taught philosophy and religion at Ohio Northwestern University. She received her under-graduate degree from Southwestern College in Kansas and her graduate degree from Drew University in New Jersey. Dr. Baker earned her degree in library science from Kent State University. When asked her opinion of the college she said, "After being at Kent State, this place is great!" Dr. Baker also said she is enjoying the vocational switch from teaching which this job at Juniata provides.

Mr. Carl Meditch, assistant professor of physical education, will be serving at Juniata as a cross country and basketball coach. He received his undergraduate degree from DePauw University in Indiana and his graduate degree from the University of Iowa. He previously taught for nine years at intercity public schools, and for four years at Ball State University. Mr. Meditch, his wife, and two children reside in Huntingdon. Although he feels it is too early to make judgments of the college, Mr Meditch thinks there is a fairly relaxed atmosphere here.

Miss Sally Pennington is the new College Center Director. For the past two and a half years, Miss Pennington worked as the assistant to the director of the College Union at Gettysburg College. She is a graduate of West Virginia Institute of Technology and will receive her masters degree from Penn State. Miss Pennington is also serving in an advisory capacity for Center Board. She has enjoyed Juniata thus far and found everyone to be warm and friendly.

Mr. Robert Reilly is the new director of the program of social work. He has had previous teaching experience (apprenticeship) in graduate school and has also worked as a counselor in a county prison. He graduated from Marywood College with a masters degree in social work. Mr. Reilly is a member of one of the intramural soccer teams and enjoys listening to music, playing the guitar and bicycling in his spare time. Mr. Reilly was hired to develop and organize courses for a social work program that will be accredited by 1976.

Dr. Elizabeth Tilton is the new addition to the French department. Dr. Tilton is in her third year of teaching, having previously served at Howard University in Washington, D.C. She received her undergraduate degree from Middlebury College in Vermont and her graduate degree from Yale. She had practical experience applying her language skills when, as a student, she studied in Paris and Geneva. Dr. Tilton seemed very concerned that many Juniata students were ignoring the opportunities the language departments provide. "I suppose that it is only after one's formal education is completed that one can really evaluate it, and looking back over mine, the years spent abroad stand out as particularly valuable and enjoyable. It seems to me that Juniata students are very open to this type of experience, and this is definitely encouraging. Having some language background helps of course, not only by making survival a bit easier, but by making it possible to truly see into a society other than one's own. The language teachers I've met here seem dedicated to helping students benefit from broadening contacts of this type. I think this is very much to Juniata's credit."

Mr. Ibrook Tower, Director of Instrumental Ensembles, is the newcomer to the music department. He received his undergraduate degree from Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore and his graduate degree from Temple University. For the past two years, he has acted in the capacity of teacher and band director at Muhlenberg College. During the past year, he also taught at Moravian College and Wilmington Music School in Delaware. Mr. Tower was impressed by the fact that most students at Juniata are more interested in learning then good grades. Mr. Tower also said a band was being organized to play at athletic events beginning October 19 (Homecoming). He stressed the fact that in order to be successful, the instrumental department needs many more musicians. He hopes students who can play any instrument, even string instruments, will contact him in Swigart Hall. If you're a little rusty, Mr. Tower feels there's no better way to get in tune

by Sue Blum

Back in time, about a year ago at Juniata, RA's were hardly ever given any attention. They were thought of as just like another one of the guys in the hall. The general reaction to an RA now is "Bummer Rush—here comes the RA."

According to the Pathfinder You will find your RA to be a "valuable resource person, an upperclass student who will be able to answer many of your questions. The RA's are friendly and helpful people who are interested in you and eager to help you become oriented to college and residence hall living. In addition the residence hall staff helps to interpret the goals and policies of Juniata and, when necessary, enforce college regulations." This is precisely where the importance of my article comes in. When is it necessary to enforce college regulations? Should students be allowed to have parties and turn their record players up on weekends? It seems as though students during the first couple weeks of school weren't allowed to express any rowdiness on campus. The new RA set-up has roving RA's. And if the RA's on duty the night of your party and he's roving over your way, the most likely results will be a super bust. Cracking down on parties now is starting to die down. It seems that the RA's were taking jobs too seriously. A succession of parties were busted in a row, at Emmert, the Ranch, and at Tussey.

Now let's take a look at the rules on campus. No alcoholic beverages or illegal drugs allowed! There's no rule that says you can't turn up your stereo, let out some hoots with your friends and have a good time. At least students should be allowed to party without drugs and alcohol. This is my opinion anyway. Yes, college is a center of learning and that aspect is the most important. Social learning is one aspect of this learning though. Everyone knows that when their social life is grooving so are their books. With pressures of booking and tests constantly one is about to jump out the window to relieve the pain of PRESSURE! So I think the student body should be able to have a little fun—legally if that's the way it is supposed to be done. After talking to a couple RA's it seems they don't like busting parties and fun up here either. They consider it part of their job—but many conveniently avoid confronting troublesome situations. Yes, I agree there should be RA's, some rules enforced, but a break once in a while won't hurt. Long live parties!

Juniata Attempts Recycling Again

by Peter Pappalardo

On Monday, October 9, the first meeting of the Juniata Recycling Club was held. This represents the second attempt at an on-campus recycling organization. Hopefully, the second attempt will fare better than the first.

There are several differences in the new recycling program. Most notable is the fact that collection occurs at the dormitory. Glass, cans and newspapers and glossy magazines (TIME, NEWSWEEK) will be collected at appointed places in the dormitories (look for notices). This approach is designed to encourage participation by the College community to a greater extent than did the previous program.

Second, there seems top be more student support than in past years. This is essential in preventing build-up of materials in the dorms, which would present a fire hazard. The success of the program is almost entirely dependent upon student support and co-operation.

The only other factor that is a determinant is the co-operation Student Government and the Recycling Committee will receive from the school in the form of transportation and funds. This effort is a non-profit one that depends upon Administrative support. All recycled materials will be channeled through the Huntingdon 'Environmental Action group, so that there will be no funds generated in the program. The Committee will be unable to deal with the dorm collections without monetary support.

Collection Points for all dorms are expected to be operative within a month, and in some cases sooner. Further information is available from Peter Pappalardo, Box 144.

Student Gov't Reviews Past Actions; Plans For Future

by Tim Reimer

Tonight at 7:30 in Oller Hall, Bob Jubelirir (R) and Denny Bixler (D) will engage in debate. Both men are candidates for the Pennsylvania State Senate from this senatorial district which includes Blair, Huntingdon, Bedford, and parts of Somerset and Mifflin counties. If you are registered to vote in Huntingdon this is a fine opportunity to assess the candidates, and if you aren't registered here it will be an entertaining example of the political process in action.

A week ago Provost Norris handed down his decision on the suggested change in the visitation policy. The Student Affairs Council and the Student Senate suggested to the Provost that the policy prohibiting members of the opposite sex from sleeping over night in the dorms, be changed to allow sleeping overnight but not the establishment of residence by members of the opposite sex. The reasoning behind this proposal was to keep the visitation policy in line with the academic freedom students have at Juniata to make their own decisions. Provost Norris decided against changing the policy on the basis that students do not form a closed community at Juniata and the affect of such a change would be far reaching into the future.

Student Government would like to thank all the students who participated in last week's search for the lost boy on Tussey Mt. We would also like to thank the faculty and administration for granting those students who did assist in the hunt excused absences from class. Also we hope the "Fall Boy Hunt" doesn't become a new and exciting Juniata tradition.

Odds and Ends: The Sophomore Class is planning a party, with refreshments, this week at the Forty & Eight. . .get your ticket early. . . Plans for Homecoming are coming along fine. . .we are even having a parade through town this year. . . huzzah. . .to Festus: S.G. is not sponsoring Shirley Temple in '76. . . we have a more liberal attitude. . .it is going to be Archie Bunker.

Div. 1 Placement Office To Assist Humanities Students

by June Cramer

There is a new committee being formed on campus which should be of great interest to all students who are involved in the humanities. It is called the Division I Placement Committee, and so far its members are Dr. Hartman, Dr. Post, Mr. Tower and Mr. Jaeger. It is still in the planning stages, but I think it could be an important, as well as timely, contribution to us as students. It will be open to serve all students with a program in the humanities, or programs which combine hunanities with other fields. This means that even a biology major who is interested in combining science and humanities in either post-graduate work or study could be assisted.

This would be a resource committee to help students in locating positions that will utilize the skills they have acquired here at Juniata. It will, hopefully, work along with the Placement Office in finding possible job openings and/or schools, internships, etc. The main thing is that they be "active and aggressive," says Dr. Hartman. They will attempt to use faculty as sources and as contacts in locating positions. Our faculty have varying backgrounds and experiences. Why not try and tap this source? I am sure they would be happy to participate.

Once again, however, the studets must use his or her initiative. This committee cannot come to each student, but it can act as a base from which the student can work. I think this is needed here at Juniata, and especially in the humanities (I may be slightly biased, however).

There are many opportunities for the student with a varied program. It is not necessarily the field where, after graduating, you find that there are no jobs available. Because it seems more and more difficult for graduates to find challenging jobs, need a committee that is willing to help. It would be possible for someone here to contact a prospective employer and find out what courses, he, the employer, would find valuable for a student to complete.

by Mike McElhinney

Last spring the Provost sent out a memorandum to all Juniata students announcing that they would be charged for academic overloads. (academic overloads meaning any additional unit beyond the normal nine units per year).

To complete the picture, I would like to send out a memorandum to all Juniata policy makers announcing that those students taking academic "underloads"—fewer than the normal nine units per year, should be reimbursed. Charging for a ninth unit, when only eight are taken, is inconsistent with the rationale behind the policy of charging for overloads.

In one portion of Dr. Norris' memorandum he discusses the financial reasons for the overload policy and states that ". . .our wish (is) to be fair in our charging policies." Well, anytime the administration wants to start being fair in its charging policies, I'm sure the students will be receptive. How can students who take only two units in one term be asked to pay the same fee as students who are taking three units? There seems to be a discrepancy between the administration's idea of being "fair" and the practice of charging for units which aren't taken. Dr. Norris states in his memo that ". . .all services provided must be paid for." Good. But being charged for a full load when not taking one implies that all services not provided must be paid for for as if they had been provided.

To rectify this inconsistency, I would like to suggest a different approach to the problem of charging for academic units, regardless of the number taken. Why not charge for a student's room and board and then to that figure add a flat fee for each unit taken? The amount each student pays then would depend upon how many units he takes. This policy seems to be very fair and consistent with the Provost's notion that ". . .all services provided must be paid for." And, at the same time, students would not be paying for services they never use.

I would like to invite the Provost, and any other policy maker, to respond to this inconsistency in the current charging policy by writing a Letter to the Editor, to be printed in the following issue of the Juniatian. I would also like to hear how students and faculty view this situation.

Steiger To Portray Symbolic Job

by Brad Rudy

If you haven't heard, there is currently in preparation a production of Archibald MacLeish's drama J.B. It raises many problems related with religion and Job's relationship with his God, most notably, the question of justice in a "humane" God against the suffering of "the perfect and upright man." Sidney Lumet's powerful film "The Pawnbroker" seems to raise these same issues, only with quite different results.

Sol Nazerman (Rod Steiger) suffers much the same fate as Job: His children and wife are killed, his property is confiscated and he is subjected to great tortures and trials, both moral and physical. But, unlike Job, he fails the test. He abandons his God and his religion as being the cruel joke of a sadistic society. He sees his "sin" as merely being Jewish—this was the cause of all his suffering, so he assumes its removal removes the suffering.

Not so! Only by completely shutting out society, by completely ignoring the suffering of the world around him does he think he can forget. But he can't. His past is always there. The cages of his pawnshop become the fences of the concentration camp. A man climbing a playground fence becomes a friend shot trying to escape. A crowded subway becomes the packed cattlecar where his son was trampled to death. A prostitute undressing before him becomes his wife raped and murdered by the Nazis. And overriding all is the memory of the day they first came —idyllic, serene, Sol picnicing with his family, content, oblivious to the impending catastrophe.

Sol also soon discovers that he cannot shut out the present. People begin to take an interest in his welfare, notably a local social worker (Geraldine Fitzgerald) and his young Puerto Rican assistant Jesus (Jaime Sanchez). He becomes angered at their interference and finds himself reliving his past with alarming frequency. Finally, out of spite, Jesus arranges to have the pawnshop robbed by his former delinquent friends. But Sol refuses to hand over his money, claiming that if they shot him, they wouldn't kill him—the Nazis did that twenty years earlier. When the theives shoot, Jesus takes the bullet meant for Sol and dies in his arms. In one awesome moment, he realizes his responsibility to society, becoming a "pseudo-Christ," voluntarily taking on the suffering of the boy. He becomes more or less like J.B. (and Job)—discontent with his past suffering, but now able to adjust to it and cope with the larger demands of his present environment.

This 1965 film will be shown in Oller Hall, Friday night (Oct. 11) at 7 P.M. I will attempt to lead a short discussion of it afterwards, not because it's unnecessarily complex, but because it's so powerful and effective, that one feels a need to talk about it.

Race To Build The Best Car

by John Knouse

Only two and a half weeks are left to build for the Soap Box Derby this year. So crawl out from under your books, sheets and beercans and be creative. Invent the machine that will win — or at least be FUN to use.

After all, more prizes (six) are being offered this year (the fourth) than any other year of this event. A total of $200.00 has been allotted. The event is to take place on Washington Street, a much steeper (and it will be longer) hill than Oneida, the recent site. And if that ain't all, two categories are open for competition.

Some interesting things have happened in the past. Perhaps you, Joe Juniata, would never consider travelling downhill in a bathtub, but it has been done. A really CLASSIC example involved a coffin and four iron wheels. But YOU need not go to these extremes, if you don't want to. Just build a better racer that can beat down that path to your door, and watch the man with the money come over.

We have published a few — ah — simple rules, to start one and all on a more or less equal basis and to protect life and limb. The rules will be enforced, so please use them as guidelines.

If you have not already done so, pick up rules and entry blanks at the Information Desk in Ellis Hall, for the event on October 27.

Student Supports JC Gov.

by Perry Habecker

This week I have been asked for my opinion of the effect of Student Government on the students—certainly a difficult request even for a biased opinion. (By now you've said "Oh no, another Student Government article." It is your prerogative to stop here, and look for something else to read. However, I will continue to spout off for those readers who have questioned the merit of Juniata-style student government.)

I have come to the conclusion that those persons who declaim S.G. as purposeless are ignorant of the role student representation plays. The effect is all too easily overlooked.

If there was a rubber stamp that said STUDENT REPRESENTATION WAS IN PART RESPONSIBLE FOR THIS DECISION, there would be few directives without this stamp. "Students never get to make any final decisions," some may say. There is some validity in this. Most administrative committees have students outnumbered. However, the caliber of the student representatives influences the "them versus us" ratio. Then again, there some things entirely overseen by S.G.. WJC, the JUNIATIAN, the KASIR, the ALFARATA receive funds according to the Student Government budget. Campus organizations and campus solicitation are subject to S.G. sanctions. To verify and expand upon the above, please consult the PATHFINDER.

The PATHFINDER fails to mention the intrinsic functions—a subtle role. By its mere presence S.G. exerts a kind of pressure which keeps administrators and faculty responsible to the student. Hasty administration decisions can be quickly challenged through S.G. channels. This checks hasty student reaction and permits rational arguments to prevail.

Extrinsic functions (which do have a Student Government label on them) are course evaluations, polls, student directories, and voter registration drives. Blood Mobiles and dormitory government are also S.G. sponsored. There are some sort of legal services available which this writer (and probably the bulk of the campus) is not familiar with; perhaps the topic for another article.

The meetings are open, but any form of business can only be initiated by a senator. Several copies of the meeting's minutes are regularly posted.

If you still believe Student Government has little effect on your campus environment, consider what has been said. As long as the "representative" institution exists, the involved students will continue to help make constructive decisions by which this campus will abide.

by Henry Siedzikowski

At the time this article appears, Mountain Day '74 will be history, barring inclement weather. This is the first of the yearly events that the college plans to bring the college community together.

Now, some people put these events down as childish. They feel that "sophisticated", adult college students have no need for raft races, All Class Night Plays or romping in the mountains. This type of feeling has always bothered me.

I have always felt that the world would be better off if adults could occassionally let their hair down (no cryptic reference intended), and just have some fun. All of us long for the simple childhood pleasures, but it seems many of us are afraid to admit these desires.

The source of these inhibitions is easily detectable. We have it hammered into us throughout our school years, that our goal must be maturity. When we get to college, we are quickly told that we are now considered mature adults, and we are put on the defensive, lest an immature act should prove us unfit to be college students.

This systematic conditioning is absurd. I do not want to give the impression that I am knocking maturity. In our formal relationships, maturity is absolutely essential if we are to succeed. But we must remember, that all life should not be serious and formal. And beyond this, maturity is all a matter of individual definition.

My message then, is simple; Have enough confidence in yourself that you can dictate the terms of your life, rather then having them dictated for you. Don't be afraid to have a good time. If you take advantage of events like Mountain Day to have a good time with your friends, I think you'll find it enriches your college years immeasurably.

One final note off this topic. A word of praise should go out to those members of the college community who participated in the search for the lost boy over the weekend. It is encouraging to see the college community pull together to help the outside community when such a situation arises.

What Is There To Do?

by Nancy Nordberg
Rosemary Tai

The first dance marathon at J.C. was described as a grand success. Six couples entered the contest and five couples danced until 12 P.M. As the music played on, the spectators continued to come and dance and enjoy some of the finest baked goods.

Not much information could be obtained from the class officers as to what went on during the wee hours of the morning. A few "revival" tries were made, some resorted to skipping around the floor, while others caught some sleep on the sofas, still the dancers danced. Four couples continued after 8:05 A.M. As 9:00 A.M. rolled around one couple remained. Much congratulations to the winners—Ruth Rogers and Richard Brandt.

By many it was described as a LONG night and Saturday as a huntin' day. Rumor has it there may be another one in the spring—how 'bout 18 hours this time?

Gail Eagles, billed as "The Entertaining Psychic" will appear on Tuesday, Oct. 15 at 8:15 P.M. in Oller Auditorium. Eagles has appeared on T.V. many times and was a preliminary attraction prior to Evel Knievel's attempted rocketed flight across the Snake River Canyon. According to his press releases, he rode a motorcycle blindfolded through an obstacle course near the edge of the canyon. If you need a study break on Tuesday evening, why not stop in and meet Gill Eagles.

FRANKLY SPEAKING....

"I CRAMMED SO MUCH FOR THIS EXAM I GOT CONSTIPATION!"

Minorities Speak: Fight For Rights!

by Gary Wayne Moore

I can remember walking Lin McGee home from elementary school each day. The distance was actually quite far; but when walking and talking with her, the walk seemed too short. She lived just around the corner from me. I liked her quite a bit. I used to steal kisses from her, and sometimes I would be so bold as to tap her on her soft behind.

This summer, I saw Lin for the first time in six years. She wasn't at all as I remembered her. Her legs were grotesque, they seemed as muscular as those of a male spinter. Her behind didn't shake as it used to. There was no movement, it was as if she wore an iron girdle. I cringed when thinking of pinching her for fear that my fingers might break. Her arms were limp and seemed to reach below her knees, they barely moved when she walked. It was as if they were no longer used to help her body move. Her face looked badly beaten. Her eyes were red and swollen. I tried to think what age she looked — I couldn't. I wanted to call out to her, but words would not have served any purpose. They would have communicated only my reaction to her and probably would have reaffrimed for her her vision of herself. I could not bring myself to speak with this woman who I had so much fun with when I was a boy.

I wondered how many more pretty black girls would take up Lin's profession to support a habit. I imagine the number of these "street ladies" will increase. The slums where Lin and I lived are worse than ever. The buildings are shabbier and the rats are twice the size and number they used to be. What's also really frustrating is the thought of how many little black boys will eventually become these little girls "Sugar Daddy." Everyone hustles in the dog eat dog world of the slums just to survive day to day — like Lin.

It's important that people understand the plight of those like Lin. There are thousands of young black kids locked up in the ghettos and slums. Most of them believe that they can never really make it in a world that doesn't seem to want them, that doesn't really care. So young high-school dropouts get their heads high on dope, dreaming of what it would be like to sit behind a desk on Wall Street, wearing a Pierre Cardin suit. It's saddening to think of how many little black kids will end up dreaming their lives away because they cannot enter a world which has seemingly closed it's doors on them.

It's important that whites feel the frustrations of blacks. I'm not saying that whites must now begin to over-compensate on a cold calculating level. But that whites must feel the sadness and frustrations of people like Lin. Blacks are human! All people have a right to set their own goals, with a chance and hope of accomplishing them! But these chances and hopes might never come to be, as long as whites completely control the government and economy. They must feel the plight of ghetto blacks; they must pass bills, without the thought that they are giving someone something. Perhaps it's as a good friend of mine put it, "as long as there is someone on the top, things will always be pretty fucked up." but blacks don't want to walk in front of whites. Most of them would settle for walking beside them — but not less than this.

It's especially important for students at Juniata to understand the plight of blacks in the ghettos because these students supposedly represent a new, and open-minded generation of people. The problem with students at Juniata as I see it; is not that they don't want to understand the frustrations of blacks, but that they don't have to understand them. Why should a suburban white making $20,000 a year, have to deal with blacks in the ghettos? I can sympathize with the fact that many whites at Juniata have never had any intimate relationships with blacks, simply because there are no blacks where they live. In fact, a professor at Juniata related to me that the first time he saw a black, was when he was fifteen years old. Page through your year books sometime and count the number of black faces you see. But this is what you must deal with, or a whole new generation of young blacks may die without ever knowing what life is.

Understand that there are thousands of beautiful black kids whose souls cry out for answers, don't ignore them. Most have the attitude that; O.K., whites have spit in our faces, just don't take your hand and rub it in. Even a junkie has pride. But pride alone can't sustain life. Even the most lowly creature on earth has a chance of survival. But blacks in the ghettos are far from being animals. Are we so nieve to believe that a junkie can cure his own habit? It's important that you understand this; there have been too many pretty black girls like Lin. And each time one of them searches for a vein in their arm or leg, the hopes and chances of helping them narrows.

Rugby-New Campus Craze Guys Off to Winning Start

by Skip Hartman

The latest craze, sports-wise, to hit the Juniata campus is rugby football. The Juniata Rugby Football Club, making its debut at Penn State on Sunday, defeated their combined B and C teams by a score of 32-20.

Rugby was introduced to us by Charlie Lerman, who is the club's advisor and coach. Dr. Lerman, a newcomer to Juniata, played rugby for four years at Harvard. Thus far, twenty-five to thirty ruggers have been recruited, and new ruggers are always welcome.

On Sunday, three halves were played at Penn State. The first two halves were thirty minutes in length with a five minute half time. The third half was twenty-five minutes in length and was to give everyone a chance to play, since only fifteen players from each team are allowed on the field at a time and no substitutions are permitted.

Juniata's first try was scored by Steve 'Roth, immediately following a Penn State try and conversion. The second try was scored by Jim Daniels on a breakaway pass. The third try was scored by Todd Price, with Alan Kulp making his first successful conversion. The fourth try was scored by Alan Kulp with Bob Barth making the conversion. This brought an end to the first half with the score, Juniata 20 - Penn State 16.

The scoring was held down in the second half. Our next try on a kick by Alan Kulp, which he recovered and ran in for the try. He also made the conversion. Juniata's final try in the game came from Steve Shulties, with the conversion, again, by Alan Kulp. The final score was 32-20, Juniata.

Juniata's only try in the third half was scored by Chris Davidson.

In rugby a try, which is touching the ball down over the goal line, is worth four points. A conversion is then attempted, from a point perpendicular to where the try was scored. The ball may be any distance from the goal line and it must pass thru the uprights. A conversion is worth 2 points.

The game went well for Juniata and the team, even though young and inexperienced, played up to its full potential. Juniata's scrum was strong and overpowered Penn State's scrum almost every time. The passing which is backwards, was accurate, but there was not enough support during Juniata's offensive movements. Our major problem on the field was that of inexperience.

After the game both teams went to the Kappa Sigma fraternity, for the traditional post-game party, where the ruggers socialize and sing rugby songs.

Rugby creates a new and exciting challenge for me. It gives me an opportunity to use my soccer talents and combine them with the added physical contact of tackling. Physically, rugby is demanding. It requires constant running and stamina. But, most of all, for me, rugby is an extremely enjoyable and clean sport.

Hopefully, the committee could get feedback on how successful they have been, by following the progress of the people it has placed. I, for one, think this is a fantistic idea, and am anxiously awaiting its implementation. If you are interested in putting your name down to look into possible fellowships, scholarships, professional or graduate schools, careers, or need letters of recommendation in or near the field of humanities, then please contant Dr. Donald Hartman.

Indians Score A Shut Out

by Alan D. Wirt

Lycoming College has been frustrated by Juniata defenses for three straight years; never being able to score more than a mere field goal in the last three meetings. Last Saturday was no exception, as the Indians pinned a 26-0 setback on the Warriors (1-3) for the fourth straight Juniata win over Lycoming. In the 18 game series with the Williamsport team, Juniata has won 16, and lost only two. The last time the Warriors tasted victory over the Blue and Gold was in 1970.

Juniata scored early against their outclassed opponents. Sophomore quarterback Dave Wickerowski laced three straight passes, on the first possesion and put six on the board with ease. The first two passes of the drive went to Carmen DeFransesco for 17 and 14 yards respectively. Then from the 33 yard line, Wick found Senior Pete Lentini open for the score. With 13:13 remaining in the first quarter, Juniata led 6-0. The conversion attempt failed.

Both teams punted on their next two possessions. But Juniata won the short punting dual, when Stu Jackson boomed a 60 yarder that put Lycoming on their own ten yard line. After ten plays that advanced the Warriors to midfield, Steve "Skinney" Norris picked off a stray aerial and gave Juniata the ball at their own 39. Lycoming then took the ball back on an interception of their own, but the disease was catching, and the Warrior Q.B. no sooner got the ball, then he threw another interception to Norris. This time Norris smelled touchdown, and streaked 35 yards for six points. Carmen's two point conversion made it 14-0.

When Juniata got the ball back, they drove for 56 yards and another TD. The score was 20-0 and Lycoming was in desperate need of a score if they were to stay in the game. Juniata linebacker Steve Lehman crushed their hopes with a crucial tackle on the six inch line that culminated a four play goal line stand.

After the half-time break, both teams traded punts until Lycoming decided it was time to intercept a pass. In two plays, the ball was Juniata's again, as a result of a fumble recovery by the Indians. From the 22 yard line Dave Wickerowski dropped back, and found Freshman halfback Chris DeJeet for the final TD of the game.

The 26-0 win gave the Indians a 2-0 M.A.C. record, and a 2-1 log overall. The stage is now set, for the big showdown with M.A.C. co-leader Wilkes this Saturday. This is a crucial game coming up. It was Wilkes who spoiled Juniata's season last year, with an upset victory. After the wet dream in Ithaca, the Juniata defense has given up only seven points in 8 quarters of play, and the offense (that most people thought would be a question mark) is raising eyebrows as they have averaged an awesome 24 points in their last two games. It should be the best game of the year this week, so stick out the thumb and be there.

JV Team Stops Bucknell, 12-9

by Jerry Milliron

"Fantastic team effort, these guys played an unbelievable game and they just wouldn't budge an inch when it counted. It was just an all around defensive effort". These were the words of rookie defensive coach Tom Herman after his J.V. team defeated the Bucknell Bisons last Monday, Sept. 30th. Coach Herman is only one of the three rookies added to the coaching staff this year. His other J.V. coaching companion are former well known players themselves. They are Don Myers and Mike McNeal.

Juniata won the toss and elected to receive. After a 20 yard return the Indians were able to move the ball on the ground successfully. But after 7 plays were forced to punt. The defense held fast and the Bisons had to surrender the ball. The game see-sawed back and forth in the first quarter and ended in a scoreless tie.

Early in the second quarter, the Indians with rookie quarterback, Tim Tomas, at the helm started rambling down towards the goal-line. Behind the endless running of Freshman Barry Eck and the receptions of Eddie Flynn the Indians soon found themselves on the four yard line. After being unsuccessful twice up the middle, they then gave the ball to Eck who bulled his way to paydirt from the two. The conversion was wide and the Indians lead 6 zip.

The Indians looked as if they would enter the locker room with a 6 to nothing lead but fate wouldn't allow it. With only 39 seconds left in the half the Bisons scored on a 60 yard aerial. After the JV.'s blocked Bucknell's conversion, the score was tied at the half 6 to 6.

The Indians ran into trouble early in the third quarter. The Bisons started a drive in their own 40 and found themselves on the 3 yard line with first and goal. Here the defensive unit shined as they held the Bisons scoreless in 4 attempts. The rest of the 3rd quarter proved unsuccessful as neither team scored.

In the opening of the 4th the Bisons started another drive, but the defensive unit dug in and the Bisons had to settle for a disputed field goal.

The offensive unit now had it's work cut out for them. With freshman Shawn Flattery quarterbacking, mission impossible started from the 20 yard line. Within 4 plays the Indians were on the Bucknell 40 but were faced with a 3rd and 15. Flattery dropped back for a pass, found all his receivers covered and tucked the ball under his arm and headed for the first down marker. After avoiding two tacklers, Shawn was forced out of bounds with a 20 yard pick-up. Several plays later the Indians had the ball on the 5 yard line with 4 tries at a touchdown. After 2 unsuccessful attempts Flattery called a pass play, but saw an opening and took the ball in for the touchdown himself. The 2 point conversion failed and the Indians were up 12-9.

With 3:50 left on the clock, the defensive squad had to come thru and they did. They forced a punt and then after the offensive unit had to surrender the ball, the defensive unit came up with an interception which iced the cake. The game ended with our rookie coaches bringing home an unexpected victory. Keep it up boys.

Hockey Women Defeated But Never Disillusioned!

by Kim Norris and Jacque Prentiss

This past week was both active and disappointing for the women's field hockey team as they opened their new season, suffering two defeats at the home fields of Susquehanna University and Shippensburg State College.

On Monday, Sept. 30, the varsity squad had their first upset, a narrow 2-1 defeat by the S.U. Crusaders. Both teams appeared equally aggressive, however Juniata lacked the necessary teamwork required in scoring. Perhaps it was a case of first game jitters, in addition to playing on an unfamilar field. Susquehanna succeeded in scoring both goals, one in each half, and in holding the Juniata forward line to only one score, after repeated attempts. Juniata's right inner, Kyle Messick, finally penetrated the defense and scored.

In the junior varsity game, J.C. was again nipped by a close 3-2 loss, with inexperience being a setback.

On Wednesday, Oct. 2, the Indians bowed to a 7 to 1 victory by Shippensburg Raiderettes, at Raiderettes Stadium. S.S.C., known for its physical education department, had a definite advantage, in that their playing field was comparable to a well cared for football field, in contrast to the conditions of Juniata's home field.

After juggling positions in the forward line and a strong practice on Tuesday, the Indians played a much improved game, not representative in the scoring. At half-time, the score was 2-1, the J.C. goal being scored by freshman, Pam Julius. The Shippensburg squad recovered and dominated the second half, most evident in their skill-work and strategy plays. Even though it marked another loss, the Indians were satisfied in that they gained much during the actual play and afterwards watching themselves on videotape.

The junior varsity was shut-out by the Raiderettes in a well-played, 6-0 game. they showed improvement and a gain in composure, necessary for a young team.

The home field advantage can make a marked difference in a team's play. School enthusiasm and student support are great assets. Show your spirit and come support the women's field hockey team during their home games.

I Am Not A Sadist

by Sean Ryan

The title which Gary Moore gave my article, is a misleading stereotype that society seems to give to offensive linemen. People see offensive linemen as big, dumb, robots who take pleasure in hurting opponants. On the contrary, though I feel the opposite is true. At 6'0", 205 lbs. I am hardly in a position to be sadistic especially when the tackle over me is 6'4", 250 lbs (not uncommon even in the M.A.C .S).

Why does anybody become an offensive lineman? Tough question !!! Ask any little kid what football player they want to be like, and they'll say Joe Namath, Larry Czonka or Franco Harris. I have never heard a little kid say he wanted to be like Bob Skironski (retired offensive tackle, Green Bay Packers) or Bruce Van Dyke (guard for Green Bay Packers). I offer no real theory why people become offensive linemen, only my own experience. I wanted to play football, because everyone else did (I guess you could say peer pressure). The only trouble was, I wasn't agile enough to be a Quarterback, or fast enough to be a Back, this sort of restricted my choice of positions to the line, and since there were an overabundance of defensive linemen, I became more restricted. Playing the offensive line, to me, was better than playing no football at all. Offensive guard became a position that I was content with. It has a distinct skill of its own. You have to learn between 40-60 offensive plays. You have to learn to read defenses (like a Quarterback) so you know who to block. You cannot use your hands against your opponent, so you have to be quicker, more agile than he is. You have to learn to change plays on the line, because the quarterback has called an audible, or a linebacker is threatening the gap. In all, being an offensive lineman is 60% mental and 40% physical. It's not sadistic at all. My job is to keep the defensive players away from the ball carrier, and whoever is the most skilled (quicker, more agile) will come out ahead. Tempers do rise in a physical, competitive game like football, but I have never deliberatly tried to hurt anyone or felt that someone was deliberatly trying to hurt me. If someone does get injured, there seems to be a sort of respect between football players. Although referees are responsible for calling penalties there seems to be an unwritten code that "most" linemen (or all football players) follow. You always strive to do the best you can, but you never try to hurt a fellow player. After all, football is only a game, and linemen are human beings first.

Tribe Runners Gain Win

by Dr. J. Mitchell

Juniata's Cross Country team made a highly sucessful debut September 30, in a dual meet with St. Francis College. Showing excellent strength, Juniata captured 11 of the first 12 positions. Only St. Francis' Keith Houser who took fifth place prevented a complete shutout. Sophomore Greg Ransom took first place with the time of 33:14.3 which goes into the books as the record for Juniata's new 5.5 mile course. Coaches Meditch and Mitchell were especially pleased not only with the winning time but also with the fact that the next three Juniata runners, Juniors Jack McCoullough and Paul Wilson and Senior Bill Kibler were all under 34 minutes. Junior Steve Hooper Juniata's fifth runner was only a few seconds over 34 minutes with John Ausherman, John Brommer and Doug Crosby all 35:00 or under. Such a strong team balance indicates that this year's team may well out-perform last year's team which was the best in the last decade. Summary: [1.] Greg Ransom (J); [2.] Jack McCullough (j); [3.] Paul Wilson (J); [4.] Bill Kibler (J); [5.] Keith Houser (SF); [6.] Steve Hooper (J); [7.] John Ausherman (J); [8.] John Brommer (J); [9.] Doug Crosby (J); [10.] Dave Quiq (J); [11.] Joe Hile (J); [12.] Jon Antonucci (J).

with your instrument, than by joining one of the ensembles or bands. In other words, you don't have to be a music major in order to be needed by the instrumental music department.

Mr. William Vocke is the new assistant professor of political science. He is a graduate of Ohio State and will receive his doctorate from the University of South Carolina in 1975. Mr. Vocke feels the faculty at Juniata is excellent and the administration is cooperative and highly committed to academic goals. He thinks the students are intelligent, but tend to be a little apathetic. Mr. Vocke is married and has two children. He is presently involved in the publication of his book, "American Foreign Policy—An Analytical Approach". One of his classes is presently studying voting behavior and many of his students' are helping campaign for local candidates. Mr. Vocke seems very committed to forming a one to one relationship with Juniata students. He is very willing to discuss academic or other problems encountered by students during their stay on campus and stressed the fact that his office, 316 Good Hall, is always open.

In conclusion, all seven teachers stated they were anxious to speak with students. Therefore, the next step lies with us. The faculty is not just meant to be used a few hours a week in class. They are here to help you prepare for your future. All of them have lived through the "college stage" and some may have valuable solutions to problems you have encountered. But you'll never find out either way, unless you talk with them. The opportunity is yours. Why not give them a chance?

Wo/men Welcome Alumni

by Sue Blum

This Homecoming Weekend brings something new to Juniata College. There will be a Women's colloquy running Thursday, Friday and Saturday here at Juniata.

The colloquy will begin with a movie on Thursday. The movie is one-half hour long and is called Eve's Mind on Psychology of Women. It will be shown all Thursday afternoon in 422 Good Hall and from 8:00 till 9:30 in the evening. This movie is part of a series of films coming in once a month.

Then on Friday. In the evening at 8:00 in Alumni Hall Dr. Vilma Hunt will be speaking on the changing role of women. Dr. Hunt is a professor of Environmental Health at Pen State. Dr. Hunt holds degrees in Denistry, Physical Anthropology and has done work in Radiation Biology. An informal discussion will follow Dr. Hunt's talk.

Saturday morning between 9 a.m. and 1 p.m. there will be available a series of workshops. Exact times of the workshops will be available at the information desk. Workshop topics will include: "Women in Sports" run by JoAnn Reilly and Natielly Weist. "Women and their Bodies" run by Mrs. Valanzern from the Belfront Family Planning Committee. "The Effect of Women's Lib on Men" run by Frank Herbert from Penn State. "Women on Politics" run by Lona Norris and Beverly Pfrogner. "Women as Wives" run by Kim Mitchell and Bonny Lasko. This will deal with many women's different perspectives on what it means to be a wife. "Alternative Lifestyle's" run by 5 women and one man living in a cooperative for the past five years. "Child Rearing and Day Care" run by Sally Gnjrejak and Jeff Cople.

The leaders of the Colloquy encourage everyone in the college community to attend. The workshops will be informal discussions in nature and all events will be free of charge. One can't beat it at that price.

Also a women's Arts and Crafts Show will run the whole weekend in the Main Lounge. Various works made by women will be on display. So try something different this Homecoming Weekend! Come to the Women's Colloquy. It will be an enjoying and learning experience for all.

Policies On Repeating A Unit Outlined By Faculty

by Izeppo

The Faculty met for the second time this academic year last Wednesday, October 2. Its main order of business, and one of special concern to students, was a consideration of those policies governing "repeat enrollment in units" —students aking a unit more than once. The policies came to the floor in a three part proposal, submitted by the Academic Standards Committee. Two parts were passed by the Faculty. The remaining part will be considered by them at next month's meeting. The Faculty passed the following policies:

"No unit may count as credit toward a graduation requirement more than once." This means a student may take a unit more than once, hopefully for a better grade, but receives credit for the unit only after passing it the first time.

"Students seeking to register for a unit previously satisfactorily completed must obtain permission from the Registrar," was the second of the general policies passed.

In connection with repeat enrollments, the Faculty also passed two detailed policies, relating specifically to that smaller transcript listing only those units satisfactorily completed, the LSCU. They were:

"The best grade received for a unit included in the Program of Emphasis will be the one included in the LSCU." 'however, if the unit was passed more than once, that unit will be listed in the LSCU with an asterisk (*).

The second policy passed in this part of the proposal stated that the grade printed in the POE list on the LSCU will be the one used in computing the grade point average of the POE on the LSCU.

Prof. Coffman announced that the rationale for these policies was to give students a chance to put "their best foot forward." It's good to lknow that we have yet another chance to put our best foot out front; and while nobody may want to spend ten years repeating a course he's already passed in quest of the elusive "A," there may come a time when . . . ya never know.

Remember The Intra-College Phones? Well Just Forget It!

BY David Mitchell

Many students at Juniata have often wondered why the college hasn't provided a free campus telephone system for the students benefit. After all, many other campuses have them, take for example, the communications system at Penn State. We at Juniata pay nearly twice the amount Penn State students pay in room, board, and tuition so shouldn't we be entitled to some of the same privileges?

Well, the truth is, Juniata College cannot afford to install a system similiar to the one in use at Penn State. Several years ago, student government at Juniata conducted a study to investigate the possibility of having a free campus telephone system. The facts derived from the study have shown that the possibility of students having their own system is nearly non-existent.

For example, the telephone system at Penn State was installed at the same time many of the dormitories were being built. At Juniata, to install the systems would involve a lot of tearing down and rebuilding within the dorms. Several years ago, the costs for installation in just one dormitory was estimated to be in the range of $8,000 to $10,000. Of course, due to present inflation rates, the cost would be much more today.

What can the student do about it?

Frankly, there is nothing that we can do. Inflation has hit small private colleges the hardest of all educational institutions. Sure, we as students are concerned about the money we are investing in our education and wonder why we don't have many of the conveniences the larger state schools have. In fact, there is a study now being conducted by the Juniatian to see where our tuition money is being spent. But as long as we students are receiving a quality education for our money, we have no justified cause for complaint.

Student Government News Past, Present and Future

by Tim Reimer
Senate Public Relations Committee

With Homecoming this weekend, a lot is being planned. First off, the Board of Trustees will be on campus for the weekend. Student Government is involved in a dinner meeting with the Board; also the new student representatives to the Board of Trustees will be participating in their first meetings this weekend. Second the Woman's Colloquy is to be held this weekend and we urge all students to take advantage of the resources available through the Colloquy. Third, the class officers in conjunction with the Special Events Committee of Center Board have made plans for a homecoming parade through Huntingdon. The parade will be Saturday morning.

The Bixler-Jubelirer debate last Thursday was a success in that over 300 people, both students and townpeople, were in attendance. the two candidates debated around the issues in the 30th senatorial district, hopefully affording those in attendance information concerning who will be the best choice in the fall elections. The debate was covered by both newspspers and Altoona television-channel ten. The election will be held November 5. For you out of state voters, there is information available in the student government office concerning absentee ballots and how to obtain them. Please make the effort to get an absentee ballot, your vote is of importance.

Senate Standing Committees are beginning to form regular meeting schedules. If you are interested in these meetings contact the following committee heads to find out particulars. Jim Gerek—Student Concerns, Tim Reimer -Public Relations, Tom Cross, Budget and Management, and Cricket Smith, Dorm Government. Next week we will try to print the meeting times and places of the various committees. The next Senate meeting is Tuesday, October 22 in the Ballroom Annex at 7:00.

Odds and ends. . .Margret Chase Smith, former Republican Senator from Maine will be on campus the week of November 3 to the 9. . . Smith will mainly be involved in informal lectures and discussions with students. . .this weekend's party at the 40 & 8 went well. . .the freshmen class is planning another for the end of the month. . .

Music Sounds On New WJC

by J. Steich

Although WJC is twenty years old this year, it's new! If that seems to be a contradiction of terms, one need only stop into the lobby and studios of the "new WJC. Not only has the physical layout of the station drastically changed during this past summer, but the personnel involved are expressing great enthusiasm over the improvements being made.

One of the problems that they are trying to deal with now is getting the music to the students! Until now, WJC can only be received in the North Dorm, the East Houses, parts of South and Lesher Dorms and Ellis Hall. WJC also transmitts by FM cable to the Huntingdon, Alexandria and Saxton areas. They happen to be the second station in the United States to use FM (CATV) transmission! In all other residence halls, WJC cannot be received at 620 on the AM dial. This is due to the fact that the programs are not transmitted over the air, but rather through the electrical systems of the respective dorms, by a method known as Carrier Current. Presently there are some legal problems with the FCC, as well as technical difficulties involving the transmitters in the dorms not on the air. All of the repairs will be made soon, although some assistance may possibly be needed from the College's electricians.

WJC has changed, is still changing, and will continue to grow. The staff welcomes anyone interested in helping them grow. Innovative areas open for you include: advertising sales, commercial production, continuity production, engineering and the news staff. If you love radio and want to be a part of it, stop by!

I am in complete agreement with Sue Blum — "long live parties"! But her unfair and obviously uninformed treatment of RA's was entirely uncalled for.

First of all, the roving RA system, identical to the system used at Penn State, was initiated to give the RA staff more time to socialize on weekends, not to set up a police force to patrol the campus. Under the old system, there was an RA on duty in every building, every weekend, usually doing nothing more than counting the steps as he checked out the halls for any situation that might have required his presence. This resulted in countless wasted man-hours every term. Presently, there are only three RA's on duty per weekend, one at Mr. Berrier's desk in Terrace, the other two roving on campus. The RAs not on duty are free to carry on their social life as they desire, except that they are requested to return to their respective dorms by 2:00 A.M. Actually, this system was introduced to increase efficiency and to reduce the number of duty hours for each RA.

The primary function of the roving RA is not to dissipate rowdy parties. His first concern is discovering any situation, such as a possible emergency, that may require his assistance. If you think fires and physical injuries don't occur in dorms on weekends, you're kidding yourself. That's why RA's are on duty. Enforcing college policies is also part of the RA's assignment, although at times it may be unpleasant. If a party is becoming extremely loud, it is probably interfering with someone's sleep or studying, so the RA will ask those partying to quiet down. Unless I've been lied to by numerous people, it's only when some of the more rowdy socializers exhibit an uncooperative attitude toward the RA that trouble results. All but a very small minority are willing to be less boisterous, but, unfortunately, these few, in an effort to show their superiority to the RA and to the system, create difficulties for all concerned.

As an RA, all I ask is that people be reasonable with me and I'll do the same. If someone is flagrantly violating a college policy, I consider this unreasonable and I'll have to take action against him. Whether this involves alcohol, drugs or infringing on another student's rights of privacy by being too noisy, is irrelevant. As I see it, there have been quite a number of "breaks" already, if you consider the number of people who have participated in one or more of the "keggers" in past weeks as compared to the number of written warnings that have been issued.

If anyone has any violent disagreement, or has a suggestion on how to improve the weekend RA duty system, I would very much like to hear your opinion. I live on the second floor of Emmert House, room number 11.

Promotion Vs. Popularity Of Films

by Brad Rudy

There really isn't too much I want to say about this week's movie ("Bad Day at Black Rock"), except perhaps that it is an action-suspense film with social overtones obvious enough for a two-year old. I will forego my usual article and, instead, gripe some more about the state of current film popularity. I will use this week to comment on the results of our recent "extra film" questionnaire, and expand next week to include the general current picture in film.

We have received and tallied about 400 questionnaires so far, but a trens seems to be emerging and we can safely predict the results. We will be taking those films with votes above a certain point and choosing from those. But, let's stop a second and inspect those in consideration. We should be abie to see trends in the films so that future film chairmen can choose the extra films without the tedious job of tallying 400-600 10-or-so-vote questionnaires.

Okay, let's look at the top 13 (those with over 100 votes). What exactly do they have in common? Difficulty to the audience: They range from the childishly simple ("Walking Tall) to the most agonizingly complex ("Last Tango")—no connection there. Seriousness: the most highly farcical ("Bananas") to the most bitterly tragic ("Lady Sings the Blues")—hardly similar. Aesthetic quality: the most mindless escapism ("The Harrad Experiment") to the most polished, lyrical and aesthetic art ("2001"). Violent content: Well we have "The Godfather" but we also have "The Way We Were." How about age: 1939 ("Gone with the Wind") to 1973 ("American Graffiti"). Authors: Kurt Vonnegut's "Slaughterhouse-five" was perhaps our biggest money-getter last year. This year, his "Happy Birthday, Wanda June" could only get six votes. Directors: Our highest vote-getter last year was Robert Altman's "MASH." This year—"The Long Goodbye" (27 votes), "Theives Like Us," (14), and "Images" (3). You will find no similarities star-wise either. But there is one similarity! With one exception only, these were probably the thirteen most exploited films on the list. These were those films which were "pushed" most by the distributors. And looking at the losers, we see that the ones at the bottom of the list were those given nominal, if any, advertising. In other words, these are films we were told to go see by the distributors. (The one exception in "The Harrad Experiment." Just by coincidence, though, one of the recommended HEA readings this term was. . .well, you'll find out soon enough.)

This, in a nutshell, is the state of film popularity in our society. It is not any artistic or even entertaining quality within the film itself which makes or breaks it—it is whether or not the distributors want it to succeed or not. Paramount would spend millions promoting "The Great Gatsby" and "Chinatown" but a pittance promoting "The Conversation" (despite the fact that it took the Golden Palm at the Cannes Film Festival). Robert Altman will find his films killed by the studio, but he will make one that sort of resembles an established hit like "The Stinger" ("California Split"), so they will exploit it as such and have a hit on their hands. The fact that the tone and content is nothing at all like "The Sting" doesn't bother them too much. But I'll go more into these films next week.

The artist in Hollywood has become virtually non-existent. He will somehow get the backing to make "his" film and see it die. The distributors will only push those following standard success formulae and using highly successful names. They don't trust the artist. They will say "Well, we won't push your movie until we see what the reviews are like". Even if it is raved, then, they will say "Well, no one listens to the course, you go to the one "everybody's talking about," everybody being in reality the distributors. not drawing a crowd, so why should we spend more on it?" Think back now. Do you go to movies that are advertised in a small title-only box that you haven't heard of elsewhere, or do you go to the one with the full-page ad, the one whose title has been flooding all the media? Of course, you go to the one "every-

by Bob Meacham

Originally I was asked to write an article informing the student body about the judicial structure here at Juniata. I contemplated on this designated purpose and found it to be an unconstructive endeavor. Since page twenty-five of the Pathfinder services the above mentioned purpose adequately, what the Pathfinder does not serve to do is to bring to mind the whole question of accountability in higher education. Judicial Board exists to deal with violations of school policy. There is no question about its function. A broader question more worthy speaking of cannot help but come to light. What is the role of administrative authority in higher education and who are those of the administration accountable to? A closer examination of the question may prove to be startling to all of us who believe that college administrators are directly accountable to the students who attend any given college.

The foremost function of any college or university should be the perpetuation of old knowledge and the search for new discovery. The obtaining of knowledge is a reciprocal process. Knowledge comes with exchange of experience through human interaction of many forms. Administrative authority helps to dictate through legislation the ways in which people interact. The reciprocal function of knowledge through experience is directly altered by authority dictated by college administrations. Administration assumes a power hierarchy. In such a hierarchy, the higher in rank have more power than those of lower rank, enabling control over the latter's activities. In this process the principle of administration is grossly violated; The organization (the college community) ceases to be a coordinated tool. It becomes a tool without the ability to help.

Knowledge is an individual property. It cannot be passed from person to person by means of administrative decree. It is this individualized principle pertaining to the quest for knowledge which directly opposes the exercise of control and decree by a college administration. The ultimate justification in a student's quest for knowledge is that it is, to the best of his previously acquired knowledge, the right act. The ultimate justification of many administrative acts is that it is in line with the organization's rules and regulations, and that it has been approved — directly or by implication — by a superior rank.

If experience and the knowledge gained through it is to serve all of us as a workable and useful tool, isn't it better that we be trained in the use of that tool with confidence? The amount of external control exerted over an individual has a direct effect on that person's self perception. The

The Debate
Where Elephants Dare

by Steve Townsend

Every four years about half of the great American electorate turns out for what is known as the Congressional elections. As a rule, nothing extremely dynamic ever results from these elections for without the president's head on the chopping block no one is quite sure who to finger for all their problems. But this year may prove quite different. The traditional losers suffered by the party holding power may well turn into a tragic bloodbath for the Republicans. Sick of deceitful Nixon style tactics, and fed up with Ford's incredibly inept shenanigans, the electorate, for the first time in decades as a clear target in its sights, and it doesn't look as though its going to miss too many shots.

Recent Gallup polls show Gerry Ford recording the swiftest fall from grace of any American President. In two short months the Leader's popularity has plummeted 21 percentage points, which out strips even the Nixon decline. George McGovern, once thought to be easy pickings for Republican designate and former P.O.W., Leo Thorness, has not only pulled even, but he has taken a significant lead. Senator Birch Bayh once thought far too liberal to be re-elected by his conservative Indiana constituency, has begun a systematic disarming of one of the G.O.P.'s most potent hopefuls, Mayor Richard Lugar of Indianapolis. Estimates of the Grim reaper's toll range from a conservative total of 25 seats to predictions of mass genocide upon the Republican Party.

With such heavy rumors of the Democrats overkill capacity circulating around all levels of the political bone pile, it's not to hard to understand why Denny Bixler, a Democrat, decided to take on a 22,000 vote deficit in Pennsylvania's 30th Senatorial district. Its also not hard to understand why Bob Jubelirer, the Republican favorite son (literally), has consistently been pursuing underdog tactics being Jubelirer's continual cry for a debate with Bixler which materialized a week ago in Oller Hall.

Fearful of a light Republican turnout, and anxious for some media coverage to "mobilize the troops", Jubelirer's Republican strategists tries hard to generate some excitement about the whole affair. As debate time approached, the legions of Juniata's Young Republicans were given campaign buttons and told to loiter in the lobby and around the entrances. Even the candidate's wife was trying hard to convey the impression that the impending debate was the political and social event of the year. Bixler, preceeded only by a handful of party workers, entered Oller with an atmosphere of calm serenity that is only developed through continuous exposure to uppity Republican theatrics. Being the first Democrat elected to his House seat since the Civil Was, Bixler obviously knew that the only effective means of dealing with the scorns of Republican hardcores was to act like a Christian who had just stomped the lion.

As the debate began it was soon clear that no enlightening discourses, or magnificient oratorial speeches were on the nights agenda. Both opening constructs offered the same who am I, and why am I trivia that we've been hearing from every politician that has ever been lucky enough to capture our attention. The rebuttal and question periods however, brought some interesting moments.

Jubelirer attacted his opponent for not being present for a particular vote on the House floor. Bixler then proceded to draw a thundering ovation from the mostly hostile audience by stating Lt. Governor designated Lee was also absent and that Jubelirer "must be equally disappointed in him". The Republican hopeful was not without his lighter moments. Trying to toss the bloody shirt of corruption at his opponent, Julbelirer proclaimed passionately that "I am not a crook", and later asked the crowd "Am I going to be a greenie?"

The affair ended much like it had begun Bixler leaving basically alone and unnoticed, while Jubelirer characteristically exited amidst Colonna: Am I Crazy?

by Keith Colonna

In this series of articles written by members of the football team there has been a couple of things in common. Well this article is going to be one that breaks the tradition. Carmen and Sean are two senior captains that are the leaders and backbone of both the offensive line and backfield. I have one big similarity with these two guys, I am a senior. I believe though I have many more dissimilar sides with these guys. Being the only senior on the team that isn't playing one of these. (Don't take this the wrong way, because this is said with no bitterness or sarcasm in mind) This is how this article will differ.

At least once a day someone will come up to me and ask me, why are you still out there? Are you Crazy? Sometimes I have to think before I answer. From starting free three straight years, going to a bowl game and even starting the first game this year to a fourth teamer not even making the away trips might sound a little crazy in itself. Why would a senior who isn't playing want to go out there everyday and run into with his head? Why would he want to stay out there to get physically and mentally beat? Sometimes I wonder if any of these inquisitive people eve thought that a person might like that sort of madness. Some guys just might really get excited over two guys running into each other, or just throwing their body in front of a kicker's leg to try to block a punt. I'm not saying this is the case at hand but it's possible.

In my case I never put the thought out of my head of playing again out of my head. If you like playing the game as much as I do you just stick around and run into guys as long as you have to. If I didn't like any aspect of the game I surely wouldn't be wasting my time fooling anybody or mostly myself.

Another aspect would be the people involved. Being around the players on the team as long as I have you get to know them pretty well. Even when I'm not playing I get just as excited as they do. I like to see people happy and excited. Maybe that's the point of being happy and having fun. Of course I'm not as happy as I would be if I was playing, but I accept the fact that I was beat out and I stay happy by just being around it. Some people might develope a bad attitude and become bitter toward the game, the coaches and even the players who play in front of him but that is senseless. The coaches are trying just as hard as you are. Even if you question one of their moves, it's not your place to second guess them. You just have to be happy with what you are doing by having fun, and trying to prove them wrong (if you believe that is the case) by sticking it out and working your way back up. If that is the real situation it will all come out in the wash in the long run. I feel no different towardsany of these. If I was to be angry at anyone it would be myself for not being better than I am.

I hope this change of pace article has shown the difference between players who start and some of those who don't, besides a little ability there's none. Football has been good to me, and I hope and think I've been good to it. Now, is crazy sticking with something you like?

Fight For Rights!

by Avril Lovett

As a child during elementary school, I would often repeat this saying,"I'm not a 'nigger', I'm a Negro, when I become a 'nigger' I'll let you know." Growing older I realized and understood the importance of those words. However if you replaced the word nigger with the word "boy" you will be saying the same thing. Most people (especially whites) don't realize this.

According to Webster's dictionary, I don't fill the criteria in order to become a boy—although I have been refered to one many a time. I am neither a male servent, immature child nor am I inferior to the white race. The only person who is capable of calling me boy is my father, and he doesn't.

Although we blacks have been set free physically from chains that once bound us, some tools — such as words seem to — constantly linger amongst us. Not that words bother us, to excuse the cliche, a great deal, but we do become sick and tired of racist confrontation.

After reading Gary Moore's article on "The Importance of Lin Magee" I come to one conclusion. As soon as name calling stops amongst blacks and whites, then can we start talking, acting and behaving like human beings. Not like children calling each other names.

I know a 6'5" two-hundred and fifteen pound friend who's been called "boy". Now I ask who in their right mind would have the nerve to call anyone that size a "boy". This sounds ridiculous, and is. Why should I have to write an article on a subject such as this?

Well if you call a black man a boy and he answers "my name's not Roy" then you'll see what I mean.

Accountability

greater amount of external control, the less a person see's himself as the motivating and controlling factor in his life. He attributes his behavior to that external control, not to his own ability to act and operate effectively within his environment. The student is no longer accountable to himself. He is accountable only to those restrictions which decree and require him to be accountable to.

The question of accountable to the student, then I ask them to examine the administrationally sanctioned controls and see if the best interest in students are really at hand. Do they serve to increase students self perception or do they just train him to be dependent upon anyone with the power to decree?

It is an American value to prize freedom and fear Orwellian external control. Are we being taught to rationalize control as effective and right even if it opposes the legitimate quest for knowledge gained by experience?

If so, who is accountable?

a congradulatory crowed of political hopefuls, party hacks, and young loyalists. Was it possible that they hadn't noticed the increasing number of Democratic poster boards appearing in local business windows, or were they merely disguising their fear? If one judges from the actions of their candidate he can indeed be sure that fear runs amok in the local Republican camp. The election of 1974 has brought the sudden realization that the National Republican disaster may filter down ward, all the way down to the once safely Republican 30th Senatorial District.

Face To Face

She turned the yellowed crusty pages;
The album creaked, threatening to fall apart.
Her frail, birdlike hand shook as she passed
Through her life all over again.

Touching the dust, age to age,
An ageless communion occured Between the human and the inanimate.
Which more alive?

Her faded eyes blurred with tears
That had been shed sometime before;
Face to face with herself, young,
For a moment she was immortal.
Then, her hand shaking with emotion,
She turned the last yellow page, disturbing the dust.
What she saw was a denial of her youth, her immortality.
The book of her life slowly fell from her tired old hands.

Rugby Explained In Simple Terms

by Skip Hartman

Since rugby is a newcomer to the Juniata campus, I shall attempt to explain the positions and some of the basic rules of the game in this article. There are fifteen men on a rugby team and there no substitutions permitted in a game. A rugby club will generally have more than one team, designated A, B, C, etc., depending on the number of players and their skills.

The first eight players are designated as forwards and are also known as the scrum. The scrum consists of a front row with a centrally located hooker, and a prop on either side of him. Behind him are two players, forming the second row. The last man, who supports the scrum, is in the back. On either side of the second row, there are two wing forwards. These players have the option of being bound on, or remaining ten yards behind the scrum. Players in the scrum must bind with at least one hand and arm around the body of another member of their own side.

The remaining seven players are the backs. Five of these constitute the wing, which consists of a fly back, two center three-quarter backs and two wing three-quarter backs. One of the remaining two players is scrum half, and the other is the full back.

When the referee calls a "scrum-down," the scrums from each team bind together, i.e. the two front rows lock their heads between each other. Between the legs of the front rows is formed a "tunnel" where the ball is thrown in, by the scrum half. Once in the tunnel, the opposing hookers try to hook the ball back to the second row, who then attempts to push it out behind their scrum to the waiting backs.

A scrum is the method of restarting play after minor rule infractions, such as a knock-on. A knock-on is when a player taps the ball forward by hand or drops a pass.

Play, during the game, is generally continuous except for certain stoppages discussed below. Any player may carry, pass or kick the ball at almost any time. A tackled player must release the ball immediately, and play continues. Once a player is tackled he cannot influence the direction of the ball, i.e. he cannot throw it. Forward passes are not allowed.

The scoring was mentioned briefly last week. There are two ways to score. A try is scored by a player touching the ball to the ground behind his opponent's goal line. It is worth four points and is followed by an attempted conversion kick, worth two points if successful. A goal may be kicked (over the cross bar) from the field under a variety of circumstances, and is worth three points.

A "line out" is the method of restarting play when the ball has gone out of bounds ("into touch"). The forwards form two parallel lines perpendicular to the sideline ("touch line"). The ball is thrown straight in between the lines over the forwards' heads by the wing three-quarter back. They try to gain possession by jumping and passing the ball back to their backs.

A penalty kick is awarded to the non-offending side when a major rules infraction, such as a violation of offside laws, occurs. The kick may be of any tyoe (punt, drop, or place) and any length, including a kick for the goal.

Offsides can occur when kicking, during a scrum, or during a line-up. An example would be, a player for Juniata kicks the ball. Players on his team behind him are on-sides, but those teammates ahead are offsides and are not permitted to touch the ball. Offside players can move toward the ball, but must remain 10 yards away until the opposing player with the ball has moved ten yards. Offsides players are put onside and can play the ball when an onside player passes them.

When a player kicks the ball, he is supposed to tear down the field to cover his kick and also to put the player on his team onsides.

It would be impossible for me to fully explain the rules of rugby in this article, but I hope it gives you some understanding of what happens in a rugby game. Please feel free to contact any club member if you have any questions or further information concerning rugby.

The Juniata Rugby Club gained its second consecutive victory on Saturday by defeating Franklin and Marshall, 14-4.

2 And 0, And 2 To Go! !

"2 and 0 and 2 to go." These were the words spoken by the junior varsity last Monday after they had defeated the Warriors of Gettysburg 19-18. With the tremendous come from behind victory their record now stands at 2 wins and no defeats.

The J.V.'s won the toss and elected to receive. The team was able to move the ball alainst the much bigger Warriors but were incapable of putting it all together and forfieted the ball over to Gettsburg immediately started a drive but were soon halted at the thirty. Juniata received the ball deep in their own territory and it looked as if they would have to surrender the ball again, but didn't. With Shawn Flattery quarterbacking; the running efforts Barry Eck and Daryl Long and the dual efforts, both running and receiving, of Tony Noble, Juniata soon found themselves at the 5 yard line. After two running attempts, Shawn hit Tony Noble in the flat and Tony ran for the pay dirt which was three yards ahead. The extra point was wide and the Indians led 6-0. Neither team was able to put anything else together and the quarter ended 6-0.

In the second quarter Frank Molito was unable to move the Indians in for a score even though they penetrated several times. Gettysburg though didn't seem to have that problem as they crossed the goaline with 6:15 showing on the clock. Their extra point was wide also and the quarter ended in a 6-6 tie.

In the third quarter, Rusty Cembrinski was able to sustain an Indian drive to put the J.V.'s ahead 12 to 6. Juniata went for the two point conversion by trying a pass. Tight end Ed Flynn was unable to find the handle to hold onto Rusty's strike and so the score remained 12-6. Gettsburg rebounded though with a drive of their own and tied the score with only a few second remaining in the third stanza. Juniata's defense blasted through the line and blocked their extra point and the score remained 12-12.

The fourth stanza started out seesawing back and forth with neither team able to score. Then Gettysburg started a drive and finally put it over for a score with only 2:49 left in the game. One again our defense foiled their extra point conversion and the score was 18-12 Gettysburg.

The coaches now turned to Shawn Flattery as quarterback. He did it last week but then he had twice the time, could he do it again. Shawn tried two passed and they both were incomplete but on the third attempt he found Tony Noble along the sidelines with a sixty yard pass. The referees as was par for the game found fault and called the play back and slapped a fifteen yard penalty besides. Shawn kept his poise and hit Tony Noble for a thirty yard gain on the next play. After three more plays and the help of a personal foul, the Indians found themselves on the fifteen yard line with a first and ten. After three unsuccessful attempts the Indians were faced with a now or never fourth and ten with 1:12 left. Flattery dropped back for a pass saw all his receivers covered; scrabbled to the right sideline, meantime Jim Hall shook his man and was open inthe left hand corner of the endzone. Flattery saw him and through a cross field strike and Hall who had come up fell into the endzone for the score. Stan Nosal converted the extra point kick and the Indians led 19-18. The Juniata defense held strong and forced a punt and then an interception which once again iced the cake on the 19-18 victory.

Soccer Started; Split With State

by Geoffrey W. Clarke

Hopefully this Saturday, October 19, at 4:00 on the girls hockey field Juniata will play its' third soccer game of the year. The first game, September 29 was a 7-1 defeat for the booters but the team rebounded on October 13 to a 4-0 win. Both games were played against Penn States International Soccer Team, the first game against their A team, the second their B team.

We will again play the International Team this Saturday at 4:00. Our hope is to continue the improvement in our play and to provide an interesting new sport to both the present Juniata residents and the returning Alumni.

There is no doubt that Juniata currently lacks the facilities for soccer, but as far as a lack of interest for the sport, I feel that lies with the Athletic Department.

Women Mark First Victory

by Jacque Prentiss and Kim Norris

The women's field Hockey team hosted their first home game on Thursday, October 10th with Indiana University of Pennsylvania. It was a very closely matched game and the team gained added support from the greatly appreciated enthusiastic fans.

The Juniata women carried the mementum of the game throughout the first half and had several unsuccessful attempts to score. The lack of teamwork and inefficient passing hindered the offensive drive and prevented several deserved goals. The Juniata girls, at that time, appeared to be a first half team, obviously letting down during the second half when Indiana through an apparently unconcious effort scored a goal. It was felt that the Indians out played Indiana but the girls just didn't have the extra push and desire behind the game.

The J.V. team also fell to Indiana with a score of 4-0.

On Saturday, October 12th, the Varsity squad traveled to the field of the Lycoming College Warriors and brought home an impressive 6-3 victory. The day itself started out against the girls when the food service failed to serve breakfast and prepare adequate box lunches. Upon arrival at Lycoming the girls team was ferried back and forth between field and locker room until given a place to dress. This left only five minutes for warm-up exercises and pre-game preparations. Despite these setbacks and poor officiating, the Indians came back surprisingly in the second half to score five of their six goals.

Indians Bow To Wilkes; Drop Behind In MAC's,

by John Paulshock

Well folks, last Saturday afternoon turned out to be another big bummer for the "Juniata Jock Squad," when the football team was whallopped by the Wilkes College Colonels, 30-9. All in all, the Indians played a good all around ball game, except that the Wilke's defense stymied almost every Juniata running attack. Aside from poking holes here and there in the Indian defense, the Colonels performed a quite effective neck injury on sophomore, Mike Hanselman; who at the time was leading statistics in unassisted tackles.

Juniata kicked off to start the action; and Wilkes, behind the power of a little "tank" of a fullback and an offsides penalty on J.C., drove 79 yards in 9 plays to take a 3-0 lead on a 34 yard field goal. Both squads then swapped 4 punts to slow down the play; then the Indians began to surge. After a nice punt return by Frosh Kris DeJeet, Q.B. Dave Wickerowsky tossed to Pete Lentini; and on the next play he ran for the Wilkes' 25 yard line, himself.

In the second quarter, the Indians capped their 63 yard drive in only 8 plays with a field goal and tied the score at 3-3. After another prolonged defensive war, Juniata romped for a 56 yard drive, highlighted by a 27 yard touchdown pass to Pete Lentini: the p.a.t. failed, and the Indians were on top (9-3). Wilkes roared back, however, and with only 34 seconds left in the first half, scored a t.d.; the first time in 11 quarters that Juniata allowed a score on the ground. This brought the half to a close, and the Colonels held a (10-9) lead heading into the locker room.

The second half was not quite as slow for the Wilkes College fans; but quite a drag to the Juniata offense and defense. Unlike the first half in which there appeared to be a clash of defenses, the Wilkes offense "cut loose like a deuce" and overwhelmed the Indian warriors with twenty more points.

Juniata's Kim Sypola returned kick-off, and carried the ball to his 32 yard line. Pete Lentini then dazzled the Colonels on a 30 yard pas reception and then bolted down field for twenty more yard slots. The Juniatians had superb field position on the first down and ten yards to go situation; but were unable to put in a touchdown or field goal. Wilkes then tore off 75 yards in 4 plays, topped by a 63 yard screen pass play and a touchdown: the p.a.t. failed, and the tally was Wilkes 16 - Juniata 9. On the following kick-off, Hanselman, leading in tackles, found himself "behind the eight ball" stretched out on the field: immobile.

The final period Freshman Scott Nagle called the signals for the Indians (unfortunately smoke signals), but was unable to pull any points out of the hat for J.C. Wilkes poured in two more touchdowns and points after to conclude their total points at thirty, as against Juniata's nine.

The game defensively, was a constant struggle; but offensively Juniata cried "the blues." The only success, perhaps, was in their hot air attack, with Pete Lentini snagging raw pigskins from here and there. In the backfield, Carmen DeFrancesco no longer sang "Catch me Guys! C'mon and catch me," but rather, "Let me the hell go, I'm trying to run the football." Freshmen Kim Sypola and Kris DeJeet exhibited fine agility on their never ending punt returns and Kick-offs; as did the young Nagle playing for the first time in college play at quarterback.

And we have seen from our questionaire results that these films have absolutely nothing in common. Nothing! But, like I said before, more on that next week.

I guess I'll just close then by listing the 13 films you picked for us to choose from. We will pick as many as we can schedule and as many as are available (that is, not booked up until 1984). These thirteen are (in alphabetical order of course): American Graffiti, Bananas, Dr. Zhivago, The French Connection, The Godfather, Gone With the Wind, The Harrad Experiment, Lady Sings the Blues, Last Tango in Paris, Paper Moon, 2001: A Space Odyssey, Walking Tall, and The Way We Were.

MNS Speak Non-Violence

by J. Streich

Two weeks ago, Juniata's Introduction to Peace Studies' class had several sessions with three guests from the Movement for a New Society (MNS), dealing with some aspects of non-violent training. The MNS, which is composed of several branches, grew partly out of the work of a Quaker Action Group in the summer of 1971. They felt a need for organizing a group to work non-violently for fundamental social change.

"It is working for a new society based on maximum decentralization and democracy in social and economic sectors; social ownership of productive capital; no rich and no poor; social planning; guaranteed social services; minimizing material goods while maximizing inter/intra-personal relations; no war; production based on human need rather than private profit; and ecological concern for posterity.

The three guests, Chris, Stephanie, and Susan, came from the Life Center (a branch of MNS) in West Philadelphia. They are presently experimenting with simplified life-styles and community living (about 100 people living in thirteen houses), giving social change training programs as well as working on several projects including macre analysis, and street safety in central Philadelphia.

Chris is a 1969 graduate of Juniata who at the time was actively involved in efforts to oppose the Vietnam War. He got his Master's degree in Social Change at Antioch College. In 1971 he joined some

by Bill Brooks

The ultimate goal of a professor when he issues a test is to evaluate the progress the student has made "learning" the material he has imbibed. This is probably the most common misnomer on the academic scene. The vast majority of tests are superficial with no inherent meaning. They're simply conducive to memorization and abet the student from establishing good thinking habits.

This situation is an adaptation on the part of the student. It's much easier to procrastinate and memorize the material the day before the test rather than actually learning it when you're not required to do so. Short answer questions are primarily an automatic response which exclude thinking as a prerequiste. The so called appliciation sections are facsimiles of the lecture illustrations, thus a conditioned response.

Possibly I have my terms confused. Maybe thinking is nothing more than a conditioned response through repetition. It seems that any person of average intelligence could memorize the required material and get an "A" on the test. The good student should be able to extrapolate the basic information and formulate hypotheses on his own. Since the majority of tests eliminate imposed thinking, students do not discipline themselves to think and this negligence turns into a deficiency. Indicative of this would be a physics final I took in which the problems, although alien, were applications of the formulas supposedly learned during the course. A class composed almost exclusively of upperclassmen made an average score around twenty-five out of a possible one hundred. What do we actually accomplish by memorizing text material?

Women Is Campus Theme At JC

by Wendy Jacobus

It is easy to conclude by the Homecoming activities last weekend that the theme was women, but it is important to realize that women is the underlying theme for the school year. The women concept evolved last spring through the deliberation and discussions of a women's studies tutorial and was accepted by the administration as this year's theme. A committee, guided by co-coordinators Jerri Jones, the faculty advisor, and Dare Euler, a senior at Juniata College, was then organized to conceive of activities that would relate the year's events to the theme.

But now that Homecoming is over, what is the committee going to offer for the remainder of the year, which entails the theme? Throughout the year, the committee will be sponsoring free movies concerning women and their problems in society. These movies, which require a half hour running time, are Adam's Rib, A Woman's Place, How the World Sees Women, New Freedoms for Women, Women in the Family of Man, A Woman's Work, A Woman's Life, and Girls in School. Next, from November 4th through 8th, Margret Chase Smith will be visiting the campus. She will be representing "Women in Politics" in a panel discussion among other professional career women. The committee also has tentative plans for a Multimedia Show, (a combination of slides, music, and acting) using advertising and stereotyping to support an aspect of women's equality. Also, the annual Will Judy lecture, this year sponsored by the natural science division of the college, will hopefully have a female speaker to help unite the year's theme with the events. The committee also has tentative plans to bring a feminist folk singer to Juniata College for a performance. Finally, Ms. Jones expressed the desire that the Spring Academic Festival, Baccalaureate and Graduation will be consistent with the theme.

Those who attended the Homecoming Colloquy last Saturday, probably recognized that a great deal of effort was made to provide interesting and meaningful workshops. The Juniatian would like to commend the following people for their effort and involvement: Carol Cooney, Judy Sabitini, Sue Hutt, Barb Clain,

Wohl Presents Lecture On New East Germany

On Monday, October 28, Dr. Paul Wohl, East European Affairs specialist and long-time contributor to THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, will come to campus and give a lecture on the German Democratic Republic, commonly known as East Germany. Dr. Wohl will speak on "A New Germany in the East". His lecture will be given in the Ballroom in Ellis Hall at 8:00 P.M. This promises to be an evening not to be missed if Dr. Wohl's colourful career and many accomplishments can serve as a gauging indicator.

Born in Berlin, Germany, in November 1900, Dr. Juris, University of Breslau (now Wroclaw); diploma in public administration and economics, University of Berlin. His life in Europe was divided beween Germany and France. He taught, wrote and published in both languages and lectured and directed graduate studies in French and German universities.

He came to the United States from France for the first time in 1930; returned to the U.S. in 1938. He has lectured and taught at several American universities, including the universities of Syracuse, Cornell, Kansas City, Columbia and the New School for Social Research. United States citizen since 1955.

Author of several books on the Soviet Union and on world transportation, published in Germany and France. His first book on the Soviet Union appeared in 1925; in it he compared the U.S.S.R. to a secular church state and the communist party, with its claim of universality and a monopoly of truth, to the Jesuit Order.

1927 to 1934, director, transport and communications department, International Chambers of Commerce, Paris; delegate to Transit Organization of the League of Nations; secretary general, International Danube Shipping Conference and several other international conferences and committees in the field of transport and communications. Co-founder and honorary secretary, International Container Bureau. Advisor to several railroads and transport agencies, including the highway and transport administration of the Soviet People's Commissariat (ministry) of Transport and Roads (1935).

In the United States he has contributed to BARRON's, HARPER's, THE NATION, THE COMMONWEALTH and other national periodicals. Since 1941 he has written regularly for THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR and, with the exception of two years (1946 and 1947 during which he was New York editor and United Nations correspondent of WORLD REPORT) he has been their communist affairs specialist. After the war he traveled widely in Eastern Europe, especially the German Democratic Republic, the Soviet Union, and Poland as special correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR.

Public Relations Committee of the Senate

For four weeks this column has been printed in the Juniatian. For four weeks this column has been intended to inform students about what is going on in Student Government. After these four weeks we, the Public Relations Committee, would like to know if the column has been of any value to the you—the students. Please let us know your feelings about the column by word of mouth, by dropping us a note, by calling us up, or by speaking to anyone involved with Student Government. Our names and numbers are Steve Cordova (643-9983, Box 211), Tim Reimer (643-9864, Box 155) and Todd Lins (643-9954, Box 1665). Please let us hear from you.

The Issues Desk will hopefully be undergoing some changes in the near future and again we would like to hear ideas from you. The Issues Desk, like this article, is designed to inform students about what is going on with Student Government and to provide a forum for students to discuss with members of Student Government current issues on and off campus. As the Issues Desk is right now it is not serving these purposes. What we want to find is a program to fulfill these purposes. Please let us know what you think.

Tree Disease Killing Elms

by Perry Habecker

I'm sure you have already noticed many trees on campus with white paint on their trunks. Your assumption as to the meaning of the symbolism is probably correct — the trees will be cut down. The majority of the selected trees are elms. They are victims of the highly contagious Dutch Elm disease. Samples sent to Penn State confirm this.

For your general information, I will share the results of my research on this disease: Certocytis ulmi is the pathogenic fungus that causes the disease. It was first recognized in Holland (1921) and it rapidly spread through Europe and Asia. Its appearance in the U.S. was in 1930. The fungus causes defoliation and ultimately death. The malady spreads via carrier beetles or the inter-mingling roots of neighboring trees. DDT sprays and soil injections tend to slow the contagion but do not exert complete control.

This campus has a large proportion of elms, all approximately the same age. Many stumps in Sherwood Grove attest to the number already felled. Several were cut this summer, and the remainder must go before spring when the fungus again becomes viable. Juniata's epidemic is not that unique, it has been an exceptionally rough year across the Commonwealth.

The remaining marked trees are already dead. These trees died because of thermal pollution. Delicate roots and inadequate steam piping do not mix. (The presence of steam lines is evident by the dead grass, dead shrubs, dug up ground, and vapor clouds above such structures.)

I have been assured that there are plans in the offing to correct the campus landscape problem. The maturity of the trees now growing on campus indicates that too few trees have been planted in the last decade. Juniata has plenty of room for more trees of all types.

Dear Editor:

I was ddeply touched by Gary Moore's article in last week's Juniatian which pointed up a fundamental problem on this campus, that of people trying to avoid understanding blacks (or anyone who is at all different, for that matter).

I can sympathize with this attitude, as I myself was victimized by it for a number of years. Coming from a predominantly rural area, I was not confronted with relating to (or dealing with) blacks until I came to Juniata. And the attitudes here were as conservative and biased (if not more so) than those I had left behind at home.

Within the past few months, I have lived through one of the most rewarding periods of life; and one of the best experiences was a friendship tendered with a black person. Anyone who has experienced this situation knows that after a very short while, you no longer notice the difference in skin tone. Instead, you remember their resounding laugh, sympathetic ear, endless patience, wise advice or whatever trait you find most endearing. They lose their identity as solely being black, and you suddenly realize they are your equal, no less; they are you and you are they.

It is truly saddening that more people here at JC have not experienced a similar situation. Whether it be fear, prejudice, or ignorance that holds people back, I sincerely wish that my white brothers and sisters would let loose and enter the world of those who are not carbon copies of themselves. You may find the other side has more intrinsic value than the one you advocate.

Class of '75

An eighteen-year-old resident of Pennsylvania may own a bar, bartend therein, and can be involved in purchasing for the business, but he or she may not legally drink in this state. This is to my mind a flagrant inequity. Though an example of restricted reference, it serves to illustrate the disparity of rights for the eighteen to twenty-year-old. More importantly, a man or woman of such an age is permitted and even encouraged to make crucial, essential, and hopefully intelligent, choices at the polls; yet is denied the legal maturity to publically regulate his or her own consumption of alcohol.

In many states those of this "minority" age group are legally permitted to do so. I cannot envision any greater breakdown of moral fabric in these areas over more restrictive areas; indeed, I submit that young people in Pennsylvania consume as much alcohol as those in other states. For the moralists, I can only say that the tenets of prohibitionism in a democracy will not work.

This selective prohibition unfortunately contributes to some serious problems, the worst of which is drunken driving. A familiar pattern is that of drinking while driving around at night; another is that of drinking at a more remote spot than otherwise necessary. A more visually obvious problem is that of intensive littering.

A number of states, while restricting the sale of hard liquors, do permit the regulated sale of beer and/or wine to those of this age group. As these constitute the vast majority of alcohol presently consumed by young people, it is a workable system. And in consideration of concern over more overt high school drinking, I can see no objection to a legal drinking age of nineteen.

Regarding a narrower spectrum of the public, we must keep in mind that most students at Juniata are legally adults in almost all respects. The inference to be drawn is that students here are no longer subject to parental protection and regulation. Yet the college in many ways insist upon acting as surrogate parent. The institution upholds this as a privilege on the basis of voluntary enrollment; many students, myself included, oppose it on the basis of equitable rights of students as citizens.

Those concerned must everview the situation and regard the detrimental effects of the college drinking policy. The present system of "Roving R.A.'s" may be more efficient and workable than heretofore, but many students are now protesting the increased regulation of weekend parties. Large weekend parties have occurred for years without any real detriment to cumpus life and community; the most unfortunate effect is that of property damage, for which those involved must of course be held responsible. Yet, the deciding criterion for stopping a party is noise. While some attention must be given this factor, the consequences have been too extreme. I cannot feel that these parties disturb many on weekend nights; but if many are being disturbed, by all means they should speak up.

However, the net effect of campus policy has been the organization of large off-campus parties. There parties by nature tend to be larger, noisier, and involve more property disturbance. They occur in a more impersonal atmosphere. But the worst consequence is that of necessary driving to and from these parties. Accidents have and will occur because of this. The community as a whole will experience more disturbance because of accidents and increased late-night traffic that by nature is noiser than the usual. Relationships between the borough and college communities have never been the best, and I can see no improvement due to off-campus parties.

I fully realize the college cannot easily institute an overtly permissive official policy, but, I say: Please adopt a more sensible and rational attitude in view of the necessary ramification of the present policy; and allow parties to be more confined to campus where they occur within the college community and involve the least harm overall.

John Knouse

I have come to believe those in charge of scheduling events at Juniata have a sick sense of humor. To demonstrate, let's imagine a student's activities on this homecoming weekend.

At seven o'clock on Friday night he goes to Oller Hall to see "The Night Visitor" (I'm not complaining about the wrong movie coming, that is Circumstances Beyond Control). He had hoped it would be over early enough for him to catch part of the colloquy lecture that began at eight (at least the 7:30 bonfire had been cancelled). But with the serial beforehand the show didn't end until nearly ten. So instead of rushing to the lecture, he rushed to the dance, which was already in progress.

The next morning he crawled out of bed for a colloquy workshop at nine. It was hard deciding which of several he wanted to attend, and he left that one early anyway, in order to see the field hockey game. After that he had to pick another workshop, which got out just in time to get a seat at the football game, if he skipped lunch.

The rest of the weekend was comparitively relaxed: the President's reception, a concert, a party, and two rugby games the next day. Then, the rest of the day to attempt to recover from everything.

Don't get me wrong — I enjoyed most of what I attended this weekend. I only wish I'd been able to get to more of them. Has anyone else out there noticed that a weekend is not an infinite amount of time? Admittedly some weekends seem to go on forever — when nothing or nearly nothing happens.

It seems to me that the schedulers should be able to work out some sort of a compromise with each other. I have a suspicion that the overstuffed weekends and the empty ones could be more-or-less rearranged to a general level. But I'm an optimist.

I'm sure there is some reason for doing things the way they're done. But Modes of Thought taught me to always think logically, so I'll never figure it out.

Next week is one of the near-vacuums, of course. Oh well, I guess I'll use the same solution as everyone else. Is anyone heading for North Jersey this weekend?

VOL. XLVIII NO. 5 — OCTOBER 24, 1974

— EDITORIAL —

Mike McElhinney

There has been a large number of articles in the first four issues of the newspaper voicing student discontent with various college policies and practices. In the first issue Henry Siedikowski called for the publication of information regarding student fees and how they are spent. In issue two Steve Townsend discussed the "Do's and Dont's" of cohabitation while Siedzikowski questioned the drinking policy. Sue Blum took a critical look at the roving R.A. policy in issue three and this writer asked for a change in the inconsistent charging policies. And in the most recent issue of the Juniatian, Bob Meachum questioned the lack of administration accountability to the students.

And the newspaper has certainly not been complete in voicing student dissatisfaction with the way things are run here at Juniata. The newspaper has not mentioned the plight of the women's field hockey team, the inability of students to see professors because of few and recklessly followed office hours by the professors, and several other issues.

Obviously, there is something wrong with student life on campus. The relationship between students and policymakers is terrible. I am not sure whether this is a cause or result of the policies and practices which I and other students have pointed out or maybe just administration silence when questioned on these issues.

I attended a dinner early this term where President Stauffer pointed out to the faculty and administrators present that student enrollment had declined and that everyone should be concerned with this fact. I wonder if any connection has ever been made between a decline in student enrollment and the dissatisfaction of students with the policies of the College?

I think the first step which needs to be taken to close the gap between students and policymakers is for the administration to start answering the questions which have been raised and make changes in policies when logical reasons can't be found to support the policy's existence.

But maybe the problem is that I have been assuming too much. Throughout this editorial I have assumed that the policymakers listen to students. They might not. Maybe they don't even bother to read their college's newspaper.

by Henry Siedzikowski

Over this past weekend, one of the best known, and yet, most unfamilar segments of our college community visited the campus. I am referring, of course, to the members of Juniata's Board of Trustees.

During my years at Juniata, I have been fortunate to be one of the select students allowed some extended contact with the trustees. This has given me the opportunity to learn a few things about these mysterious people who exercise such a large degree of control over our lives. In this article, I'd like to share some of these tidbits with everyone.

The first thing you notice about the trustees is their perception of students. I have met very few trustees who could conceive of students as adults who seriously wanted a part in the decision-making that affected their lives.

Over this past weekend, a dinner was arranged for a few students and a number of trustees. The expressed purpose of the dinner was to provide communication between students and trustees. This sounded fine, but many of the students were somewhat disillusioned when they discovered what type of communication was going to take place.

During the entire dinner, there was a lot of friendly small talk. The trustees were more than willing to share some of their many experiences. But, there was little or no discussion of the social issues which are of primary concern to students, such as drinking and cohabitation.

To be fair to the trustees, there are several things that can be said favorable to them. First, Dr. Baker, Chairman of the Board, does not follow the general rule. He is open to student's viewpoints and willing to talk about things. Also, it must be said that the trustees are very interested in the college, and do work extremely hard for it.

There is a point in this discourse. The trustees have a great deal of power over us, we cannot deny it. But at the moment, they are a distant entity. We need communication, and the present means are not proving totally satisfactory.

What we need then, is a new idea. I am suggesting that a student-trustee forum be set up during the Board's spring visit. This would provide an opportunity for direct student-trustee communication above the level of small talk. However, the only way this can work is with student participation. I ask everyone to consider this idea. It may be the only solution to student complaints.

Paul Winter To Perform

An unusual opening season event will be presented on he stage of the Mishler Theatre, 12th Avenue, Altoona, Saturday night, October 26. The Paul Winter Consort is appearing on the same bill as the Altoona Symphony opening pops concert. Earlier this month the Winter Consort played to a SOLD OUT hall at Penn State. The 5 man group has a following on college and university campuses throughout the country.

Their recordings for Columbia, AM and Epic are known to exotic-folk-serious-rock-endangered species type collectors nationwide. Two craters on the moon have been named by NASA's Apollo 15 mission for 2 of the cuts on their records, "Icarus" and "Ghostblood".

Among other things for the forthcoming evening's event will be "The Whole Earth Chant", "In Wildness is the Preservation of the World", some lighter Bach, a Bartok-Bulgarian tune and some surprises.

An array of instruments ranging from 7 tympani, a collection of other drums, a Rodger's organ, harsichord, electric cello, camel bells will be played by the Consort. The Symphony, directed by Dr. Robert King will play a variety of light works. Curtain time is 8:15. Admission is $1.50 for students, $3 for adults. Tickets at door.

Grasshopper Comes To Campus

by Steve Townsend

Human Existence Analytical is a required course in which upper classman devote 10 weeks time to, recognizing the role of pre-suppositions, solving complex value oriented problems, and finally, appiying these values to his own life, leisure, and occupation: "Kung Fu" is a prime time television program in which Caine, the hero, devotes his entire life to recognizing the role of presuppositions and values, solving complex value oriented problems, and finally, applying these values to his own life, leisure, and occupation.

Why the major discrepancy? How is it that Caine never finds his inner self? And why do all H.E.A. graduates achieve complete knowledge of instant karma in one term? Maybe his blind Master had an incomplete knowledge of the ancient art of Inquiry Methods and Thought Modes. On the other hand, it could be that Caine just doesn't realize how successful he has been.

For example, in one short episode Caine manages to elequently deal with all of H.E.A.'s goals and a few other obstacles besides.

As the show opens we find our hero is confronted with an urgent value related problem. It seems that Caine, while spacing around the plains, stumbles upon a mother buffalo and her calf in grave danger from an aging herd skinner. No time for value level communications here. With a flash of agility Caine solves the dilema by deflecting the hunters aim.

"It must live to be free", mumbles Caine. "Life is everything."

A few minutes later, Caine finds that he's not yet rid of the hapless buffalo calf. Seperated from it's mother, Caine is forced to apply his values to life, leisure, and occupational pursuits by becoming a surrogate mother to the animal.

After the mid show commercials we find that while Caine nurses the calf (No, not even the great Caine could pull off that feat, he uses a bottle), the value questions multiply. By chance our hero meets up with a pregnant ex-hooker, and you guessed it, the father is none other than the calloused buffalo hunter Caine was forced to deal with earlier.

Now this is a dilemma no H.E.A. grad could deal with. Ordering and assessing one's own values is complicated, but grapling with those of a hooker, buffalo skinner, and Buffalo calf is quite beyond the students scope of understanding. However, Caine finds dealing with complex situations easy. He simply lapses back to the land of candles and karma, the days of his youth and the teachings of his blind Master.

Luckily for Caine, just such a situation is stored away in the recesses of his mind. It seems that as a boy Caine not only dreamt of a beast in danger, but also wondered about a pregnant peasant woman.

"I heard the baby cry".

"You heard the cries of the unborn child, Grasshopper?"

"Yes, Master."

"Unusual. It was life calling to life. The baby and the beast are as the candle and the flame, seperate and not seperate".

What a performance! In one 60 second daydream Caine not only realizes the implications of presuppositions and value, but he also determined the best interests of all involved! It was clear that the life of the calf and the child were intricately woven together. He must once again rescue the calf in order to save the child of the hunter.

Needless to say, the ensuing value level communications were second nature to our Master of the Marshal Arts. It took him only five minutes of the final segment to convince the hunter that the calf represented his own son. And of course he convinces both the ex-hooker and the hunter that a new and better life awaits them both.

But alas, poor Caine has no guided designs, no helpful instructors, and no H.E.A. to officially pass. He is doomed to forever wander about the West, searching for assurances of his knowledge of inner self. Wouldn't it be wonderful if Juniata College saw fit to send Caine an honorary H.E.A. degee? It's the only human thing to do. Caine could finally give up his endless search, and we could accomplish something constructive every Saturday Nite.

Record Review: Randy Newman

by Rob Lopresti

[This column is an irregular feature, which will appear whenever an album, a writer, and an empty space mystically align.]

Randy Newman has a new album out: Good Old Boys, and its as fantastic as his others. So now — it's frustration time.

Rolling Stone Magazine will give it a review ranging from enthusiastic to hysterical. When no one buys the album they will be frustrated.

New critics will announce the "discovery" of a great talent. As their words go unheeded they will become frustrated.

Reprise Records executives will stare at the low sales figures in misery and disbelief.

Newman's fans (that chosen few) will become frustrated when they try to drag friends in to listen to the ablbum. The friends will sit through half a song, announce "he can't sing" and go off to listen to someone who can sing: Dylan I suppose, or Neil Young.

The only group of people involved who won't feel frustrated by the habitually small sales of Randy Newman's records are other performers, who will be too busy scouring the record for material for their own. Among those who've recorded his music in the past are Three Dog Night (remember "Mama told me not to come"?), Judy Collins, Blood Sweat and Tears, Nilsson, Buffe Saint-Marie, Art Garfunkel, Frank Sinatra, Melanie, Joe Cocker and Neil Diamond. That partial list should make the point; before you say you've never heard his songs, check your album collection.

But no one buys Randy's albums. Alright, enough complaining. On to the good news. Good Old Boys is Randy at his best. This is his first concept album, revolving on a theme.

Its about the South, about "Rednecks" and "Crackers" and even Huey P. Long, once the boss of Louisiana. Newman is a magnificent story teller, and this album has many strange stories to tell.

The first song "Rednecks" begins as a list of the things wrong with southerners, funny because it's sung by Southerners. When they say they're too stupid to realize that in the North the Negro is free, we feel smug and liberal. But the next line is "Yes, he's free to be put in a cage on the South Side of Chicago..." Are we any different from those Rednecks we're laughing at? That's Newman's question in this song.

Whoever Randy's songs are specifically about, they say something about all people. It's never safe to point a finger at the characters and laugh. Too often we find he was only holding up a mirror at us.

In "Louisiana 1927" Newman describes a town flooded out in Louisiana. President Coolidge goes all the way out by train to look it over, then turns to the little fat man next to and says "Little fat man, isn't it a shame?" That's about all the help you can expect from authorities, Newman seems to say, they're just like us.

The only authority figure who helps people on this album is the hero of the song "Kingfish" -Huey Long. In that piece the music eerily suggests his power, while the lyrics show how he got it ("don't I take good care of you?").

In Newman's world everyone is about the same — confused, helpless, a little stupid. Coolidge and streakers, madmen and workers, millionaires and freaks are all stumbling around after the same thing. The one person who seems strong efficient on this album is Long, who was assassinated.

Newman's people are real in one sense: they don't fit neat stereotypes. Only one person asks for help in this album, a purse thief: "'somebody stop me!' he cried". Only one story ends happili, and its told by a nut. His characters told do what's expected.

The music of Newman's piano is by turns jazz, blues and even touches of Scott Joplin. It is always perfect background for his stories.

Besides everything else, Newman is a master of brevity, and would think this review is too long. So I'll stop, after one message:

To Newman's fans: buy Good Old Boys, you'll love it.

To all of you who don't know Newman: maybe it's time you did. Give this record a listen.

In conclusion, a common misinterpretation by students, faculty, and administration was that the Homecoming theme, which pertained to the year's theme, was a Colloquy for Women, but this is incorrect. It was a Colloquy for People about Women. As Ms. Jones stated, "The objective of having women as the theme is to make both men and women aware of the limitations imposed by sex-role-stereotypes and the opportunities that exist for people." Although the year long theme is Women, it concerns the liberation and equality of people; something we should all be concerned about. Therefore, if you missed the Colloquy, remember other informative and challenging activities will be sponsored all year by the commitee. . .Happenings that will involve all "person" kind.

Guess Who's Invading Ellis?

Ghosts, Goblins, Witches, and El Rancheros, yes Halloween reaches the secluded graveyard of Juniata College.

On October 20, at dinner, students will dress in a variety of costumes to mix with ghosts of the past, and be entertained by a band sponsered by the Food Service and Center Board.

A steak dinner for 2 will be given as a prize for the most original, uglyiest and loudest costumes. Dress-up and don't worry, a lot of students are doing it. Its Fun!

Also that night in the Ballroom of our center, the Coffeehouse Committee of Center Board is sponsoring a 'Halloween film' feast. Frankenstein Meets the Wolfman and Phantom of the Opera plus some old-fashioned Halloween games (such as bobbing for apples and others) will be held. All Free. So come on up and enjoy yourself.

"The Pass Was On The Money"

by Alan D. Wirt

What better way to spend an Autumn afternoon, than watching all the color and pagentry of NCAA college football? The fans from Juniata College who sat through the frigid Central Pennsylvania weather until the final gun, witnessed a football spectacle unmatched anywhere, would certainly tell you there's no better way to spend the day. The day in fact belonged to Juniata College, and in particular, the Juniata football team.

What you lucky students who were there saw (in case you were too cold to comprehend) was an upset victory over previously undefeated Albright College. You also witnessed a second half aerial circus led by Freshman quarterback Scott Magley, which featured the stellar receptions of Pete Lentini and Freshman Kim Sypula.

Speaking of Freshmen, the Class of '78 started approximately 8 players in the game, with many others getting on the young squad. For example, a freshman starting for the first time was fullback Daryl Long, who gained a hard earned 89 yards on the ground, and provided some excellent blocking that allowed the other backs to spring free on numerous occasions.

The Seniors were not to be denied though, as their gem in the backfield, Carmen DeFransesco provided an awesome ground threat, and personally accounted for over 100 offensive yards. But in the end (no pun intended) it was the receivers that provided the points needed for the Indian's victory. League leading Pete Lentini continued to look impressive as he hauled in two TD passes and several other key catches which accounted for 155 yards of real estate. Kim Sypula was also there with some brilliant receptions of his own. At the end of the day, Kim amassed 66 yards on six catches.

As for Scott Magley, well, he couldn't have looked better in his first start as QB for the Indians. After the untimely season-ending injury to Sophomore QB Dave Wichrowski, an enormous amount of pressure was put on the teenager (a 1974 graduate of Central Cambria High School). With 6:15 remaining in the game, and J.C. down by twelve points, Scott showed the poise of a great leader as he hit various receivers for a total of 165 yards, including a 94 yard strike to Lentini that put Juniata on top for good. Magley finished the day with 244 yards passing, no interceptions, and two touchdown passes.

The first half was dull, as football games go. Juniata ran mostly from the "power I" (three backs) and attempted to muscle their way for yardage. As far as point production, that type of offense did not seem adequate, and Juniata went into the locker room trailing 14-8.

But after three quarters and the Indians down 20-8, it was time to open up the offense or face impending doom. At the end of the third quarter the air force was called out, and went swiftly to work. With Magley throwing short darts to Sypula, and Carmen offsetting things with a few runs of his, Juniata found itself knocking on the door at the Albright 12 yard line. Albright expected another pass, but what they got was a twelve yard touchdown run by Carmen, his second of the day. The extra point by kicker Bill Knavel brought J.C. to within five points of Albright, making the score 20-15.

By this time, the defense finally learned how to stop Albright's option plays, and consequently stymied their offense. But Juniata had temporarily lost their offensive punch, and was forced to punt. Five minutes remained on the clock, and everyone expected Stu Jackson to punt the ball away, he dropped back like Roman Gabriel, aimed a pass to Lentini, and released an aerial that resembled the flight of a dying quail. Needless to say, the pass was intercepted and run back for an Albright touchdown.

At this point it looked hopeless for the Indians, now behind 27-15. But the air corps was resummoned, and they responded with four bombs, including a 27 yard pass for the touchdown to Mr. Lentini. Another crucial PAT courtesy of Bill Knavel, made the score 27-22.

Juniata attempted an onsideskick but it failed, giving the visitors the ball on their own 49. The Indian defense played superbly in this clutch situation, and forced Albright to punt.

Again the situation looked hopeless, with the Indians pinned back on their own six yard line, and only 2:21 to go in the game. On first down, Magley dropped back into his own endzone, and miraculously found Lentini open across the middle. The pass was on the money, and from then on it was a footrace as Pete outlegged the last of his defenders. The play covered 94 yards, and brought the Homecoming crowd of approximately 3,800 to their feet screaming. The conversion attempt failed, but it made no difference, because the day belonged to Juniata. Those who were there will remember the 1974 Homecoming game for a long time to come. The final score: Juniata-28 Albright-27.

Quakers who were setting up the Life Center and the Movement for a New Society, in Philadelphia. The MNS network now includes groups in several states and even foreign countries.

Many of the classes we had that week (which took place in South Lounge) were dealing with small groups. They included hassle-lines, role playing, quick decision making, and other discussion oriented topics. In the hassle-lines, all the members of the class paired up, and while one half of the class played a certain role (cop, e.g.) the other half of the class acted out role (speeder, E.G.). By analysing our roles we were able to become more aware of the effect our actions had on others in particular circumstances. In the "quick decision making" groups, we were able to recognize some feelings and reactions which we might express in a certain situation. The importance of this recognition lies in the fact that we can then examine what action we should take in order to achieve a desired end in a given conflict situation. Some of our discussions included aspects of non-violence in children, and non-violent national defense.

Every class opened with a proposed agenda for that session which was to be agreed upon, or else changed. Therefore, everyone had an opportunity to give their opinion or criticism. Many of us felt easier among ourselves, we get to know some people better, and we also became more conscientious of our values as a result of those sessions. JC Rugby Players fight over possession of ball with Bucknell.

Ruggers Defeat Bucknell But Lose To Penn State

by Skip Hartman

The Juniata Rugby Club's A team remained undefeated on Sunday, by defeating Bucknell's B team by a score of 9-7; however, the newly formed B team lost to Penn State's C team, 29-0.

Bucknell was the toughest team that the Juniata club has faced thus far. Even though the A team defeated Bucknell, there was an overabundance of penalties against Juniata, of which, most of the penalties were offsides. Juniata showed a much better kicking game than in previous weeks. Our scrum was stronger, but Bucknell's was quicker hooked the ball better and won most of the scrums. The Juniata team was very aggressive, this played an important factor in the game.

The first score in the game came on a try by George Kourakin with the conversion completed by Alan Kulp. Bucknell then scored a goal making the score 6-3. Alan Kulp kicked a goal for Juniata making the score 9-3. Bucknell retaliated with a try, but missed the conversion, making the final score 9-7.

Both teams had several opportunities to score, which could have thrown the game either way. For Juniata, Bob Barth was over the goal line with the ball, but the referee did not award Juniata the try, saying he had his hand underneath the ball. To score a try in rugby, a player must be over the goal line and exerting downward pressure on the ball, which must be resting on the gound. For Bucknell, there was a missed goal, which could have given them the game. Juniata made a good defensive play near the end of the game. A Bucknell player had the ball over the goal line, but did not have a chance to touch the ball down because a ruck was formed and he was pushed out of the touch zone.

The newly formed B team did not fare as well against Penn State's C team. This was largely due to a lack of experience and the players having not had much practice as a team. With more practice the B team will develop its passing and kicking skills and be ready for a better showing against Frostburg's team on Saturday.

The club would like to thank all of the spectators who came out and supported us on Saturday and we would like to invite everyone to our next home game with Susquehanna on Saturday, November 2.

Finest Tribers In Juniata's History Blank Elizabethtown

by Barry Eppley

If you happened to be at the Albright football game and then just happened to see the cross-country meet at halftime, you saw a classic example of the depth and talent of Juniata's 1974 Cross-Country team. Juniata blew the Albright cross-country team all the way back to Reading, shutting them out 15-48. (Low score wins, remember?). Jack McCullough led the way for the victory at 32:27, just one second off the course record he set the week before against Elizabethtown, followed closely by his roommate, Bill Kibler. The next Indians to finish were Greg Ransom, Steve Hooper, Paul Wilson and John Brommer in a crowd — pleasing four way tie for third. (That's team unity for ya!). Albright finally rounded the track to fininsh seventh and eighth before John Ausherman and Doug Crosby finished out the top ten.

The victory over Albright brings the team record to a very fine five victories to one defeat — the one loss being to Bucknell. And who considers this a loss? After all, to be defeated one must have a chance at victory. At this point in the season this is the finest that any cross-country team of Juniata's has done. And few will doubt that this is the finest cross-country team that Juniata has ever fielded. And the surprizing fact is that there is only one senior on the team!

The Indians still have four meets remaining before the MAC championships. Two of the remaining four should be real tests of the Indians ability. Johnstown-Pitt, who defeated the Indians in last year's homecoming meet; and Gettysburg, which should be the best meet of the year. Incidentlly, it's home...hint?

I'm sure the team would really appreciate any support you would be willing to give them. However, even if you don't support them, they'll just win anyway. Because they're the finest in Juniata history.

Church Relations to JC Our Sources of Income

BY Bruce Erb

Have you ever wondered about the relationship between the College and the Church of the Brethren? According to the Juniata College catalog, "Juniata College was established in 1876 through the efforts of several members of the Church of the Brethren who believed that it was their duty 'to encourage institutions in which youth may acquire useful knowledge' and 'to fit students to meet the duties and responsibilities of life' ". Although Juniata was founded by members of the Church to educate their children, it is chartered as an independent college open to students of all creeds. The Church has no ownership of the institution.

Since its founding as the Brethren's Normal School and Collegiate Institute, the school's growth and development has received considerable support from the Church of the Brethren and its members in terms of money and students. Over the past few years, the Church's influence has somewhat diminished for several reasons. A major reason is that the proportion of Church students enrolled has decreased over the past 20 years. Today, there are 65 members of the Church of the Brethren enrolled at J.C. It should be noted that the Church of the Brethren is a relatively small denomination (approximately 200,000 members), and that it has similar ties to 5 other colleges. They are Elizabethtown (Pa.), Bridgewater (Va.), Manchester (Ind.), McPherson (Kan.), and LaVerne (Cal.).

Currently, each of the Church's 3 districts in Pennsylvania elects one member to the Board of Trustees for a 3-year term. The College has a similar arrangement with another of its supporters, the Alumni Association. A Church Relations Council exists as a liason group between the Church and the College. Its membership includes the 3 Church representatives to the Board of Trustees, members of the Church from 3 dis-

"Real" World Of Southern France

by Linda Fidler

Once you live in France, You can never leave her! It is with this sentiment that I have re-entered the United States and now Juniata after a year abroad in Aix-en-Provence, in Southern France. Last year at this time I thought I was surely in a dream world; perhaps our American group from all over the United States had been transported to some non-existant corner of the universe, never to be seen or heard from again. Letters received from "home" countered this possibility, and eventually the unfolding year revealed an entire world that became for some of us a world more "real" than that one we knew in the United States.

That "real" world to which I refer involves personal sentiments and reactions to given experiences. Relax for a few moments with me, just as you would over a cup of coffee in a sidewalk cafe. Imagine that you are walking along the Cours Mirabeau, the main, tree-lined street in Aix; you see some friends sitting in Le Longchamp, a cafe named after a racetrack. You weave through the tables, greet your friends by kissing them on both cheeks (this is known as a "bise") and then sit down for a visit. Perhaps you will talk about politics, about the last party you went to, about a record you want. Passers-by serve as topics of conversation also. Just for the record, guys do rate girls in France, and the girls delight in playing "the game."

All these aspects (except for the existence of outdoor cafes and the "bises") sound similar to life in America; so what, you may inquire, is the difference? Allow me to suggest some of the differences that strike me. The French people as a whole know how to take time to enjoy life. They take time out of a busy day to walk through a park, sit on a bench and absorb the vitality of the life within and about them.

Americans may find it difficult to accept or admit that an acquaintance is not a friend in the true sense of the word. Perhaps this is why many Americans find the French "cold" or hard to get to know. But I offer as a challenge to anyone nurturing such a sentiment to partake of the French life; you will eventually find the meaning of a "friend" who will remain as such for a lifetime. I remember vividly a time when my friend, Christiane, came to my apartment in the middle of the night because she had no where else to go and had missed a train. And I will always remember the words of a friend to me when I was despairing because I had to leave France: "It's very simple; you will come back very shortly." How these words ring true now!

Life: this is the key word to French living, although the French people do not sit and contemplate what "life" means. We Americans often become burdened down and bewildered at this juncture, and we forget that life happens: it cannot be made to happen. If you experience what you truly enjoy doing you will live fully. Life, says Andregide, is a process of becoming the most man (human) of which you are capable. One must be receptive to experiences which life offers, and in so doing one will learn to express and communicate all that is waiting within him.

Tell me—have you ever gone into the country with friends and cooked chicken seasoned with freshly-gathered thyme? Or think of climbing the Mountain Sainte-Victoire, the subject of many of Paul Cezanne's works. Look at the street names and notice that every name bears some reflection on the country's history, be it through names of influential people, of notable dates (of the French Revolution or of the World Wars); even though phrases expressing trends of literature: "the road to real richness" is the name of one street in a village town inSouthern France, named under the influence of Romanticism. The sense of relevant history that still touches the hearts and souls of the French people adds to their vitality. Personally, I can relate better to the Frenchman's pride in his history and in his life than I can to the frantic, often empty, searching of some Americans for their identities. Tradition does serve to give important meaning to life!

To relate all of my experiences and feelings from my past year is well nigh impossible. Don't just take my word for it that it is deeply fulfilling to live in France, or that the South of France is better than the North (this is an eternal debate among French people!). Experience life for yourself, accept the challenge of the life in your bodies: your experiences on this earth are the nourishment of the earth. When you go to France, remember above all to smile in French: "Souriez en francais!"

Summer Sessions Given Objective Consideration

Although it's difficult to even consider summer school when the first term is still going strong, summer school is an educational opportunity which requires some thought, long before registration in April. A college education shouldn't be something that haphazardly falls into place. It should be carefully planned according to course availability, program of emphasis, finances, and job opportunities. For this reason, summer school is sometimes a practical solution to educational problems. But when May finally rolls around, it's too easy to lose sight of the opportunities summer school offers because the idea of "free time at last" is too appealing. So perhaps now, while our heads are still on straight, it's good to compare the advantages and disadvantages of summer school.

Probably the most appealing factor to summer school is it's cheaper than the regular term. Because not all facilities are in use, less faculty members are employed, and administrative work, like registration, is minimal and can be done by hand, the inclusive fee is about 30% less than the regular term fee. Also, it's important to note that almost any course can be offered during the summer session. In February, a list and description of courses to be offered is distributed by Dr. Hartman, the director of the summer program, but any course not included in this can be made available if six students are interested in enrolling in that course during the summer. Finally, because everyone enjoys some "time off" it's not necessary that a student attend the entire summer session. The college offers a two term program. The student can earn one unit by enrolling in one course in the first three week term (three hours classtime per day) or he can earn two units by enrolling in the second six week term by taking two courses (four hours classtime per day). The student has the choice of enrolling in either the first or second terms or the entire nine week session.

But like all programs, there are certain drawbacks. This past summer, a total of 185 students were enrolled in the summer program. Considering the nonexistence of athletic events, movies or dances in the summer, (and I doubt if the town suddenly comes out of its cocoon then) things could be very lonely. Also, no matter how one

JC Announces BCA Program

During the last year in order to provide students with individual attention, a new general program, parallel to the existing one, was conceived so that students not being proficient in a foreign language could also receive an opportunity to go abroad. Fees and administrative procedures for both programs are the same. Only the requirements for admission,the course offerings, and the methods of instruction are different.

Are you interested in German, French, or Spanish history and culture? Do you long to break out of your collegiate routine for a year while you are still an undergraduate? Do you believe, as others have certified, that a year with BCA can be the greatest possible experience of your undergraduate life? If your thinking approaches positive answers to these questions, you should see Prof. Dolnikowski, BCA Coordinator and talk to him about the program.

Attention Scientists

by Gary Marpoe

Beginning this week there will be a new type of lecture series offered to Juniata students. In addition to having visiting professors and men in industry speaking on current topics of interest in the field of science and math, an innovative concept has been introduced in which Juniata College students will present seminars on their research activities. These activities cover a broad spectrum of experiences in all fields of natural science. Students who have participated in research programs at Juniata, as well as other schools, will be speaking on what they have done and what they have found. The purpose of this program is to provide insight into what kind of and how many research program Juniata students are involved in and to give these students a chance to share their experiences. Bulletins with seminar title and the name of the student speaker will be posted in the Science Center. Watch for these and be there!

Organization Is Changing!

by Tom Kutz

The 1974-75 Barrister Club can best be described as a new club that has been around for a while. Organized as a professional club for those students with a general interest in law, the Barrister Club is promising to become one of the most active student organizations on campus. Causes for this new look are an emergence of student interest, a new organizational structure, and change in faculty advisors.

According to Mr. Jarzab, the substituting faculty advisor to the club, this year's Barrister Club is going to attempt to present at least one speaker per month. These speaker sessions will be open to the public so anyone interested in the speaker's topic is invited to come and listen. Also, the club is hoping to take several trips throughout the year. Potential trips include Harrisburg, Washington D.C., and various law schools. The only problem at present, with the planning of these activities, is lack of funds. The student government is not providing funds to the Barrister Club this year, which has put the club at a disadvantage. However, with relation to the speakers at least, the club is looking into the possibility of receiving funds from the G. Graybill Diehm Lectureship in Political Science.

The organizational structure of the club has been changed in an attempt to spread responsibility among the members. This year instead of the traditional structure of a president, vice-president, etc...; the club is headed by a five member executive committee. While the present committee members were appointed by Mr. Jarzab in an attempt to get the club going as soon as possible, the members will normally be elected. The election will be held midway through the year so that a full committee will be ready to go to work at the start of each school year. Also, active membership in the club requires a little bit more than just showing up for the yearbook picture. To be an active member you must attend at least two speaker sessions per term. In addition, you must help in planning a club activity sometime during the course of the year. The benefit from competent projectors chatter. The screen focuses. The audience groans. SUBTITLES! AARRGGGH! Oh, well, look at the bright side—at least you won't have to strain your ears trying to decipher our tinkertoy sound system. Huzzah!

But enough of this folderol! This week, we have the final offering of one of the greatest film artists of the century— Yasujira Ozu. Indeed, "An Autumn Afternoon" is the culminative representation of the "Ozu technique"—extremely simplistic camera work (all shots from slightly above floor level, separated only by simple cuts), an extremely simple plot (concerned, as usual, with generational conflicts), extremely complex characters (headed by Chisu Ryu, as usual), and, of course, the basic concern for human values.

This last is the aspect of Ozu's films that finally broke the neglect the Western World had given them until last year. As Donald Ritchie claims, Ozu is primarily concerned with Japanese problems and Japanese characters, and is indeed the cinematic spokesman for the Japanese way of life. We have found, though, that these "Japanese values" can be more generalized. We can identify with these characters, with their successes and agonies, and, to some extent, even to their way of life. Ozu, then, transcends merely the Japanese way of life and becomes the spokesman for all humanity.

Take for example, "An Autumn Afternoon." Shuhei Hirayama (Rau) is a widower, aging, successful. He lives with his 24-year-old daughter Michiko and his son Kazuo. His older son is married and lives elsewhere . When he sees the daughter of an old teacher far past the marriageable age and unmarried due to her filial devotion, he begins to worry about his own daughter. He knows that when she gets married, he will be, for all purposes, alone. He arranges a marriage, though, content that he has done his duty as a father, but disturbed at his final solitude.

The values expressed are universal—the daughter's reluctance due to her sense of duty, the father's insistence due to a similar sense, the father's refusal to enter a "May-December" marriage of his own (as a friend has done), everybody's pseudostoic sense of fate (they say they are content), the father's desperate and overriding need for companionship, a need his younger son cannot hope to satisfy. We also see much of the humorous hassles of a marriage seen in last week's movie in the trials the older son has in his new marriage (going into debt for a refrigerator, golf clubs, etc.). In essence, then, it is painfully simple to identify with Shuhei or Michiku or even some of the more comic characters (who occasionally take on tragic proportions by a mere physical gesture—specifically, the old teacher who refuses to recognize his own poverty), and such an identification will result in an agonizingly rewarding experience to any American audience.

The film makes few demands on you. Admittedly, if you go skeptically, challenging it to entertain you, you will be bored completely. But if you go expecting to be entertained, if you digest every scene and assimilate every word, it will be a rewarding experience. Admittedly, again, it is in Japanese, so you will have to read it (this, I suppose, makes it easier to get involved with it than if you just would sit there passively listening). But I felt that by offering a film with such a different style to both you and your parents, you may look at more conventional films with greater discernment and judgement. "An Autumn Afternoon" by Yasujiro Ozu, will be shown Friday night at 7 and Saturday night at 8:30 in Alumni Hall. There will be no admission fee of course, and chapter 4 of "The Green Archer" will be run Friday night only. On Saturday night, I will give an oral introduction expanding on what I have said above for the benefit of those parents who chose to come.

Final note: Special films have been ordered: The Harrad Experiment, Paper Moon, The Godfather, Bananas, American Graffiti, Serpico, and The French Connection. Shorts shown with these will feature everything from pornography to the Marx Brothers. However, if we lose money on any of them, the rest will have to be cancelled, so please, PLEASE [! !] come.

With election day less than a week away, I thought this would be a good time to look at the relationship between our college community and the world beyond the friendly confines of old J.C. I realize that this is the Age of Apathy, but I have to believe that there are a few that might want to break with the crowd.

It has been very heartening to read the Juniatian in recent weeks and see students registering their complaints about college policies. You have to make unrest known before you can do anything with it. Now, I would like to suggest that maybe we could affect these policies by using our power in the larger community.

For instance, last week we had a debate on campus between the two candidates for state senator from this district. Both said flatly that they were against any change in the drinking laws. Now obviously, you say, we can't work for a candidate who will bring about the desired change. Technically that is true. However, what if somebody did something a little different. Perhaps someone could organize a write in campaign for a favorable candidate in the race just here on campus. Obviously our candidate couldn't win, but when the eventual winner saw the results, he would realize that there were strong liabilities of his actions on the matter. Before this is laughed off, consider that students represent not only a sizeable voting bloc, but more importantly, a rich supply of manpower for campaign staffs.

I didn't make this suggestion with the idea that someone would go out and do it. It is probably a little late for that. The point I wanted to make is that even in situations where your plight seems hopeless, there may still be ways to effect change. Looking around, one sees this lack of a feeling of effacacy as a major cause of apathy. Maybe with some different ideas, students might start to believe that they could really change things, and then the changes might start happening.

I might mention as a conclusion, that a Juniata student, Sue Roshirt, serves on the Executive Board of the National Student Lobby. The NSL is an organization that could provide real influence for students on the federal level. Juniata has a special link with this organization. Here is another example of power we have within our grasp that we are failing to use. We may have to start questioning our right to complain.

looks at it, coming to summer school does ruin some summer job plans and limits the number of carefree sunshine days.

In the final analysis, there's a lot to be said for summer school, depending upon the student's values. For some people it could possibly be "the answer" while for others it would simply mean year-round drudgery. Either way, it's yet another alternative the college offers which should be seriously and objectively considered by all.

What Is There To Do?

To highlight the Parents Day Weekend, the Artist Series will present the Tokyo String Quartet. They are four outstanding musical instrumentalist—2 violinist, 1 violist, 1 violoncellist—who received their training at the famous Toho Music Academy in Tokyo. Later they pursued their studies at the Juilliard School of Music in New York City.

The Quartet became well-known five years ago when the Amadeus Quartet awarded them the coveted first prize in the Coleman String Quartet competition in California. Not long afterward, they again won first prize in the prestigious Munich International Competition.

Highlighting their current season in the U.S.A. includes their own series in Carnegie Recital Hall, and appearance at Lincoln Center in New York City, the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C. and at Oller Hall on Nov. 9 at 8:15 P.M. There is no doubt that this ensemble has already achieved recognition as one of the foremost quartets in the world so this should be an enjoyable evening of music listening.

Uninhibited People Needed Winter Term

by Bruce Davis

It was always so easy when Judy and Mickey did it. Somebody's father always had all the costumes from the past four Sao Paolo carnivals in his garage, and there were businesses all over town just throbbing to donate sets and props to such a swell bunch of kids, and if by some odd chance the show didn't start out on Broadway, well there was almost certain to be a convention of New York producers in the town where it did open, and we could tell from the way their jaws went slack or their eyebrows crawled up under their hatbrims that the babes would be hoofing it on 42nd Street before the week was out. Nothing to it.

Even more amazing though was the cooperation J&M got from their casts and crews. Nearly everybody within a radius of fifty miles wanted to be in those shows, except for one sizable group that was in a frenzy to work backstage, and anybody that couldn't squeeze himself on or behind the stage made darned sure that he was at least out in front of it on opening night, laughing and whooping and clapping his little hands into bloody stumps. Nobody ever told Judy that they were sort of interested but that they had a bear of a history course that term and they just didn't see where they could get the time. Nobody ever said to Mick that they had never felt much like being in a play; that most of their spare time was taken up with knocking back Boone's April vintage and watching "The Young and the Restless." Everybody just pitched in.

The drama department is looking for some people to pitch in during the winter term. We are putting on a production of Tom Stoppard's JUMPERS in February, with a cast that will include both students and faculty members. We want to go the whole hog: the full Oller stage, razzle-dazzle sets and lights, solid, carefully-crafted performances. I'll be directing the play and profs Briggs and Goehring will be lending aid in the manifold areas where my ambition outruns my competence.

The play, which ended its Broadway run last spring, opens with a strip-tease on a trapeze and expands in all directions: it is funny, racy, bizarre and very, very intelligent. We need some bright people, some uninhibited people, some people of both sexes looking to ride out the Huntingdon winter with more than just class work.

If any of that sounds even mildly stimulating to you, please drop by Shoemaker Galleries between 6:30 and 8:00 this coming Monday evening (the 11th). We'll give you a clearer idea of what the play is about and hold tryouts. If all goes well you can tuck a playbook in your Thanksgiving luggage and come back ready to ease into the new, no-strain rehearsal schedule through the winter term. My dad's got some costumes out in the garage. . . .

Confessions of a Caffeine Addict

by Steve Townsend

In this "drug oriented" age horror stories about misguided youths are more common than the persistent rumors about the connection between masturbation and cancer. But just as I've yet to see someone parading around campus with openly malignant sores, I haven't heard of anyone gobbling down handfuls of black acid either. Lets face it, students just don't remain students very long if they're leant towards abusing a rainbow of chemicals.

What these stories never warn us about are the legions of college studeats who find themselves hopelessly entrapped within the vicious circle of caffeine addiction. I'm sure you've recognized the type. He's the one who habitually carries off handfuls of tea bags from the cafeteria. He's the student you met at Randy's all nite newsstand clawing savagely at the No-Doz rack. Why, rumor even has it that one addict hideously scalded his lips while trying to slurp coffee directly from the urn.

You may ask, "Why is he bothering us with all this?" The answer is simple my friend, . . . to warn you. The path to caffeine degradation is all too easy to stumble upon. In fact, it was just this term that I conquered my own serious habit. I remember all too clearly that fateful nite in which caffeine grabbed hold of my life.

It was the second term of my freshmen year. I, like a vast majority of my fellow frosh, was stone sure that nothing could be harder than Modes Of Thought. Of course when the time for my first hourly approached I carelessly scoffed away any warnings about "starting to study now." I held no doubts about my ability to completely ingest the material sometime between supper and midnite on the evening before. When that calamitous nite rolled around I was in for a rude awakening.

"Holy Mother of Christ", I screamed. As I opened the book I suddenly realized that this was not like the assignments I'd been used to, this was the real thing, twelve chapters of introductory Political Science, chock full of terms, graphs, and relationships that all had to be crammed into my brain by 10 o'clock the next morning.

I was hysteric. Pictures of myself flunking out of school and joining into the white slave trade were running rampant across my brain. Somehow, I managed to compose myself and started to work on Chapter I.

By midnite my determination and my energy were beginning to wear thin. I found myself "nodding out" between the paragraphs of Chapter 4. Instantly, the images of horror that had gripped me earlier began creeping back into my consciousness. I had to wake up, find some way to maintain my alertness. By chance, my eyes fell upon a large cup that had been given me by the Alumni Association.

"Where's the coffee?", I yelled. Within seconds I was bolting down a mixture of cold water and Tasters Choice that resembled a low grade of motor oil.

Miraculously, I was able to struggle through Chaper 8 with the aid of a half dozen or so of these conocotions. However, the first rays of the sun told me that if I was going to get through number 12, I would have to shift gears and move on to something stronger.

My roommates No-Doz was the logical answer. I quickly chewed up a handful of those dreadful tablets and pushed ahead with my work.

Memories of what transpired after that are hazy at best. A close friend said he found me blabbering incessantly at the desk lamp about the finer points of life under a "Traditional Authoritarian Regime". Others said I had to fill out the test with my left hand because the motor control of my right was twitching furiously in an effort to throw off some of the excess artificial energy.

Whatever my condition at the time, it was good enough to see me through the exam. Somehow, I managed to pass the bugger, but it set a dangerous precedent. From that day forward, whenever the pangs of acedemic pressure made themselves felt, I went reeling towards the nearest sourse of caffeine.

one day this term I finally realized what a dangerous position I had gotten myself into. In a fit of determination I spit out the tea bag I had been chewing on and swore off all contact with the evil substance. No more coffee, tea, coke or No-Doz, from now on it was going to be Cream Soda and Cracker Jacks.

Minorities Fight For Rights

by Avril Lovet

I've been writing articles under the title of "Minorities Fight for Rights". But not until I read a letter from my sister did I realize exactly what I am writing about.

Since I am black and grew up in a black enviornment — my thoughts usually center around "colored people" when one talked in terms of oppressed minorities. Never did I think of the handicapped, blind or mentally ill. Nor did I think of our Senior citizens — how badly they're being treated. And never did I think about people who are physically oppressed behind jail bars, gates and walls.

In other words I set myself apart from these people. Their fight for rights weren't as important as my fight. Our society and myself have completly separated them from their daily lives.

Someone asked me once, what is prejudice. I answered, giving my view as — prejudice is the lack of knowledge and the lack of acknowledge. Every time I said this I would think of Blacks, Indians, but never the blind, deaf or dumb.

We are taught that if you can't produce in our society and for our society, you can't live like a human being. It's not unusual to be born blind, but it is unusual to find a job — not a hand out. It's also not unusual to live past sixty — but it is unusual to be cared for if you're lucky to live that long.

These people, no, our fellow citizens, are fighting the same battle other minorities are fighting. They want to be accepted as human beings, not children, and they also want a chance, just a chance at a job anyone else could do.

Trying to think in unbiased terms, I've been biased and now I think of all minorities, not just color minorities.

Insecurity-The JC Symptom?

by Bill Brooks

A Friend in Need is a Friend Indeed

Why does the students populace at Juniata lack a general affability? Students seem to be reluctant to go out of their way to establish new acquaintances. They simply segregate themselves into their small peer groups and are quite satisfied. So the typical, dull weekend at Juniata persists.

I have fabricated a rather provocative theory, but it may have substance. Juniata is a haven, because of its petiteness, for those who are apprehensive about attending a university because they possess certain insecurities. Is this some erroneous generalization made by a blatant idiot seeking attention or is there data to make this credulous? The answer to the latter is obviously no, the former is left to your discretion.

While demonstrating social science research methods in Modes, it was brought to our attention that a sizable portion of this year's sophomore class is composed of students from rural America. Rural Americans, because of their semi-reclusiveness, do not experience a diversity of situations typical of suburban and urban dwelling. For instance, they don't encounter a sundry of people of varying differences and personalities.

In response to Gary Moore's article, Carol McFate wrote a letter to the editor and stated, "Coming from a predominatey rural area, I was not confronted with relating to (or dealing with) Blacks until I came to Juniata." Could this lack of confrontation and understanding lead to introverted qualities and curtail mutual relationships.

Don't get me wrong, I'm not condemning rural Americans. I myself am a rural American. On the other hand, we should not condone the general atmosphere on campus. Granted, this may seem like a wild stab in the dark, but it was a sincere attempt to analyze the unamiable atmosphere here. Accost a stranger with a friendly greeting, introduce yourself, and Juniata may be a better place to live.

The Juniatian wishes to express its apologies to Rob Lopresti for omitting his name from his Letter to the Editor (Oct. 24, 1974).

Women-Why Are They A Minority At Juniata??

by Sue Blum

Every year it seems that Juniata is recruiting fewer and fewer girls. Why don't women come to Juniata College? I myself can think of several reasons for the low enrollment of girls at Juniata College. However I decided to get some opinions from some of my friends to go along with my own. At first they gave me sarcastic answers such as "the guys here are all messed up and have acne," take that to mean what you want. Anyway when I started to think about this, their sarcastic answers no longer seemed so ridiculous. People are often concerned with their social life which very often lacks at Juniata College. Take a look at how many girls have actually gone on a real date. I don't mean just a "wanna come over and hang arouhd date," but a real date, like asking a girl ahead of time if she wants to go out to dinner or to some such other engagement. Don't get me wrong guys! Actually it's not your fault, considering the opportunities and choices in downtown Huntingdon to take a girl out to. This especially could be tough if you don't have a car. Now onto other matters.

Currently there is no Home Economics program at Juniata. Men always say a "Women's role is in the home," yet they wonder why women don't come to Juniata College. Consider maybe because they can't learn to cook and sew or do any of those other girlish things here. At this point I would like to state this college, to put it bluntly, is male oriented. Just about every funded program and most aid goes to guys, there are no kinds of women's clubs or activities, and the girl's interscholastic sports program is almost zilch. Field hockey is fairly new to Juniata and the women's basketball team also. Not only that but there is not much publicity or attention paid to the teams anyway. Where's the pep band and the cheerleaders at the girl's field hockey games? If they can cheer on at the football and men's basketball games why not at the girl's field hockey games. And take a look at the girls gym, a crusty old building with no equipment in it.

Regarding academics, Juniata is a very good school, as we all well know. But it is basically a science school. And if one takes a look around in some of his science course classes he will see a minimum number of girls in it. Either women don't feel sure of themselves in that field or that field is not sure of women going into it. I'm not sure which way it leans.

This year I must note that things seem to be getting more encouraging for women. A step toward the right direction was the women's colloquy. You all remember that, don't you?

These are some of my reflections on why I think women might choose another school in picking the college of their choice. Of course I picked Juniata, so it can't be all that bad. In fact I found a whole apartment full of guys without acne.

Church Relations

tricts, and representatives from the student body, faculty, and administration. There are approximately 125 congregations in the 3 districts.

Juniata is no longer seen as the tight, conservation, religious institution it once was. The declining influence of the Church of the Brethren has been proportionate to the declining percentage of Brethren students and of Brethrens in both the College's leadership structure and among friends of the College. When Dr. Stauffer became President in 1968, he became the first non-Brethren to hold that office. However, many members of the Church give substantial amount of money to the school. For many of them, Juniata will always be "our school". My thanks to Mr. Harold Brumbaugh, Vice-President for College Relations for much of the information in this article.

Gov't Back To Students

by W. Stephen Cordova
Senate Public Relations Committee

The Student Government under the leadership of Carl Glaeser and Senate members has and will in the future continue to stress the essance of bringing Student Government back to the students. A shining example of this is the many attempts to give the Issues Desk, now the Student Concern Desk, not only a new look, but hopefully a new fulfilling purpose. Presently a committee chaired by Mike McElhinney is investigating possible ways of making Student Government more accountable to the electorate. The committee is also looking into future amendments to the constitution that could have members removed if they are not performing to conditions expressed within the constitution. Tom Cross, Jim Gerek, Ed Hinchey, and Carl Glaeser are competent members of the committee mentioned above, if you have questions or suggestions they will be available.

The Used Book Sale appears to have promise, despite the great amount of work ahead. The last week of the term, books can be brought to the "Old Arts and Crafts Room," across from the Student Governemnt office. Books will then be filed with your name and your price. When you return from term break books can be purchased from or by you. Jim Messner and Todd Lins are working hard to get this project off the ground on time. Any help would be appreciated.

Parent's Weekend is two days away, Jim Gerek, in conjunction with Clay Pheaseant have been working out details and activities for the annual event. In closing, the new course evaluation books will be ready for circulation by the beginning of next week.

Progress of the McElhinney Committee and the duties of a senator will be the central themes of the next Public Relations report.

A Look At Some JC Gridders

BY Hays and Paulshock, Vito
A Look At Some Juniata Gridders

Carmen DeFrancesco: Carmen is a pint-size, but mighty little running-back. Since his hometown is in the "coal region", and because he simply "burns" every defensive squad that he faces, perhaps he should be called "Carbon DeFrancesco". The bullish, squirmy runner always seems to amaze, thrill, appall, excite, dazzle, and merely mesmorize the fans, as he dashes up and down the field every Saturday afternoon with the ball. Serving as a team co-captain, the courageous tail-back earns both praise and much respect for the manner in which he plays football and the way he commands the team on the field. DeFrancesco has never ceased to play as an outstanding ball-carrier so far this season, and chances are that he will not retire until all those watching him are convinced that he is one of the best in small college competition.

Pete Lentini: Lentini, along with Carmen, is another senior veteran of the team. Last season, Pete led the Indians in points scored; and this year, he is a receiver that all M.A.C. competitors look up to. His most glamerous performance was given when he found himself on the reception end of a 94yd. pass play from frosh Quarterback, Scott Magley. Nearly every game this Fall, Lentini has managed to grab an aerial from the J.C. man under center, and plow or sprint his way into the end-zone for a Juniata touchdown. There's no doubt, that this tight-end has been and will continue to be an immense asset to the Indian offensive attack.

Scott Magley: Scott is another "tiny" fellow to be playing varsity football, but his cock-fire right-arm has proven him to be the starting signal-caller at quarterback. Being only a freshman; he rifled an exciting 94yd. pass play to beat Albright; and most assuredly assited in scoring 28 points against Upsula, before being replaced by another freshman late in the game. The short, stocky and shy little straw-berry blonde-haired "field general" has shown much potential in his past performances, and holds a great amount of promise with his great talent, for future M.A.C. competition.

Bob Devine: Better known around campus as "the jock in the fluffy white pimp cap", Devine is also congratulated for his superfulous exhibitions at defensive halfback. The "mad-hatter" impressed everyone, and expressed his fine grid-iron ability, when he grabbed an Upsula pass and then charged for a 45yd. gain, setting off Juniata's romp, over the Vikings, 34-8.

Attention: Health Food Nuts- Nutrition Symposium Ahead

by Cricket Smith

This year as president of Dormitory Government, one of my interests involves the conducting of a health and nutrition symposium to be held at Juniata throughout the year. Being a "health food nut" for six years has been part of this inspiration, plus the fact that I attended the National Health Federation Convention in Anaheim, California last January, and joined over 10,000 other "nuts" in a most informative and inspiring week of lectures, demonstration and displays. Also, being a part-time reporter for the Wilkes-Barre newspaper, the Record and Times-Leader, in Wilkes-Barre, I received the assignment from the managing editor to "cover" the convention, which I did in a five-part series, one article each week, explaining what was involved with convention.

I am still pursuing my interest and study of nutrition, and I would like to pass some of my knowledge and information along to the rest of the students and faculty at Juniata. I have written to noted nutrition and health authorities, among them Linda Clark, Bob Hoffman and Euell Gibbons asking for their help in conducting this symposium. So far I have received much information and explanatory material related to the health movement, and am still in the process of seeking speakers to come and lecture or set up displays for the campus.

To initiate the symposium, there will be a group of pamphlets and essays I have received which will be posted on the bulletin board in the post office next to the rides and articles for sale boards. I hope that these might spark some student interest in all or some aspects of health and nutrition, and especially so that we may become aware of our physical beings and the fact that "we are what we eat."

I also have quite a bit of material on hand which I can personally lend out to interested persons. If you have any questions, suggestions or problems I can usually be found in the student government office sometime during the day, or I can be contacted at my college box 1149 at 643-4061.

Organization Changing

being an active member is the opportunity to participate in the club's trips.

As to the present success of this "new club"; so far there is a membership of approximately 20 to 25 people which, according to Mr. Jarzab, is very good. Also, the club's first speaker session was very well attended by club members and other interested students. As to the continued success of the Barrister Club; according to Mr. Jarzab it is optimistic.

Help Arrives ! Long Awaited

by David Mitchell

Juniata College students now have available to them the services of the Huntingdon family planning center. The newly opened center is located 725 Washington Street in downtown Huntingdon.

What is the family planning center?

The center offers birth control information, advice, and related services to all who request them without regard to economic level, marital status, age, sex, or parity. Some of the services rendered are birth control information and supplies, breast and pelvic examinations, pap smears, V.D. testing, urine tests, blood tests and pregnancy testing. All fees for medical services are based on the ability to pay.

In addition to medical services, the family planning center offers educational and social services such as consultation on family planning, counseling on all forms of birth control methods, referral when needed to the appropiate clinic or physician, informative brochures, and speakers for community groups of any size.

The center staff is comprised of Dixie Hammers, nurse administrator; Nancy A. Conley, social service, outreach and educational consultant; and Sandra L. Brechbiel, secretary-receptionist; not to mention six community physicians who make up the medical staff.

The Huntingdon family planning center is open Monday thru Friday 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. You can visit their office at 725 Washington Street or call 643-5364.

Juniata Sets New Record

The Cross-Country team set a new record for the most wins in a season as they rolled over the Dickinson harriers in Carlisle last Saturday, 17-44. This marks the ninth win in ten starts, the most victories ever posted by an Indian cross-country team. The previous high of eight was established over a decade ago as it was reached in both the 1960 and 1961 seasons.

Juniata spoiled the Red Devil's Parent's Day cross-country meet by picking up seven of the first ten places in a near shutout victory, 17-44. (Needless to say, many parents were disappointed).

Jack McCullough, Greg Ransom and Bill Kibler lead the pack, finishing one, two and three, respectfully, before a Dickinson runner saved a shut-out by finishing fourth. Jack and Greg were just six and ten seconds respectfully, off the course record pace. Following closely to Dickinson's first runner, Paul Wilson and John Brommer tied for fifth before the next Dickinson runner appeared. John Ausherman and Dave Quig rounded out the top ten finishers for the day, finishing eighth and ninth.

Juniata has another chance to increase their winning ways and advance the record one more notch as they still have one more dual meet remaining against Gettysburg on Tuesday afternoon. This particular meet will be the highlight of the season as they face the tough Bullet team, which dropped down from the University to the College division of the MAC's as of this year. A victory here would definitely place the Indians in the midst of teh contention for the MAC title as Gettysburg is probably the favorite for the championship race, which will be run at Belmont Park, Philadelphia, this coming Saturday.

Are you bored with J.C.? Take a year to experience life and yourself! You'll never regret it. Come to B.C.A.—Foreign Studies Day. Nov. 9, 9:00 a.m. - 6:00 p.m. in Faculty Lounge.

A Little From Moore

by Gary Wayne Moore

In the past weeks articles have appeared in the paper that have dealt with the problems and frustrations of minority groups. There is a problem which striles at the heart of Juniata; which is, the plight of the Women's Field Hockey Team.

Women's Field Hockey is not a club. It is an intercollegiare varsity sport which suggests that it has, or should have, the same status as the other varsity sports of Juniata. But for some unknown reason or another it has yet to attain this status, and hopes of reaching it seems a very far fetched idea.

When I talk of status I am speaking in terms of maintenance of the field, and the acquisition of the necessary equipment needed — or that one should have — to play and complete in a varsity game on an intercollegiate level. The players of the hockey team have not received such a status.

The conditions of the field are so atrocious that these women might be better off playing on the cliffs. The leaves which are never raked, hide the ruts and rocks which have cost several injuries. One of which resulted in an ankle sprain of a player from Indiana who could not avoid falling into a large rut, simply because she could not see it from the leaves. I am sure that the field conditions are not an esoteric matter to the Juniata students; but I am certain that they must be to the administrators in Founders Hall, since they have not shown any support for the team by coming to watch our players compete on their rock-filled field. Athletic Director Walt Nadzak, has related to me that this is a partly a result in the budget cut the "administrators" have placed on him.

The players are plauged with problems of attaining food after their away games. At one time they had to use box lunches. Now they are allowed an entire $1.50 for their dinners — which is approximately $1.00 less than that amount which the other varsity sports receive.

I don't know. I'm asking you if this is either a problem of prejudice or neglect. Either way, someone has to get on the ball! Ha! And they have the nerve to ask why we are having trouble recruiting women students!?

An Unknown Personality Juniata's Brother Baugh

by Gary Wayne Moore

One might think that if a person were locked up in a cage for nearly 14 years that they would either turn into a vegetable or end up climing the walls to preserve their sanity. Well, Jim Harbaugh, Jr. has worked as Juniata's Equipment Manager for nearly 14 years in a room commonly known as the "cage," and he is far from being a vegetable or climbing the walls for his sanity.

Jim is a member of the Juniata Athletic Staff. His job is the cleaning and maintenance of all uniforms and athletic equipment. This is by no means an easy task. Have you ever tried cleaning 90 muddy football uniforms before? Jim has done it several times.

Jim enjoys immensly . This is probably the reason why he gets along so well with everyone — especially the athletics. Any time of the day you can pass by the cage and find someone "shooting the breeze" with Jim. He will talk with you on any subject. Music — of of which one of his favorite groups is the Doobie Brothers — and politics probably being his best conversation pieces.

Jim says that he's met a lot of different people in his "cage." When he was with the summer basketball camp here, Peter Maravich used to drop by just to talk about any oid thing with Jim.

A man of 50 years of age, Jim's got a sense of humor that will set your funny bone in high gear. Stop by and talk with him awhile. When you get to know him, you'll just call him 'Baugh's. When you get to know him as well as I do, you'll simply call him, "Brother 'Baugh's."

Dialogues From Parents' Visits To "Fair" Juniata

by Rob Lopresti

Parents day features more Meaningful Dialogue than an HEA class, or even a dorm room at 2 a.m. Here are random samples:

"Why are all those bottles on the window sill?"

"Just decoration."

"But I thought you weren't allowed to drink on campus."

"Who said anything about drinking? See? Nothing to drink: all these bottles are empty."

"Look at all the girls who wore dresses, but not you, you had to wear blue jeans. . ."

* * *

"And this is the post office."

"Oh, you have one. It's been so long since we heard from you I was beginning to wonder."

* * *

"Which team is Juniata?"

* * *

"But, Dad—"

"I realize this is a free country but they just shouldn't be allowed to print things like that in a school paper! When I was a boy. . ."

* * *

"Is that the library?"

"Um, I guess so. I can see books through the window."

* * *

"Look at the crazy clothes! Students just don't seem to care how they look anymore."

"That's one of my professors."

"Modes of what?"

* * *

"Your room looks very nice. What used to hang on the wall here?"

"What? Oh nothing, nothing. Let's go to lunch."

"Something used to hang here. There's less dust on this part of the wall, and there's tack holes. What was it?"

"Uh, just a poster. Let's go to lunch."

* * *

"Well, how's it going?"

"It's great, really."

"Are you getting enough exercise?"

"Sure, I'm on an intramural team."

"And social life?"

"Lots of parties, and some dates."

"And classes?"

"Classes?"

"Did you see my name in the paper?"

"Yes dear, but look what they put in front of it. Those silly editors don't know how to spell "Miss".

Fewer Choices, Greater Chances

by Horace Greeley

"There will be some changes in Writing Program II this coming term," announced Professor Croce, director of the program. He went on to say that the ends of the course will be the same: the successful completion of an argumentative research paper, and a final essay dealing in some way with that research paper. However, unlike in previous years, the student will register for a workshop specifically listed as dealing with the general area in which he will write his paper. Last year, students chose their general areas individually, and then narrowed their topics through a series of preliminary papers and in consultation with their instructors in tutorial.

There were distinct disadvantages to the student. Some students took weeks to decide upon a general area. Others found themselves in areas beyond their skill and experience. The result was that valuable time was taken up by preliminaries that should have been spent researching, writing and revising, and towards the end of the term the student found himself rushed. In addition, in workshops, peer discussion of a student's paper was not too meaningful because, in most instances, the student's comrades were unfamiliar with the context of his paper, and as a result were often unable to go further in their criticism than making superficial comments upon the student's spelling, punctuation and grammar. They couldn't help the student focus upon the larger more important concerns like organization, or better yet, getting him to see the implications of what he was doing.

In having students choose beforehand their general areas, and in having all students in the workshops dealing with different aspects of the same topics, Professor Croce hopes that the problems of previous Writing Program II's will begin toward solution. He stressed that students still have choice. However, he admitted that the choice will be limited to the published general topics. He feels optimistic, despite the limitations, because "the selection of general topics is great — there are about twenty different areas to choose from — and within these general areas the selection of a specific topic for research is limitless."

Some of the general areas listed for next term are "Religion," "The Problems of Public Education," "Problems of the Aged," "Cultural Conceits: Film, Art, Music." A full list and detailed descriptions of each are being distributed to Freshmen this week.

Professor Croce also said that the above-announced changes will not affect the course's basic organization. The course will still begin with a fact-finding assignment designed to familiarize the student with general references and other research tools. The second assignment will be a limited bibliographical essay, followed by a proposal and outline for the paper. Then will come the paper, and the latter part of the course — about the last three weeks — will deal with revising the paper.

The other important announcement made was that there will be no

We Must Never Lose Our Contact With Surroundings

by Courtnaye Byron Rhone

Indeed after having been bombarded with the analysis of my personal value system in the Human Existence Analytical course this term, I've come to the conclusion that my life here at Juniata College is in many ways too secure and comfortable. This particular awareness was not drawn to my attention only through the H.E.A. course, but also by a lengthy philosophical discussion held between myself and a good friend of mine who spent his junior year in Europe, as I did, last year.

This particular experience coerced us into realizing how important and imperative it is to remain in contact with our surroundings as well as with ourselves. The responsibilities that we as individuals had, were magnified two-fold, never knowing what to expect from one day to another, and faced with tumultuous changes and challenges. Decision making and concern for life and the world around us became a major aspect in our daily lives, and it was not always convenient, or possible for that matter, to get advice on particular matters that came into focus. The security of knowing that someone will always be there, and mom and dad being as far as the nearest telephone, was put at a premium. The world around us took on a much more serious outlook, and since both of us studied at considerably large universities in our prospective host countries, we realized that more than academics played a tremendous role in our undergraduate lives, above and beyond the scope and realm of what could be seen from any ivory tower.

I believe one can be and should be strengthened mentally as he/she pursues an education at an institute of higher learning to cope with the real world from a local, national, as well as an international standpoint. The affairs of our country both domestic and international are important to each and every person on the face of the earth. To sit back, relax, and take the attitude that someone else is out there taking care of all, because he/she was elected or assigned to do so, is the attitude of a fool. The world does not function on a hope and a prayer. The world functions because people function in a positive and directive manner. There is no place in our society for apathetic intelectuals, Complete Is How Many?

by Izeppo

Not a great deal was accomplished at this month's faculty meeting. After a long and talkative session, in which the main business was a discussion of the student's Complete Transcript (as opposed to the SCU, discussed at last month's meeting), it was decided — 22 for and 13 against — to include in that transcript's listing "all" the grades received for a unit taken more than once. This was one giant step forward for our faculty, and Roget, who lists "complete" and "all" as synonomous, would have been well pleased.

The only other item of major interest was Professor Cauffman's announcement that Academic Standards is giving top priority to interpreting by graduate and professional schools of SU grades, and the effects of their interpretation of the SU grades upon the student's grade point average and hence his eligibility for admission to graduate and professional schools.

The Juniatian plans a more complete article on this problem in a forthcoming issue.

Traditional Auction Of Slaves Is Hindered By Poor Attitude

by Tony Martuzas

It was Wednesday Night the 24th of October, 1973; I entered Alumni Hall and went over some last minute preparations with the Class of '77 to iron out any problems they were having with their "Slave Auction". I was highly impressed with their organization; everything was in order and ready to go. The Hall was swelling with boisterous Male Students, as well as Upperclass women scattered throughout the auditorium. The evening proved to be a highly enjoyable one, the only incident of the night occured when I had to reprimand the audience for calling out a freshman's number while she stood atop the small auctioning block. The frosh (or this year's Sophomore Class) pulled in a lot of money and it seemed as though everybody had an enjoyable time; So much for last year.

Last Wednesday night I traveled to Alumni Hall, only to find some sort of Christmas celebration going on inside, so I headed over to the Ballroom where I eventually found the setting for this year's Freshman Slave Auction. I immediately noticed the lack of preparation: the cards were being made up, phone numbers were being collected in a last minute manner and hardly any chairs were out. Soon the "customers" filtered in and all of a sudden I was confronted with the most unruly and drunken mob I ever had to face in my years as a college student. I have spoken many times in front of large college audiences through my activities as a Radio-station representative, last years "Freshman Propoganda Meeting", last year's Slave Auction, and also I had some insight into mob hysteria through my antics as last year's football Indian Mascot. After a year's absence from Student Activities, I bitterly realized that night the experience of losing all sorts of control over the crowd.

Women's Roles In Our Society

by Sue Rossbirt

On Thursday, November 7 there was scheduled an open panel on "Woman". There were four prominent women with the center of attention being on Ms. Margaret Chase Smith the retired Senator of Maine. She served eight years in the Legislature and served twenty-four years in the United States Senate.

As many of you know Ms. Smith doesn't like to give prepared speeches but enjoys answering all questions. The following information in this article was taken from the answers Ms. Smith gave to the many questions asked to the entire panel. In Ms. Smith's opening remarks she stated that it was vitally important that the society treat women equally because "woman are people." She felt that a woman's place was everywhere but that she must earn her positions. Women must also have the desire, they must want these positions and be willing to go after them.

When Ms. Smith was speaking on the question of where women belonged in society she initially stated everywhere. She then proceeded to provide four areas of importance to women. Firstly, she felt the place of a woman is that of a wife and a mother. Ms. Smith felt that being a wife and a mother is a highly honorable position. Ms. Smith also felt if your job is hurting your home life you should either quit the job or make some other kind of arrangement. The second position for a woman is that of participating in civic organizations. Thirdly women should be active in business and industry. Ms. Smith felt that in the business maybe the women haven't desired the positions and that is why there are not that many women in industry. Here again she stressed that women should work up through

Letters to the Editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatian. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name. It is also requested that all letters be double spaced with 70 spaces per line.

I am writing this letter in an attempt to explain the workings and criteria for admittance into the Juniata College Honor Society, and thus, alleviate, or at least limit, the confusion, paranoia, and ill-feelings generated in the past by this process.

According to the constitution and by-laws, only seniors and third term juniors can be considered for admission, and the number of members from any class can not exceed fifteen percent (15%) of that class (only half of this fifteen percent may be elected as juniors).

To be eligible for automatic nomination, certain minimum quality point average requirements must be met: 2.5 for juniors, and 2.25 for seniors (on a 3.00 scale). This year we are also trying something new: students who do not make the Q.P.A. cut, but feel they have demonstrated "scholarly achievement" through some other means, can petition the Society and schedule an interview, after which their particular situation will be considered.

After nomination, each student will be sent forms for supplying further information concerning their campus and community activities, course work, etc. To limit the possibility of prejudicial treatment, each student application will be assigned a number and will be referred to thereafter only by that number. We will make every attempt to judge each case on its merit alone.

Some of the things we will be looking for include evidence of academic breadth (at least one course from each of the three divisions will normally be required for juniors and two per division for seniors). These requirements may be met by any courses, i.e. by value-centered units, electives, program of emphasis units, etc. Foreign language and math requirements are stipulated in the by-laws, but they may be met with high school work. Evidence of "broad cultural interests" is also a necessity (i.e. sports, music, painting, clubs, hobbies, etc.) as is "moral" integrity. In particular, there should be no flagrant violations of academic honesty; infractions of other campus or community regulations will be examined separately.

On the position side, community service work (such as volunteer work in a hospital) and campus or outside employment will also be given consideration.

Some nominees will probably be eliminated as ineligible after review of these forms; the remainder will be interviewed by two Honor Society members who will then present the interview data to the Honor Society for final examination. The interviewers will be excluded from this examination.

It is my hope that through the above process fair treatment and consideration will be shown to each nominee. Any questions concerning the election procedure or the functioning of the Juniata College Honor Society may be forwarded to box 1157.

Larry Stem, President
Juniata College Honor Society

I have been here for one term now, and I think that it's about time to talk about two things publicly. Both have to do with the students here — and both would just not be possible in Germany.

The first thing that pisses me off about JC students is jumping in line in front of people. I see this happening before every meal, and I always wish that guys I am referring to would try this back home. They would get their heads taken off their shoulders. I mean it. Look, the guys you get in front of have been waiting for minutes to get their meal. And they have been waiting in the proper manner — in the line. I heard one guy say "I have work to do." Sure, so have all of us. My opinion is that everybody has to start at the very end of the line. Only that way, by playing the game, can a place like this be run. Maybe we really should start bashing peoples' heads in — if some just can't stick to the rules.

The other thing is the cohabitation problem. The "no overnight sleeping" rule is one of the most ridiculous things I have ever heard of. Most ridiculous, however, is that it still exists although everybody on campus knows what's going on. Up to four years ago the same thing was wrong in the student dorms in Marburg. The big difference is that the students did not wait for the administration to wake up. Understand? Sure, this called for a massive breaking of the rules. But there are rules which are inhuman — and these have to be broken openly because that's the only way to get rid of them. And right here and now I think it's time for the JC students to ACT.

As for Mr. Norris' argument that JC is no stable communtiy, and that permitting overnight sleeping (or even co-ed dorms) would have far reaching consequences — I haven't had such a laugh in a long time. In the first place, if this is no stable community why does this college celebrate homecoming and expect the alumni to regard this place as their home? A college, I think, is a much more stable community than anything else in the world — other than a family. Secondly, I don't think that Mr. Norris is really naive enough to believe that the "Far reaching consequences" he is talking about do not occur under the present rule.

by Henry Siedzikowski

Well, another Parent's Weekend has come and gone. A quick survey indicates a high rate of survival among the students population. But, as amazing as this is, it is not the highlight of this annual event. While admittedly, the weekend was standard in a number of ways; taking Mom and Dad to the football game, it had its unusual aspects. The finest example of what I'm talking about was the Saturday night party that saw students having their normal Juniata weekend "goodtime", while their parents were right there partying with them.

This could have shocking ramifications for those still supporting the "Generation Gap" theory. That, of course, is the theory that a college must have all kinds of strange rules, because college kids are kind of freaky and must be forbidden from doing a wide range of things, such as drinking. For years, this theory has stood unchallenged, using lofty Latin phrases, such as "in loco parentis", to discourage deviance from its divine principals. Imagine my amazement to see empirical data that contradicted this theory outright.

My thought processes, sharpened beyond belief by all liberal education here at Juniata, first felt a twinge at approximately 12:45 Saturday afternoon. My parents had just arrived. By sheer chance, my father opened a refrigerator and discovered a few stray beers from the night before. I braced myself for a lecture on violating school policies, but to my disbelief, he simply asked if he could have one. After my Mode of Thought experience, I could not help myself. I started raising questions on all my old perspectives on the matter.

The reality of the matter was quickly brought home. As we proceeded to the living room, a roommate of mine quickly observed that we ought to close the door, so a wandering college official would not bust my father.

At this point, my father was badly shaken. Matters, however, were destined to become worse. After the game, we were moved to hold an informal reception for our parents in the apartment. With our parent's approval, this event included the drinking of beer. (At this point, I pinched myself to make sure I was not having a wild dream.) We also discovered that this was not an uncommon event. Finally, there was the Saturday night party with parents and students doing it all together.

I spent most of Sunday in shock. I couldn't even concentrate on the football games. Everything I had seen kept swimming around in my mind. Then, all of a sudden, I saw my salvation. I made a hypothesis that maybe this theory was a bunch of you know what. Studying the data seemed to confirm this hypothesis. I quickly reached a conclusion. Now I'm baffled at the fact that all the college administrators who have been educating me to think this way, haven't come to this conclusion yet.

God [Sirianni] and Satan [Rudy] contemplate proper punishment for Job [Peterson].

MacLeish Offers Book Of Job-American Style

"THERE WAS A MAN IN THE LAND OF UZ. . ."

. . .whose name was Job, and he was a perfect and upright man, one who feared God and eschewed evil. But things happened. His children died, His camels, his oxen and his sheep where stolen. His skin was afflicted with hideous sores and boils. His wife sought greener pastures. Why? Why? What was his guilt? Why had God chosen to punish him in such a manner? Does not God love? Is not God just? Was not Job innocent?

This, in a nutshell, is the book of Job. Also Archibald MacLeish's J.B. Only it's been Americanized. J.B. is a prosperous banker. His children are blown up by war, smashed in car accidents, raped and beaten to death, and crushed by the very walls which supported his fortune. His skin is afflicted by a nuclear disaster. His "comforters" become a Marxist, a psychiatrist, and a priest. This is the scene enacted by a group of players (?) in the corner of an old circus tent. A balloon vendor (Sam Sirianni) and a popcorn vendor (myself) play God and Satan respectively. J.B. (Chris Peterson) and Sarah, his wife, (Nancy Preston), the messengers of death (Dave Amidon, Quinn Horan, and Diane Schaal), and the three comforters (Elaine Joyce, Nathan Wagonner, and Carl Maryott) are picked from the attending audience. But, is it an audience? Is it, indeed, a play? Or is the whole thing a drama masterminded by a distant voice who occasionally makes his presence known? It could be a larger scale drama designed by the Masque Club to help this poor struggling student pass a theater experience study. And even on a larger scale. . .

Mr. Zuss and Nickles ("God" and "Satan") are the characters who provide MacLeish's commentary on Job. They argue, they arrange, they try to unravel the puzzle which is unfolded in the Bible and before their eyes. Mr. Zuss' God is certainly not Nickles' God or J.B.'s God or even MacLeish's God. Both of these old actors play parts their all-too-human minds cannot possibly understand. The Distant Voice brings J.B. to understand. Sort of. God is God. Period. He is not just. He is not Human. "He does not love./He is." Neither Nickles nor Zuss can understand this as J.B. can. Neither Nickles nor Zuss can even understand the optimism J.B. and Sarah can show at the end. God does not love. "But we do. That's the wonder." Through loving each other, and only through loving each other can mankind get by:

"Blow on the coal of the heart.
The candles in the church are out.
The lights have gone out in the sky.
Blow on the coal of the heart
And we'll see by and by."

The Masque Club will present Archibald MacLeish's pulitzer prize winning drama in verse, J.B., tonight at 8:15 P.M. and Saturday at 3 P.M. and again at 8:15 P.M. in the Ellis Hall mini-stage. The cast will make themselves available for discussion following all performances.

Stones Still Rock'n Roll

by Philip Heppard

Hey hey, it's the new Stones album. It's been over a year since "Goats Head Soup" and big changes might have been expected but "It's Only Rock'n Roll" sounds quite a bit like its predecessor. The similarity between "Star Star" and "Dance Little Sister" is remarkable. Same sneering vocals, crying guitar lead, and driving rythm. The same old cast of stars are present, minus the horns including hit-bound Billy Preaton, and old-time favorites Nicky Hopkins and Ian Stewart tinkling the ivories. The sound is decadent rock'n roll. Jagger's sensuous vocals seem to have lost their power since the pre-Exile on Mainstreet days but he still has his mastery over the mood in his songs like his soulful discourses, whisperings, groans, and shouts on "Figerprint File." A paranoid and indignant treatise on the procedure of the FBI. Not too big on subject matter, but neat to listen to.

Most of the songs deal with raw sex and love which is always great stuff for rock'n roll. "Till the Next Goodbye" is a weepy love song much like "Winter" on Goat. "Time Waits for No One" is the best song for a good instrumental work-out. Very Reminiscent of "Moonlight 'mile" off of "Sticky Fingers." The guitar, drums, and bass work together beautifully with the piano hauntingly in the background. Re-

Observations On Clean-Up For Parents

By Steve Townsend

Four of us stood at the entrance to our second floor shower. The door had been propped open, and we were astounded tp find a crew of three diligently working to remove the scars of use left there over a two month period by twelve males. Ruford and Nedford, the affectionate hair pies that had come to grace our shower drains, were gone. The bits of soap wrappers, toilet paper and dust, that we had painstakingly decorated our floor with, had been swept away. Even the sinks had a glitter on their faces that none of us could quite remember.

"What's the occasion?" I quipped to the nearest member of the work force. Instead of an answer, I got two hairy eyes focused on me from behind the urinal partition. Not caring to pursue the matter any further, I rambled back to my room. No doubt someone had complained, bringing a good deal of heat down upon the poor man's head.

The next day, however, I found this obviously was not the case, for an entirely new crew was back at work. This time the mildewed shower curtains dissappeared. The floors and walls were being scrubbed, and some stange contraption was spraying the entire room with pungent disinfectant. As I flopped down upon my couch, the meaning of this intensive face lift suddenly came to mind.

Of course, the start of Parents Weekend was only two days away! No wonder we were being pampered like royal princes. The older ones were to start arriving on Friday. The hundreds of parents who had to cough up 1200 plus dollars for next term must not be offended at the sight of rancid residence halls.

From there it was no time until my brain connected a hundred abnormal occurances. Suddenly, the appearance of Juniata emblems on all the school vehicles made great sense. The sight of green army members raking leaves at 2 a.m. was no longer strange. Even the presence of maids puttering around the halls of Cloister fit perfectly into the overall picture. Juniata was undergoing a strange and wonderful metamorphosis.

By Saturday morning the great change was complete. All the dorms were spotlessly homey. The leaves and litter that had once blemished the face of our campus were not to be found. In fact, even the morning sun seemed to smile as it glistened off the glass panes of Beegley Library.

Everyone seemed to be infinitely pleased with the new Juniata. The idea that campus life was by nature a dreary existence no longer reigned as an unquestioned truth. By the time my parents had arrived at 12:30, I was filled with a great feeling of kinship towards my alma mater. Somehow, the college appeared to be everthing I had once thought it could be.

Saturday ended as pleasantly as it had begun, and even though I was exhausted from an afternoon of football, campus tours, and nearly four hours in the dishroom, I still felt unusually pleased over the state of affairs at Juniata. As I went to bed that evening I couldn't help but wish that everyday was Parents Day at J. C.

One More Juniata Student Wired To Callings Of Transcendental Meditation

by Tom Kutz

So my friend told me that he went to the T.M. lecture, liked what he heard and now he's doing it. Yup, my friend always was kind of strange, now he's finally gone complete freak. Found his "religious convictions" with the Maharishi Mahesh Yogi. You just close your eyes to let them be opened — sure. And he spent money to learn how to do it.

He told me I don't understand. What's to understand — the boy got taken and didn't even know it. He said its not religion but a way to experience a "finer level of thought." There's even scientific evidence that shows it works. Well, just flash a bunch of graphs 'cause facts lie and liars figure.

But there's scientific evidence. Going to J.C. one soon learns the value of that term, "scientific evidence." O.K., I'm off to the lecture to find out for myself.

What's this — a women is giving the lecture. What happened to the man with the flowers and the beard? She says that T.M. can be learned and enjoyed by everyone. She says that it provides a deep rest, causes the breathing rate to go down and reduce the metabolic rate (now that is impressive — I'll have to find out what "metabolic" is though). The speaker says that it releases tension and fatigue in a natural way, increases energy, and gives you creative energy, and gives you creative intelligence (yea — after that last hourly I could use a little creative intelligence). All you have to do is learn to meditate.

Money — ah, here comes the catch. You've got to pay. Yes, you do pay but not only do you learn the right way to meditate, but you can take advantage of different programs and services for as long as you want. Sounds like a pretty good deal—sure won't find it on the used car lot.

But what's this about a movement, your going to make everybody a guru right? No — world peace through T.M. Now how do you get world peace through meditating. Because of the positive effects of T.M. you act in a more loving manner. The more people T.M.'ing the more people will treat each other better. Even those not meditating are going to get some of this improved treatment. At least its a better idea than throwing napalm. Maby the man with the flowers and the beard has something.

Well, there's only one more step to take now. I guess my friends will be saying, "yea, he always was kind of strange, now he's really done it." But they just don't understand T.M. — yet.

workshops the first week of Winter term. Instead, all Freshmen enrolled in Writing Program II will meet Thursday evening, December 5, at 7:30 p.m., on Alumni Hall for a lecture-demonstration on the Library to be given by librarians Denise Blaisdell and Natalie Wiest.

A microphone was shortly brought out after the chaotic opening minutes The noise made bidding difficult, not to mention sporadic instances of the crowd's non-cooperation. The students who raised their hands high and conspicuous in the air made the auctioneer's job not too difficult. Some prospective buyers called out their bids, but without any physical movement their calls were drowned out by the ocean of chatter floating throughout the chamber. The lighting was exceedingly poor, much inferior to the lighting of Alumni, consequently adding to the Auctioneers poor visibility.

I added to the confusion by not auctioning off all the freshmen in their lineup sequence; a very bad slip on my part. But the most disgusting aspect of the entire evening was the shameless, cruel responses from the crowd. As some freshman took their turn out on the stage, they were cruelly hounded by catcalls and Bronx cheers. Many feelings were hurt, the irresponsibility of some members in the crowd was uncalled for. Drunken stupor or not, there's no excuse for outright cruelty. It also seems as the calibre of college students diminishes, so does common decency.

And now, I too, have to publically apologize for my misbehavior. I even assured many freshmen that this "slave auction" would be a "lot of fun" and they had nothing to fear. As I stood aside and watched some frosh receive the jeers from the unruly portion of the crowd, an immense feeling of guilt ruptured within me. I had failed to control some semblance of order for that night and things did not turn out exactly the way I had hoped they would.

Maybe next year, the setting will once more be in Alumni Hall, the auctioneer will be more suitable, and the crowd will be less viscious. But most of the unrulys were people I was highly unfimiliar with (probably frosh), but there were also some uncooperating upperclassmen.

If last Wednesday Night is an indication of the direction "Freshman Slave Auction" is heading, it might as well be eliminated. All the money the Freshman Steering Committee pulled in cannot possibly justify all the hurt feelings from that night. I can't see young female students subjecting themselves to such an abuse in the name of "tradition". There has to be a better, less offensive way the Freshman Class can raise money for their activities. Is money more important than the feelings of a few people?

Lose Your Contact

for a mind can only be as good as that individual who stimulates new ideas and concern for the existence of all mankind.

Indeed it can be too easy to be self-confident, tolerant, kind and happy, through over satisfaction with the individual's isolated existence. We must constantly remain cognizant of the fact that there is more to our existence than meets the eye. For beyond the comfort and seclusion of Juniata College as well as Huntingdon, Penna., lies an ever changing environment, which is influencing our lives every minute, and every second, that we exist. Even within the confines of this school there are decisions being made by administration, faculty and students alike, and not one of us should feel so confined, inhibited or maybe one should say, so secure that they have not a worry or a care because the other person is there to take care of everything. Life really isn't easy, for it thrives on fresh thoughts and ideas in a complex and demanding world. Each of us is responsible for making the world work.

It's very simple here at Juniata to forget what lies beyond these hallowed academic walls of our blissful utopia in minature. I sometimes wonder how ready many of us will be as we come to that day when we part company with our theoretical methodogies and have to implement the practical aspects of life with great consideration and ingenuity. The stolid walls of assuredness and security will be penetrated by every extraneous factor available that is allowed to run rampant. Those people who remain feeling so secure, as well as apathetic, to the complexities and confrontations that life affords each and everyone of us will stagnate in their complacent attitudes into oblivion. We are so perfectly situated here, that we as human beings and citizens of this country forget that we are still responsible and inflential too, and influenced by the conditions that exist in this world. Life still goes on beyond this college and each and everyone of us has the potential to secure, because our very existence is constantly being threatened.

I recall a quote from the Gordon (Nebr.) Journal that states, "There are people who make things happen, people who watch things happen, and people who don't know anything happened." Indeed with the potential of each and everyone of us here at Juniata, we should be among those who are making things happen and aware of what's happening in our complex society. We are here on this earth to see one another through as we travel life's long highway. Let's not be detoured due to the fact that we ignored our initial directions while the highway was smooth sailing because there are rougher roads ahead that are less comfortable than those of the past and the present.

Indians "Cool Off" Frostburg, 20-11

by John Paulshock

The Indian Gridders made their final 1974 home-stand against the Frostburg State Bobcats on Parents' Day, and put on a superb exhibition with a 20-11 victory; and tallied a clean slate of remaining unbeaten at home this season. The game was riddled with penalties, intense defensive struggles, and many fine individual showings.

Action-wise, the Indians dominated the first half by controlling the ball for 49 plays as compared to only 30 for Frostburg; and by jumping to a 3-0 lead. Kris DeJeet opened the game by running back the opening kick-off to his 27 yd. line. Q.B. Scott Magley then relied on the sure-footed running of Jim Rossi, Carmen DeFranceco, and Rich Madey, and the nimble fingers of "big boy" Lentini, as he commanded his team 73 yards in 10 plays; capped by a 26 yard field goal by freshman booter, Stan Nosal. Frostburg was halted on the next set of downs and was forced to punt; but then regained possession on a J.C. fumble. The Bobcats howled back with an 18 yard T.D. pass, but much to the delight of the home crowd, it was called back on an offensive holding charge.

Juniata then began to control the ball-game as the back-field rushed for spurts of 14:10: and 19 yards; and grabbed aerials for 19:11:5: and 10 yards. DeFrancesco and Rossi consistently chomped off clumps of sod as they rambled downfield; only to be constantly set back by the yellow flags of the referees. The Indians were able to get into scoring range again, but a 40 yard field goal attempt failed. Neither team was able to score throughout the rest of the second quarter, so the halftime scoreboard read J.C. 3, F.S. 0.

In the second half, L.B. Dan Ereditario nabbed an interception, and darted 12 yards to the F.S. 26 yard line to set up an eight yard T.D. by fullback Darryl Long. Nosal hoofed the P.A.T. and with only 3 mins. and 40 secs. gone from the half, the score was J.C. 10, F.S. 0. Three minutes later, DeFrancesco wiggled and sprinted 39 yards for the third Juniata score. P.A.T. was again good, and the score stood at 17-0. Frostburg then added their version of exciting football when they dumped Magley for a ten yard loss and recovered his fumble on the Indian 24. The Bobcat Q.B. heaved a 24 yard touchdown pass; topped by a "cute" 2 point conversion, and suddenly the game was a tight one, 17-8. After an 18 yard kick-off return by DeJeet, and more penalties, the third quarter drew to a close.

The final period was slow in action; but Frostburg started to move after a Magley pass fell incomplete on a 4 down and 11 yards to go. The cats stormed 80 yards in 14 plays with a field goal to lessen the margin at J.C.-17, F.S.-11. The Tribesman then put a clincher on the game, however, when Nosal chipped another 26 yard three-pointer with only 3:10 remaining to play. Final Score— Indians 17, Bobcats 11. Defensively, the Juniatians performed with excellance. Skinny Norris, Dan Ereditario, and Bob Devine all snagged interceptions; Norris, however, getting bumb raps from the officials on two interference calls. Joe Kershishnik, Barry Hartley and Steve Lehman incessantly sacked and humiliated the Frostburg field general; and the trio together compiled 28 tackles; Hartley leading with twelve.

Offensively, the Mt. Carmel duo of Lentini and DeFrancesco aced one again; Carmen raced for over 100 yards, and broke the 500 yard mark for the season, while Lentini racked-up 48 yards in only three receptions. Madey, Long, Rossi, and Sypola all broke downfield on dashes blasts, pitch-outs, and receptions to augment the offensive attack. And of course Magley, the dynamic little guy under center, exploded with passes, rushes, and fine plays the entire 60 minutes.

Runners Close Season; Finish Third In MAC's

by Barry Eppley

The Juniata Cross-Country team, performing as it has all season, finished third in the 19th annual Middle Atlantic Cross-Country Championship held last Saturday at Philadelphia's Belmont Plateau Course. This performance equalled the team's highest finish in its history, as they were also third in 1959.

Perhaps it was the accomodations that accounted for such a fine performance, as the team checked into Philadelphia's Marriot Hotel along with the Jackson Five and the Washington Redskin's football team. But whatever it was, the team let loose the day after,as Greg Ransom led the way for the Indians finishing 7th, one notch up from last's year 8th place finish. Close behind Ransom, was Jack McCullough placing 11th, substantially improving last year's 39th place finish. Paul Wilson trailed Jack just by seconds grabbing 13th. Along with Bill Kibler's 18th and Steve Hooper's 27th, the team had a total of 76 points, succumbing only to Gettysburg's 48 and Widener's 63. This was just a great team effort as they improved over last year's total of 118. This marks an improvement of 42 points, an admirable accomplishment.

Juniata also placed first in the JV competition, which is comprised of schools from the now defunct MAC University division. Doug Crosby and Dave Quig finished one and two, wrapping up the victory for Juniata.

Looking back in retrospect over the season, I feel that every member of the team deserves sincere congratulations on a season well performed, compiling an impressive 9-2 record and a third in the MAC's. Also Coaches Carl Meditch and Dr. Mitchell should be very proud and pleased as I'm sure they are and should be. Their job speaks for itself in the team's performance.

Every team after a season completed looks what is in store for the future. However, for now I would sit down and look in the past. New Year is next year. Now is the time to be proud of yesterday.

Juniata's Newborn Ruggers Complete First Season, 4-2!

by Charles Lerman

On Saturday, Nov. 2, the steadily improving Juniata Rugby Club's A team upset a more experienced but injury riddled Susquehanna side by a score of 10-3.

The scoring opened early in the first half with a drop-kicked goal for Juniata by scrum half Alan Kulp following a line-out about 15 yards from the Susquehanna goal line. Juniata added a try a few minutes later when George Kourakin and Bob Barth frustrated the Susquehanna backs' attempts to field a kick in their own in-goal. The score was officially awarded to Kourakin. Susquehanna kicked a penalty goal late in the half to bring the score to 7-3.

The initially disorganized Susquehanna effort gelled in the second half, but the Juniata ruggers were able to keep the Crusaders away from the goal line with a persistent kicking game and dogged pursuit of loose balls. An offsides by Susquehanna with about 15 minutes remaining in the game allowed Alan Kulp to make an easy penalty goal to complete the day's scoring.

Key factors in Juniata's win were the much improved passing by the backs and more aggressive pursuit of the ball by the forwards than had been shown in previous outings. The timely and well-placed kicks of outside center Steve Roth and fullback Rick Jager kept Susquehanna at a positional disadvantage for much of the game. Hard tackling by Steve Shultis and Jim Kistler helped to shatter the timing of the Susquehanna attack, which also suffered from the loss of two key backs who had been injured in their previous week's hard-fought scoreless tie with Bucknell.

Following its successful demonstration at the halftime of the Parents' Day football game, the club awaited its season finale on Nov. 10 against Indiana University of Pennsylvania. The Indiana club, however, facing injury and scheduling difficulties, phoned at the last minute to say that they could not muster enough players for a game. In place of the final match, the Juniata ruggers staged an intra-squad game for the large Parents' Weekend audience. The Blue and Gold teams struggled evenly for about three quarters, until the Blue team scored several quick tries to put the game out of reach. The final score was 35-9. The game was marred by shoulder separations suffered by Chris Barr anf Tom Metz. The running and kicking of Alan Kulp and Skip Hartman and the aggressive line-out play of prop Greg Stoyer highlighted this final fall appearance of the club as they had the whole season.

Although this initial Rugby season was mostly devoted to familiarizing the players with the game, the club compiled a 4-2 record. In the last two weeks of the season, the players began to acquire some offensive finesse to go with their defensive strength. The Rugby Club will begin practices for its spring season in March, and, with a nucleus of experience to draw on, should produce much more accomplished teams in the future. The club would like to emphasize, however, that newcomers are always welcome and will be patiently taught the game.

Winners On Two Wheels

BY John Knouse

The first Annual Juniata College Bicycle Race took place this past Sunday afternoon. The race took place on a course approximately fifteen miles long that ran up Cold Springs Road, up on Warrior Ridge, and back on the Petersburg Pike. Parts of the course were fairly strenuous, separating the first and last place racers by more than twenty minutes.

Scott MacMillin captured first place, John Diehl second. Dave Kraft placed third, with Jim Masood and John Gray tying for fourth. John Dalesandro finished in sixth place. Also participating were Jim Diehl, Dan Harrah, Mike Kuntz, Mile Molesevich, Mark Van Laeys, and Lee Young.

Special thanks go to JoAnn Cotillo and her publicity committee for making the signs on the route. Also, thanks to Chief and Dan from Lancaster, Scott MacMillin, Sally Pennington, Ron Honeywell, and two other students who timed and recorded the finish, whose names I don't know.

Women's Roles

the system like a man would do. Ms. Smith also felt very strongly that they should earn their positions.. She was completely against the quota system. The last division Ms. Smith talked about was that of politics. She felt very strongly that we need more young people in politics. Ms. Smith also mentioned that if woman want to get involved in politics they must be qualified. She mentioned that if there is a man and a woman running you would vote for the best candidate.

When Ms. Smith was asked about her treatment in the Senate she said that she hadn't seen any discrimination in the Senate but she thought she might have ignored it. Ms. Smith felt that her treatment was equal not because of equal rights for woman but due to the seniority system in the Senate. Ms. Smith also believes that her objective of good government was a common belief of all the Senators and that is one reason they worked together.

In ending Ms. Smith felt that women had made great progress and that women owe a lot to all the women that have worked through the years to get women where they are today. She said that it will take time, a good number of years for women to excell but they will in the long run because they are good workers, good with details and very efficient. Ms. Smith said that woman should not try to take over the world over night. We must also be careful that the woman who do get good positions are qualified and earned them because if they don't do the job they will really hurt the woman's movement.

member, these guys know the ins and outs of music unlike a lot of the top ten garbage groups like BTO on the Spinners. "Luxery," "If You Can't Rock Me," "Dance Little Sister," and "Short and Curlies" are great decadent songs that make you want to get up and prance around like Mick Jagger which is swell if nobody's around. "Short and Curlies" is their common song about a bitchy broad which kind of makes me smile. Their version of "Ain't Too Proud to Beg" has Stone strength even if it ain't as smooth as the Motown copy. The real downfall of this LP is "If you really want to be my friend." Mick gives us a lesson on how to be his friend and treat his delicate nature. It's slow and dismal and the background vocals by Blue Magic make the whole song complete trash.

The title song, "It's Only Rock'n Roll," which everybody's heard just about sums up the Stone's philosophy of their music. The Stones are there to play their balls off for you baby, but they aren't gods. Mick cuts up the sometimes terrifying enthusiasm of Stone fans asking if we would like to see him cut open his guts for us. Maybe Alice Cooper fans could dig it. The song is straight on Stones rock with Taylor's fantastic lead and Jagger's cutting vocals, the rest of the band backing it up beautifully. Richard's vocals also highlight Jagger's pleading and spitting words nicely. Some people may say the Stones are getting too old to put together music but this album still has the old zip that we all know and love. After all, it's only rock'n roll, but I like it.

Notes On The Joys Of Vacations

by Steve Townsend

By the time those Thanksgiving and Christmas breaks roll around, in fact by the time any break comes up, this boy is quite ready. Not that College life is all that bad, it's just that a week or so of frittering life away can be so goddamn pleasant.

On second thought, invigorating seems to be much more descriptive. Like it or not, College has a tendency to polish one up with a kind of elitist spit shine that after a few weeks just itches to get scuffed. And, as any pair of mellowed shoes can tell you, there's nothing better for getting scuffy than draging your toes through the course life.

Of course, for developing these ragged edges, a good pad is of supreme priority. Now we're not talking about a one-hundred and twenty dollar a month, four room apartment; a good environment consists of nothing less than an out of the way shack that your best friends rent, run down, and keep filled with enough bad beer to give every volunteer fireman in the county a chronic case of the shits. Never mind what those four or five cases of Bargain Brand Beer will do to your own digestive track, you'll recover, just keep in mind that aura of rude arrogance that you'll carry back to Juniata.

Through the mounding filth and swillish beer do wonders for the atmosphere, it is the slovenly lifestyle that is responsible for the vacation's wonderfully irresponsible memories. For instance, I'll never be able to forget the sound of Channel 2's test pattern droning on and on because none of us really felt like doing anything about it. And of course the feeling of knowing that you don't have to comb your hair, shave your face, or even change yours jeans is definitely one to look forward to. But unless one is terminally ill or vitamin deficient it is highly unlikely that at least a few inspirational whims won't bubble to the surface. In more cases than not these whims will orginate from the stomach, and thanks to America's mobile culture, the pangs of hunger present the vacationing student with some wonderful opportunities.

Nothing does a better job of simultaneously rooting out smug attudes, as well as the munchies, than those glorious all nite truck stops. The first mouthful of scrambled eggs and coffee will probably convince you that no finer meal can be oought at any price. And if you're anything at all like myself, the ruggedly satisfied look on those trucker's faces will probably make you wonder if maybe you hadn't chosen the wrong profession.

Somehow a life of paper shuffling just doesn't hold the excitement of roaring a big Mack down a deserted stretch of Kansas interstate. If one thinks hard he can almost put himself out there on the highway. The radio is blaring out a mixture of white noise and country music. You're kind of anxious to roll into that diner/motel just across the Colorado line. Its been about six weks since you've seen a little waitress who works nites and your mind drifts off to thoughts of her. In response you let the rig climb to eighty-five and start cutting darkness a litte faster.

But no matter how rewarding the trucker fantasies and good times with buddies prove to be, no serious vacation is complete without a little contact and response from the opposite sex. After all, man does not live by bread alone, so when the hormones get too frisky it's always a fun idea to ring up your favorite girl and find out if she's in the mood for breaking the seal on a Trojan. Chances are good she was just about to call you.

The New Year Celebration— Chinese vs. American Style

by Rosemary Tai

In a few days we'll be celebrating Christmas followed by the New Year of 1975. But for the Chinese people, it will not be celebrated until early February by calculation using the Chinese Lunar calendar. This will be the 64th year of the Republic of China and also 4673th year of the Chinese Lunar calendar. The Chinese use animal symbols which could be mythical, wild or domestic to represent each year— a 12 year cycle. This is the Year of the Rabbit. Its purpose is like the Western zodiac to indicate what kind of person or what type of year the individual will experience. Since most of us are born between the years 1952-1955, the following paragraphs are characteristics of those born in these years.

1952—DRAGON—
Energetic, short temper, stubborn, sensitive, honest, brave, and trustworthy. Sincere in what they say and their opinions are valid. Will marry early or not at all.
Compatible: Rat, Snake, Monkey, Cock

1953—SNAKE—
Speak little, possess great wisdom. Financially fortunate, have sympathy for others and help the less fortunate. Often vain, selfish and a bit stingy. Doubt other people's judgement and prefers to rely on themselves. Determined in whatever they do, and hate to fail. Usually good-looking but often have marital troubles because of fickleness.
Compatible: Ox, Cock

1954—HORSE—
Popular and cheerful. Tend to talk too much, but are wise, talented, good with hands, sometimes too showy in dress or manner. Weak toward opposite sex. Like entertainment and large crowds.
Compatible: Tiger, Dog, Sheep

1955—SHEEP—
Elegant and highly accomplished in arts. Shy, puzzle toward life. Involved in religion and clumsy in speech. Passionate in what they do and believe in.
Compatible: Rabbit, Boar, Horse

The Chinese New Year is a much more joyous and more colorful celebration than the American one. It is a time of happiness and time for renewal of friendship. The schools and businesses are usually closed for several days. On New Year's Eve, the family gathers together for their dinner and afterward to the open-market. Many items are sold at the fair such as the good-luck blossoming cherry thee which can be bought to decorate the house. then at midnight, it is highlighted with the display of firecrackers.

For the beginning of the New Year, all debts are paid (even though this often means borrowing from someone else to pay it off.) Then there is the renewal of friendship where relatives and friends visit each other to bring each other up to date. The children are often taken along especially to married couples' homes. The children often receive a red envelope on this day. Inside the envelope the children would find some spending money. Sometimes a child can accumulate up to fifty dollars or more on this special occassion. The Chinese people can be very generous. During the visits, many delicious delicacies such as candies, cookies, nuts, etc. are served. This is the time to enjoy yourself. MERRY CHRISTMAS!

"Merry-making" Now and Then

by Jon Streich

As Christmas 1974 approaches, I thought it was appropriate to consider a speck of the history of the first celebration of Christmas. Records of this first celebration are not too clear, though it is apparent that it was first celebrated in Rome, in 336 A.D. December 25th is the winter solstice, that is, the day when the hours of light begin to increase. "Pagans" used to celebrate the birth of the unconquered sun on this date. Since there was no official celebration of the birth of Jesus, the Catholic Church, whose headquarters in the West were located in Rome, decided to transform this holiday into the celebration of the birth of the Sun of Righteousness. It is recorded that this festival was observed in Constantinople (the Church's headquarters in the East) in 380 A.D.that is basically all it was: celebrating Jesus' birth.

As the years went by, several other customs were added. One of these customs was the giving of presents which had its origin long ago and was observed during December 17-24. This, of course, also entailed some "merry making", some of which we took part in this past weekend! Of course, merry making isn't bad; surely good. But this Christmas, again, lets continue to celebrate the Sun's birth! Merry Christmas!

Something to Strive for A Meaningful Christmas

by Courtnaye Byron Rhone

Once again another joyous Christmas Season is upon us. For many, we can't wait to get home and begin the last minute shopping migration as usual, and being among the phenomenal holiday crowds, and racing to find that certain gift for some one very special gives us that added measure of the holiday spirit. All the stores and towns are bedecked with the sign of Christmas. The neighbors are all decorating their homes in the grandest commercial lighting fineries to see who has the most elaborate display, and some towns go through the ritual of giving a prize for the most grandiose bit of meretricious ornamentation that an individual can create. WHO SAYS THERE IS AN ENERGY CRISIS! Finally on that eventful anticlimactic day we gather 'round the tree to see what the folks bought for us, and to see whose gifts are most expensive, bigger or best (not necessarily in that order). Somehow I think we've forgotten what kind of real meaning the event of Christmas is to have in our complex society, a society that supposedly puts emphasis on the teachings of a Christian heritage. I dare say we've made a mockery of Christmas.

Indeed all is comfortable, safe and warm where we are, but somewhere in the world, someone is cold. While we are feeling young and healthy, someone is old and dying, and when our stomachs are full, indeed , many are hungry. At this holiday season when family and friends all surround us with love and laughter, someone is lonely and homeless. We too should remember that somewhere in the world people are weak, and while we can speak our minds, others are silenced.

The threat of inflation, as we now call it. to avoid the harsh. stringent word of recession, has already hit many American homes, and the holiday season might lose some of the traditional razzle-dazzle, to awaken many to the severe realities of life.

Also as those of us in our generation pursue our careers, we face a very uncertain future as we the products of the postwar baby boom prepare to invade an already burdened labor market. Even under such conditions, I still tend to be very optimistic, if not a diehard idealist.

Indeed, for this holiday season we are obligated to look very introspectively at ourselves, and those less fortunate than ourselves. We need to look intensely at the problems that our daily lives bring either into our own lives, or the lives of people far and near. Though the world takes on an entirely new kaleidoscope of color and serenity, all is still not yet perfected. For after the holiday season, we will again come to total grips with the world and those who do not yet know the meaning of peace and freedom, and those who do not know what it is not to hunger, to those who do not know the meaning of a home, and family. As we take leave of our holiday festivites after the New Year begins, let us give just one moment of silence for all that we love and cherish, and put forth a very positive hope for greater understanding and concern for all mankind. What better time to truly wish on earth, peace, good will toward men? Let's have a bit of the true meaning of Christmas all during the year. I believe man has the potential to make the world work. Let us rejoice in this good news of Christmas, but let us too be aware of the sign of the times.

Juniata Makes Known Plans For A New Social Program

June Cramer

Anyone planning to concentrate his or her program in sociology should be aware of a new possibility in Division II. Prof. Bob Reilly, who is new this year, is working on a program of social work. As people who have had sociology courses know, there are many generalizations made, and many theories offered. But there is one important variable missing, and that is practical application. It is fine to take sociology courses, but if you really plan to work with people, an isolated class situation is not enough.

This new program would have five curriculum areas. The first area would be traditional psychology and sociology courses. The second would be Research Methods. The third area would deal with the social welfare policy. This includes two new courses: Social Problems and Social Welfare, which is being offered this term, and Social Policy, which will be offered Spring term. The fourth area will deal with practice. These include Micro-Practice, including teaching skills, case work and group work, and Macro-Practice, which deals with community organization. The fifth area will be a field experience to allow the student to work in the social field that he or she is interested in.

This program should be accaccredite by the Council on Social Work Education by Spring of '76, thus allowing the student to graduate with a BSW. Eventually, we could be linked with a graduate school where the student could go for a year after Juniata and receive a MSW.

Also, it is of major importance that students graduating with a B. S. W. usually start out at salaries that are substantially higher than those graduates with degrees in Psychology or Sociology. If anyone is interested in pursuing a new field here at Juniata, please see Bob Reilly in Good Hall.

Dear President Stauffer,

With regards to the Brethren Colleges Abroad program at Juniata, I would like to share my views with you.

I have been told by more than one person that, unfortunately, the administration at Juniata is contemplating withdrawing from the BCA program. I believe that I am in an excellent position to coment on that.

One of the goals of the new program at Juniata is, if I am correct, to help students analyze the strong and the weak points of the American educational system. As one of the ten tutors for Modes of Thought last year, I attempted to help students to look at the system objectively. I also attempted to help the student look at himself. The trouble with that is that the student is being told to look at the system and himself while remaining within the system itself. I believe that it's only leaving the system and living in another culture that one can make an objective evaluation, if at all. The BCA program offers the student an excellent opportunity to experience the world outside south-central Pennsylvania.

To deny even one student the invaluable experience that is to be gained here would be a gross mistake. I personnally have learned more here in ten weeks, not only of course about German and Germany, but also about America and myself, than I would have learned in a lifetime at Huntingdon, Pa., and Cumberland, Md. I have no idea how much money Juniata contributes to the BCA program. I firmly believe that money spent on the BCA program is money well spent. Without a doubt, money is better spent on this program than on such frivolous trivialities as lighted tennis courts or on an inter-campus telephone system.

Not only does the BCA program cost 900 dollars less than full tuition, room and board at Juniata, it offers the student the opportunity to experience a totally different lifestyle. If the Juniata administration was genuinely concerned about its students, there would be absolutely no question: Juniata would support the BCA program.

Sincerely,
David MacVeigh

To the editor of the Juniatian:

I would like to respond to the letter from David MacVeigh about the BCA program.

I share the concern about the importance of study abroad. If it were possible I would urge every student to plan his liberal arts program to include an extended experience in a culture other than his own. From my own personal experience in Marburg several years ago, I know how enjoyable and enriching it can be. It is not only the most effective way to learn another language, it also enables one to get a much more accurate picture of himself and the world he lives in.

It is true that the expense of the program and recent low enrollment figures for BCA have raised serious questions about our ability to continue to support it. Last summer and this fall several lengthy consultations have been held to determine whether the program can be operated more economically and whether the program can be operated more economically and whether it should be revised to include other kinds of study abroad opportunities. This review is still under way. In a month or so I expect that some decisions will be made by the cooperating colleges as to the future of these plans. Given the economic stringency of the times in which we live, these will not be easy decisions to make. My guess is, however, that the outcome will depend primarily on whether there is an adequate number of students participating in BCA.

I should say, finally, that in my conversations with faculty and administrators from the other cooperating colleges, I found extensive interest in study abroad and a concern to continue the BCA program if at all possible. If a viable way can be found for the cooperating colleges to continue this program, it will be done.

Sincerely,
Robert E. Wagoner

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Rick Kann, Roger Koon, and I have been here for ten weeks. Speaking for myself (though probably for the others too) I must say that these have been the best ten weeks of my life.

A little about life at a German university, with 12,000 students instead of 1,200: Most of the BCA students are housed in a cluster of 7 dorms. Two live adjacent to the local castle. Since the Mensa (cafeteria) offers only the noon meal, the kitchens that are on each floor of each dorm are the focal points. Everyone's got to eat sometime, right? On my floor, the students are a closely-knit bunch. We do lots of things together—have parties, go out once in a while, play soccer, etc. The rooms are singles, with several exceptions per floor. One exception on my floor is 2 guys and a girl living in a room built for one! Co-ed dorms, and we share the same bathroom facilities. 28 live on my floor, which is divided into two wings. Of course, there are no such things as Visitation hours, RA's, no-beer-in-your-room, etc. While I must admit that things were relatively free at JC, there is just no comparison between the two schools. Everything here is much more relaxed.

It may be just this relaxed atmosphere that is responsible for the differences between German students and American students. They don't worry about "what courses I have to take." If something looks interesting, they drop in on it. If it turns out to be not too cool, they drop it and take something else. they have what could be best described as a 2-week trial period at the start of each semester, without all the hassle of computer-form-registration, dropping, hour and a half waiting line to buy books, etc. And what's really cool is that higher-semester students advise other students about various courses, profs, etc. And when the student is in a course, the prof passes around a sign-up sheet—and that's all there is to registration. None of this pre-registration, get two advisors who you see only to get their signatures, wait 3 hours in line just to find out that the course is already filled up.

The Germans are basically very easy-going. They go out of their way for you. You go home for a weekend with them. They drive you to class, thereby sparing your precious body the half-hour walk. They give you a beer. They are super-patient when you first get to Germany and can't even carry on an intelligent conversation with a 3-year old. They introduce you to a lot of people you'd never introduce yourself to. They'll always help you in the few moments that you've got to book it. They don't wait till the weekends to have parties. They don't smoke dope.

If this sounds a little screwed up— tough. I can't help it. It's time for me to go out and burn, I mean cook, my bratwurst for dinner. If anyone is curious about the BCA program, talk to Prof. Jaeger or Dolnikowski, or any of the people that were here last year. Or me. I'm at Franz-lambert-Haus 328, 355 Marburg/Lahn, Geschw.- Scholl-Str. 3, German Federal Republic. By the way, I paid 900 bucks less than I would have at JC, and that includes transportation. So, till later, as the Germans would say: Tschub!

Dave MacVeigh

P.S.: The article of about a month ago written by last year's Marburgers is now proudly displayed in FLH's kitchen.

Dear Miss Blum,

When I saw the title of your article I immediately read it, as I am sure most of the other men on this campus did, because it involves a subject very important to all of us, women. I was hoping that you had solved the $64 million question: why Juniata College can't seem to get any female applicants? As I quickly scanned your article, however, I was shocked back to reality. No, you didn't have any earth shattering ideas that would turn Juniata College from a predominantly hogger & snob haven to a home for beautiful women. In fact, you didn't have any new ideas at all. You took three whole sentences to tell us that a Home Economics course could solve our problem, when the administration informed us last Spring that they were examining the possibility of a Home Economics program in the near future, and then you leveled a blast at the school. Not one of your points about: dating, girls' athletic programs, or the girls' gym has any bearing on incoming freshmen girls.

This letter is designed to be a criticism of your argument and several comments that are made in your article. Since I've tried to write this letter with some semblance of continuity and have failed miserably everytime, I'll cover each section of your letter in individual paragraphs.

First of all, I'd like to discuss that quote that "the guys here are all messed up and have acne." Apparently the majority of the women on this campus haven't taken a look around lately, or they'd have noticed that most men here don't have acne. Now as I sit here and try to think why girls haven't noticed this fact, only one reason comes to mind. This is that the majority of the girls here on this campus have their noses so high in the air that all they can see is the acne on their own noses. They all think they are God's gift to man, and this makes them too good for the average student. Thus, they constantly look to the heavens for that perfect man. In my opinion our snobbish girls cost us more freshmen girls than the few men on campus with acne. These prospective freshmen, who aren't used to acting snobbishly, don't think they can live four years with these effete snobs without being changed for the worse, so they go to other colleges where they can live in a friendlier enviroment.

Miss Blum, the above is the main cause of your second complaint, that girls don't get any dates. Who wants to take out two nostrils when he can sit at home and get drunk for less money and perhaps have just as good a time shooting the bull? Perhaps, if the girls on campus would lower their noses and smile—I know this will be tough, but try hard — maybe, just maybe, they'll get a date. For some girls, however, the situation is hopeless and the beer can will win, so they might as well remain snobs.

Now that I've got that off my mind I only have one more question about this lack of dating. How do prospective girls know that girls here don't get any dates? Is it in the catalogue? Is it just that obvious? I tend to doubt that they ask upperclass girls when the last time was they had a date. So how does this fact keep girls from coming here?

How our girls' athletic progra... keeps girls away I'll never know. With tennis, basketball, and hockey, we offer as many, if not more, girls' athletic teams for a school our size, than any around. Thirty percent of our total athletic program is offered to twenty-five percent of our population, females. I really don't see what more you could ask for. When you start complaining about support for these teams I again fail to see your point. Last year on several occasions the girls' basketball team outdrew the men's team. As for why the pep band doesn't play at girls' athletic events, I don't know. Why not ask its director? Perhaps no one ever asked him to bring the band to the games. If you want the cheerleaders, why not ask them to come? That's a women's organization. I'd think they'd be glad to come to these athletic events. The publicity of these events is excellent in my opinion. In almost every case, the articles about girls' teams are larger, more informative, and better written. What more can you ask for?

The line in your article that really gets me, however, is the one about the girls' gym. I was under the impression that that was the name they gave the gym and it wasn't strictly for women, nor the Memorial gym strictly for men. I can't remember ever seeing a sign above the doors at Memorial gym that said "Men Only." Why if I'm not mistaken there's even a girls' lockerroom in it. Truly there must be some confusion. Perhaps there is a sign over the door that only our snobbish girls, with their eyes constantly towards the heavens, can see, and all the girls I see in there playing volleyball and the girls' lockerroom are just mirages. I don't think I'll mention the fact that I've never seen a girl doing anything in the girls' gym. That's not important. Now seriously, I'm sure that when prospective freshmen are shown the Memorial gym, in their tour around campus, they are told that it is for all students.

Well that's about it for me; these have been a few helpful criticisms and comments presented in the community interest.

Lester Himmelreich

It's no secret that our food service serves us lousy food but I doubt that everyone knows how earger they are to shut people out and refuse them food. There have been times when both the lobby' clock and the clock in the line read 6:30 and the door was locked and students were hassled. And if at 6:30 there is plenty of food left in the line they will still refuse to allow you to eat.

The only way you can succeed in feasting on the food services' delicacies is if another student lets you in or if you sneak in. In either case the women behind the counter will be sure to hassle you.

Dear Editor,

Why is it that the students of Juniata College pay a sum of $3800 a year but the organizational budgets are being cut. As students, we have the right to know how our tuition is being distributed. We have been slighted some of the best concerts and other social activities because of the decreased budget. We are told we don't have any money for any elaborate activity. Let us, the people who pay room and board here be decently entertained. It's understood that Center Board is not responsible but then who is, and where is our money going?

Toni Biggs

Dear Friends,

Alittle more than a month ago the loss of my mother and two sisters were before me. These losses were not of ordinary circumstances, but you, the students, faculty, administration and alumnus of Juniata College came to my aid in extraordinary forces. It is through you I find the direction and strength to do the things that call to my fullest attention at this time.

On behalf of the Cordova family and relatives I would like to thank everyone who gave or expressed their deepest sympathies. A special thanks to Carl Glaeser, Greg Ransom and Don Williams, founders of the Cordova fund and to President Stauffer who gave much in time and was there when needed.

Many told me that they knew not what to say to express their deepest feelings. I now share that position. Enough can't be said in gratitude.

In great thanks,
W. Stephen Cordova

Brad Rudy on Kubrick and Fellini

by Brad Rudy

I have several things on my mind this week, so I trust you'll pardon me if I tend to ramble on and on and on and. . .

First of all, this term's film series. On my handouts, I very superficially described how I thought Fellini and Kubrick related, but I very tactfully ignored a more basic issue —why bother with them altogether? What is my rationale for spending so much of your money on them? Basically, I'm working with the premises that (1) all films, "art" or "trash," have as one primary aim, to entertain, and that (2) there is a great world of cinema outside our 1970's American microcosm and it is the duty of our committee to let you experience it. I felt that by relating these "outside" films to those that are recognizable and enjoyable, one can be entertained first by familiar elements in them, and, then, by gradually coming to appreciate them on their own virtues. One can then come to a basic enjoyment of the unfimiliar films and a heightened enjoyment of the familiar.

The first problem, then, was to find an American director who was both popular and who also could control his pictures to the extent that recurring themes and stylistics could be identified. Stanley Kubrick is current and popular, and he has more control over his films than perhaps any commercial director in the country. The specific choices were simple within themselves, as he has not made too many. The only important films not included in the series were "2001" and "Spartacus," the first because it's unavailable to us this year, and the second because Kubrick took over after it was started (thereby losing much control of it).

The biggest hassels, then, came with Fellini. I started the term with his earlier films, because his later work is virtually impossible for the uninitiated audience. These early works, particularly the so-called "trilogy of solitude," while quite complex in their visual imagery and characterizations, are quite easy to follow, and are usually very moving. (After all, "Nights of Cabiria" was made into "Sweet Charity" which probably the schmaltziest musical ever made.) By the time we get to "8½," then, we should have experienced enough Fellini to at least follow the subtle (and sometimes not-so-subtle) shifts of perception in that most complex work and its "female counterpart," "Juliet of the Spirits." Also, once you have experienced "8½," you will be able to look back on the earlier films and recognize peculiarly Felliniesque characteristics you may have missed earlier.

Moving on to bigger and better topics, now, I'd like to pass on some experiences I had with movies over Thanksgiving which made me more or less re-evaluate the position of the film critic. The two films (among others) which brought about this cataclysmic cerebration were "The Trial of Billy Jack" and "Going Places." The second was obviously the better film, with a more controled plot, subtler camera work, tighter editing, and more "content control" than "effect control" as in the first. Yet I enjoyed "Trial" much, much more, despite its ultra-dogmatic preaching, its meandering plot line, and its inconsistent and sketchily motivated characters. My reaction subjectively made the difference. The propagandizing in "Trial" was something I could readily identify with (for reasons known not even to the wise) and the "scenes for effect only" (such as the climatic shoot-out) worked for me. In "GP," however, I found the characters throughly despicable, as I am sure they were intended. But this ruined it for me. They were so uniquely nauseating that I had problems getting involved empathetically with them (if indeed I ever did).

Most critics would probably kill both films, one for technical inefficiency, the other for empathetic deficiencies. Most would even fail to indicate what it was about the film that revolted them so. Seeing and reacting to these films made me ponder whether the critic's job is to pass value judgements on entire films (these two I'd hate to review on these terms for obvious reasons) or, to judge the effectiveness of the film in what it tries to do, to perhaps identify the intended audience of the film, or even to assist the "consummer" in entering the "intended audience" range, explaining how to watch the film. For example, you wouldn't watch "Deep Throat," "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," or "The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie" in the same frame of mind, yet you could enjoy all three equally. I realize this would cause the

by Brian Smith

In recent weeks I have become increasingly aware of the numerous complaints students have about the medical facilities available at J. C. Blair Hospital. With this in mind I set out to see if some of these complaints were justified.

The first complaint came from a student who, after having been here for about four weeks, was inflicted wiith appendicitis. His story: One night he came down with moderate stomache pains. A friend consequently took him up to the J. C. Blair emergency ward only to have the pains diagnosed as a stomach virus. After the pains persisted all through the next day he was again taken to the emergency ward, this time with the pains throughout his abdomen. He was goiven a blood test, with the results showing a high white blood cell count which indicates an infection of some sort. But this evidence prompted no action from the staff so he was sent home without any further treatment. the third night came around and it was back up to the hospital for the student. At this time he almost passed-out in the waiting room. The only action taken was in the way of giving the student a pain killer.

The fourth night is the night when they finally caught it. The cause of the pain was finally diagnosed as appendicitis so he was taken up for an emergency appendectomy. When asked if the appendix had ruptured the hospital replied that it had ruptured on the operating table just after it had been taken out. If the appendix had ruptured within the body, a condition called peritonitis would have resulted. Peritonitis is the spread of a poisonous infection throughout the body after an appendix has ruptured. This condition, unless caught right away is usually fatal.

Acording to the student, the operative and post-operative proceedure was excellent. Once the problem was diagnosed the hospital was able to handle the almost ruptured appendix quite well. Their only problem was in being able to diagnose the problem.

Another case is of a student who went up to the emergency ward this year with a separated shoulder. The examining doctor gave the student a pain killer and sent him off to have his shoulder X-rayed. Upon examining the X-ray results the doctor put the student's arm in a sling and told him to keep it that way for three to six weeks until it healed itself. But when the student went home he had his home doctor look at the shoulder who found that his patient had several torn ligaments and torn cartilage. The student was then informed that an operation to place a pin in his shoulder was necessary as soon as possible. Had this operation not been performed the student would have lost a fair amount of mobility in his arm and shoulder for the rest of his life.

I found several other cases to have valid complaints also. One such case was when a student went up to the emergency ward with a possible broken ankle. It was swollen to about twice it's normal size. This person was told to walk, on a pair of crutches he borrowed from a friend, from the examining room to the X-ray room and back to the waiting room. It is usually customary in hospitals to issue wheelchairs to the patients in the case of any broken bone. In another case a student was being picked up by an ambulance for a severe pulled muscle in his back. When the ambulance crew picked him up they used their hands instead of a rigid object. After consulting some rules for first aid, I have found that using a rigid object is the best way.

All of the complaints I have heretofore cited in this article I believe are valid complaints and have witnesses to them. Also they have all occurred between the time of September and the printing of this paper. As a conclusion, I would say there is a definite problem in the

by A Concerned Freshman

Although the freshmen have only been here a few months, most of them have either found their "niche" at Juniata, transferred, or dropped out by now. This brings us to a common grievance some of the remaining freshmen have with the system . . . Writing Program II. It is my personal prejudice that the first term program with Modes, Seminar, and Writing Program I was interesting and served a purpose. It gradually introduced the freshmen to "college academic life" and yet provided enough free time for the students to adapt to college social life. But extending Writing Program I over another term seems to be a mistake. When there are so many courses to fit into your program in four years, it seems a waste of the student's time and money to spend a term learning to write a research paper. First of all, most high school English classes teach their students how to write research papers. Second, from what I understand, the upperclassmen are not assigned many research papers during their four years at Juniata. It's not a skill the freshmen will be using extensively. But assuming that it is necessary, why not combine Writing Program I and II in the first term. That way, one research paper would be due first term (Writing Program), and perhaps one second term for seminar. Also, some of the research/write-up techniques might compliment Modes and vice versa. Yes, it might mean some revamping of units and courses, but surely the administration and the Writing Program staff didn't plan on innovating a new program and not changing it when and if the time demanded.

Another problem with Writing Program involves the topic idea. Although having the opportunity to choose topics is great, very few people got their first or second choice of programs. They got closed out in the first half hour of registration. If it's so important that the freshmen spend a whole term on research papers, they should at least be able to get into the class they want.

Although the freshmen do not expect a change of program this term, they would appreciate the Writing Program staff taking these suggestions into consideration. If educational institutions are really concerned with encouraging students to search for truth and knowledge, they should never stop searching for the best way to educate.

Student Gov't Happenings

by Stephen Cordova

The Credilability Amendment (Impeachment procedures and impeachable offense) has been drawn up and finalized. The next move is for the amendment to be passed by the Senate. The amendment contains a few wrinkles that will be ironed out, however Senate approval is assured. The committee chaired by Mike McElhiney has completed an excellent job and a fine amendment that will make it possible for a member of Student Government to be properly removed if the need arises.

The Used Book sale under the leadership of Jim Messner and Todds Lins has been an overwhelming success. Despite the initial slow response and low projection, the book sale sold over a hundred books and transacted over $200 between buyers and sellers. Much work and time was put into the project, but thanks to a few hard workers it's been deemed a success.

The Student Concern Committee, one of Student Government's more active committees, will be sending out surveys in January to derive the following:

Thank You

My purpose in having this letter printed in the Juniatian is to reach all my friends here at the college who wished me a speedy recovery during my recent illness. This they did by phoning, by writing, by sending me a plant, or even by oral message. In every case it was deeply appreciated. I assure you that, however the message, they all served to give me a mental "lift" knowing I have so many friends. So please accept my personal thanks many times over.

Incidentally, I plan to retire at the end of the month and I want to take this occasion to say that I'll miss good ole Juniata, from its activities to all the people making it a pleasure to work here, which takes in all personnel, including the students here. Thanks for making my stay here a pleasant one—all 19 years worth. Goodbye all!

JC to View 'Civilization'

by E. E. Cherry

For a real audio and visual treat, reserve one hour on Wednesday nights for the rest of this term and the beginning of next. Come at 8:15 to Oller Hall on January 8, Wednesday, for the first segment of Kenneth Clark's "Civilization" series, co-sponsored by Juniata College and the Huntingdon County Arts Council, courtesy of the National Gallery of Art.

After all, no TV screen can compare to the large new movie screen in Oller Hall, and the location, size, color, even texture of the art works shown in this series of thirteen episodes, are spectacular. The back ground music in each segment is as carefully chosen as the visual pieces and is as appropriate to the period under discussion. This is a great, painless, even pleasurable way to be exposed to or learn more about that which is a part of all our lives — Western Civilization.

Living In Eternity's Sunrise Kissing The Joy As It Flies

This article did not appear in the last issue due to lack of space.

by Mike Busch

As the term comes to a close, I think it appropriate to talk about the past and what the present holds for one of us. The great poet William Blake once wrote, "He who binds to himself a joy does the winged life destroy; But he who kisses the joy as it flies lives in eternity's sunrise."

How true these words are for some of our lives. So very often we try to hold on to the past, the past experiences, loves, and close friendships that have meant so much to us. We squeeze them until, having tried so hard to keep them as they once were, we discover that all we have is an empty shell of something that once had so much meaning and even that collapses in our grasp.

How often this is true of friendships. Maybe we have had some deep and meaningful friendships in our past. The kind of friends, that while we were going to school or were in another place or time, were the people we could be ourselves with, honest and trusting.

Then through time and distance we only saw these friends on occasion but for some hard-to-explain reason, could never seem to pick up where we left off. We remember such friendships and the time they were, in all reality, over. We try to cling to the meaning that they once had, hoping to find in our memory and occasional meetings the significant encounters we had that we so desperately needed. What we discover by changing to these old, once very beautiful friendships, is that we avoid establishing new and deep friendships with people, whom we need and who need us. I discovered that dwelling on these memories caused great amounts of hurt and distress. The results were negative in my social and scholastic activities. Not only did I see an empty shell in past relationships but also built walls around myself for present relationships.

It seems that people in this situation tend not to be themselves and as a result others get a wrong impression of what they're really like. In many ways what I've said all relates to school work, too. If one concentrates on the A's of this term (or the E's as the case may be) and dwells on those successes or failures, it detracts from proceeding forth and accomplishing new and better goals. We should learn from past experiences and concentrate on the present.

So what am I trying to say? I guess I'm trying to convey a message to you, the reader, to enjoy living by just being yourself and learning but not dwelling on the past successes or failures. If only we could "kiss the joy as it flies" and be forever living in "eternity's sunrise!"

Solution For The Inner City A Different Look At School

by Chip Lovett

When I attended elementary school, I remember how nervous I would get when report cards were handed out at the end of the school year. I also remember how my friends and I would share our report cards, to see if we all got promoted. Most of my classmates were promoted, but there were those who were not promoted and never graduated from high school. There were those who ignored the teasing and ridicule of being left back one year behind. They graduated. However, the ones who never made it (the drop-outs) and those who stayed in school for thirteen or fourteen years — these are the ones I am concerned with.

This situation may seem funny to some people, but it happened everyday in the inner city school. The purpose of my article is to let Juniata students know, to make them aware of this small but huge problem. I have read many articles and essays on our educational system: How it is, how it should be, but NEVER How it IS.

Some people may not think it is sad, but I do when I find a seventeen- or eighteen-year old, not able to read his or her job application form. Reformers want to change the entire school structure, which I feel is very hard to do. Do we have the money, do we have the teachers, do we have the time? I don't think so. What I am talking about is helping a child to read, write, and do arithmetic, i.e. a child who needs help.

I, on the other hand, understand the disadvantages that inner city schools have. The schools are overcrowded, and it is hard, very hard, to tutor one child with a reading problem when there are forty children in the class. Another problem which often occurs in the ghetto schools is a teacher might take an entire school year to develop a one-to-one relationship with a child. Soon the child's family moves or the child attends another school. Therefore, all is wasted, the child is thrown into another whirlpool and the left-back cycle is begun all over again.

Who's fault is it, and why is it happening? This question has been asked and answered by educationalists many times. However, I feel what is important is that we as people realize that there is a problem and at least try to deal with it.

Whether you know it or not, one day you might live in the inner city and your child might get left behind once or twice. You as a parent might not have the time, but SOMEONE must have the time.

Editorial

by Mike McElhinney & the Juniatian Staff

There seems to be some confusion about what type of newspaper the Juniatian is and consequently, what type of material we will print. The reason for this is because this editorial should have appeared in the first issue, not the ninth.

The staff sees this newspaper as a medium for communication and debate between all elements of the college community. The Juniatian is meant to be a college newspaper, not a student newspaper. In each issue we reserve space to publish letters and articles submitted to us by students, administrators, faculty members, alumni, parents and anyone else who takes time to write.

The intent of this editorial is to encourage anyone to write a letter or submit an article whenever you have something to say. As long as you think there will be one person (excluding the writer) among the 1500 Juniatian readers who will be interested in hearing what you have to say, write and we will be glad to print your work.

by Henry Siedzikowski

Despite the lack of snow, it is becoming apparent that the Christmas season has finally hit the Juniata campus. On a leisurely walk around campus, your eye is drawn to the vast array of colorful decorations that have appeared this year.

While Juniatians are by nature friendly, there seems to be an extra bit of cordiality in the weeks since Thanksgiving. Friends and acquaintances have been gathering to share the high spirits of the season.

Added to this, the basketball team has a new and exciting look this year under their new coach. Sitting in the stands, you can sense the fervor as the crowd involves itself in the game.

All of these niceties seem to fit with the season, but there is a reason behind bringing them out now. This is the perfect time to consider how we can best pull ourselves together for the rest of the academic year. And we have an excellent chance of using the natural harmony of this season as a springboard to a greater sense of community in the future.

One of the key areas where improvement is needed is faculty-student relations. When the new program was instituted, one of the major facets was supposed to be increased interaction between faculty and students in the formation and development of the program of emphasis. Up to now, this has not worked out. Now, however, there are plans to upgrade the counseling role of the faculty. Students can help in this development by utilizing their advisors. You may find it beneficial in the future.

One area that is encouraging is the increasing interest in intramural sports. The winter events seem to have record participants. Also, the winter tournaments seem to be drawing a great deal of interest.

Let me close by wishing everyone a Merry Christmas, and hoping that the new year is always better than the old one.

operation of the emergency services at J. C. Blair. It seems that the problem lies in their apparent inability to diagnose more complex injuries and ailments. By "more complex" I'm referring to the type of injury ailment shown in this article. While I haven't gone deep enough to actually place the blame for this inability, I believe what I have shown is that a further, more in-depth study of the quality of the emergency services at J. C. Blair is justified.

Please, Take Books Along! Give Everybody a Chance

by Bill Brooks

Upon venturing over to the science library on occasions, and most recently a couple weeks ago for a mandatory reading assignment, I witnessed abuses of its facilities that seem to dominate soley at this library and not Beeghly. These abuses linger on because of the eccentric attitudes of those who reap its benefits.

On May 6 while entering the library at 6:30 p.m., I found every desk cluttered with papers and books, but only sixteen actually occupied with students (represents about 40%(. So, any aspiration I had to sit at a desk was suppressed. The only alternative, if I wanted to avoid a confrontation, was to sit at a table, certainly less private than a desk. I'm sure I would have been content to sit at a table if the desks were all occupied, but I was restricted from using library facilities not being utilized. This prepresents an unnecessary inconvenience. Students that use the library's facilities frequently, consistently sit at the same desk and go to the absurd extent of claiming it as his or her own personal property.

The one abuse that irritates me most is the fact that books, periodicals, and abstracts are not reshelved, but remain on the individual's desk for, it seems, indefinite periods of time. I have seen chem abstracts at a particular desk for months that were certainly not being used vehemently. What does this represent? It represents a damn nuisance to you and I. If a source of information was not in its proper place, but remained in the library, we would have to go on a wild goose chase to find the material.

It all boils down to a handful of lazy students who are inconsiderate of others. Does this laziness justify inconveniencing students from using the facilities with supposedly equal opportunity? Remember, the school does not cater specifically to you. There are twelve hundred students on this campus. Beware, a mysterious force may levitate these books back to their designated place.

Hunting, Is It Really All That Bad?

by Perry Habecker

In recent years a small but steadily growing fraction of the U.S. population has been loudly advocating the abolition of hunting and trapping. These misinformed conservationists are perhaps better referred to as preservationists— a term which implies a conservation ideology as oposed to those particular organizations whose sole intent seems to be anti-hunter. The differences between the preservationists and hunters can be mediated, but there can be no middle ground between hunters and anti-hunters.

A look at the issues shows that a sensible argument is made on both sides. In the October 1972 issue of NATIONAL WILDLIFE, Dr. A. Starker Leopold—son of the pioneer of wilderness ecology, Aldo Leopold —was questioned as to the effect of hunting. He responded that it was the sport hunter who has preserved the habitat and protected, by law, the endangered species of wildlife through the desire to maintain huntable game species. However, he also feels that hunters have purchased a disproportionate amount of influence in wildlife management. The hunter is a predator, Dr. Leopold stated. Man must periodically reduce the large-game animals or else they outstrip the food supply and compete for man's food supply. The resultant starvation kills the younger specimens. On the other end of the spectrum, small-game animals would tend towards a stabilized population without hunting pressure to reduce the numbers.

One can sense that the hunter's argument has a slight edge according to today's values—the hunter pays heavily for the privilege to hunt in a manner described and enforced by explicit laws. The preservationist's theory of conservation does not guarantee a healthy wildlife population.

The motivation for hunting is recreational and not survival. the game meat is tasty and relatively inexpensive, though. Hunting is an outdoor activity with a specific purpose; that is, to use one's senses and skills to locate game. It is a form of rugged exercise which often is not deterred by inclement weather. the fringe benefits of seeing rare species of wildlife, beautiful sunrises, or snowy mountain scenes encourage hunters to go out more often. Hunting, unlike most sports, tends to bring people of all ages into a common relationship with no generation gap conflict. More importantly, hunters tend to be first to notice and complain about the fluctuations of the environment in which they hunt.

The preservationist approach of "take only pictures, and leave only footprints," is an admirable alternative to hunting. The preservationist and hunter would each like to have the woods to himself. This is impractical except in the growing number of private preserves. The many armed hunters milling about is disconcerting to a sylvan naturalist. The loud report of a large bore gun is a universal annoyance. The hunters who violate game laws, litter, and abuse the woods and countryside are a dispicable minority of the hunting faction. It is this type of character that precipitates many anti-hunting complaints.

Another troublesome group is the anti-hunter group. This is a group characterized by urbanites unfamiliar with the out-of-doors. These TV trained wildlife experts find the killing of any animal barbaric. To them the solution to this barbarism is simply an end to hunting. Nature's grim solution, overpopulation (starvation, mange, and distemper for example) is rarely depicted on the TV screen. The magic of Walt Disney's wildlife world creates idyllic ecology in the mind of the viewer. This naive, anthropomorphic Bambi syndrome is not unlike animal worship of ancient civilizations, but instead of idolizing a single creature, all wild animals have become sacred.

These extreme sentiments should not be confused with the natural tendency for humans to be sympathetic towards and protective of the creatures in their own backyards. Many people take pride in creating habitat and providing food for wild animals. Hunters have these same emotions, and it displeases them to see animals suffer. Killing the game-animal quickly is a tacit credo of all hunters. On the other hands, the anti-hunting faction has made a valid complaint about the cruelty to bludgeoned seals and ankle trapped furbearers. The fact is, there are more humane ways to kill seals and furbearers.

The extremism of the National Rifle Association and the Friends of Animals is not helping those creatures that are on the edge of existence. Certain species of fish, whales, flowers, and trees need more protection. The importation of exotic animals to be sold for living room zoos increases. Euthanasia is administered to thousands of unwanted pets daily. Feral dogs threaten livestock more than natural predators. Animal by-products such as ivory, aligator leather, jaguar hides, rhinoceros horns, and similar artifacts are still in demand despite many commercial substitutes. There can be no greater travesty to animals than to coerce and cajole them into human-like behavior, chimpanzees for example. It is our culture that threatens wildlife.

The future of hunting is speculative yet predictable. With increasing human expansion, decreasing and polluted habitat, and social problems involving firearms, the pragmatics of the situation indicate that hunting will become an avocation to the wealthy and the large land owners. The hunting public has ensured the survival of the fauna and flora with funds for habitat, management, and law enforcement. It is now the time for the non-hunting and anti-hunting public to purchase a share of influence in wildlife management.

death of the highly valuable (advertisement-wise) four-star rating system, but who's really going to miss it? A Harrisburg area critic gave "Trial" a rating of 2½ stars for film, 4 stars for honest efforts. (You could probably give Hitler's propaganda films 4 stars for honest efforts.) How they have the authority and perceptiveness to differentiate a 2 star film and a 2½ star film, I'll never know.

Oh, well, I've probably bored you to tears already, so I'll bring this to a quick close. "Il Bidone," with Broderick Crawford, will be shown tonight in Alumni Hall. "Paper Moon" will be shown Jan. 6, the day after we return from break, at a bargain-base sale price of $1.00. With it will be shown "Henry 9 to 5" which some of you may remember as the cynical porno short we showed with "Straw Dogs" last year. Oh, well, come and enjoy.

The "Juice" Proclaims, Change Not So Great

by Daryll "Juice" Long

The change from high school to college football is not as great as one may suspect. The last year of high school football is the year when a player tries to do his best. Every game I went out and tried to do the best I could. But it's not at this time that you begin to wonder how well your doing your job. That begins at the end of the year when the time has come for college coaches to talk to you. You may ask a player, any player, if he wants to play football but the answer you get is always not the truth. A high school player usually says he doesn't want to play, this is to convince himself more than anyone else. One can see here that the change is mental, i.e., a feeling of insecurity begins to develop where it never even existed before.

Speaking from a purely personal point of view the change was not as great as I had expected. From the time when I made my decision to come to Juniata to play football, until the first practice,my expectations were erroneous. Although I didn't really know what to expect I thought I was in for a lot of punishment. Not knowing any of the players, and considering myself quite small, I thought I would get beat to death! But once I found I was about the average size, things began to look up. But I was still worried about the other teams we would play.

Well, I guess the biggest change is in your mind and attitude. While in high school you went through the process of coming from the bottom, third string, to the top, first team varity, you must go through it all once again. In high school you had somewhat of an advantage, because some of the other guys weren't very good. But in college everyone out there is just as good, or even better than yourself. So the only change necessary, is the change within your mind.

1) R.A. duties 2) health service 3) why do students leave campus on weekends? R.A's are being interviewed in order to give them the chance to voice their opinions on all aspects of the R.A. system. A survey will be passed out to find out the quality of our health service since the service has undergone a change over from last year. A ne system that evokes around not one doctor but doctors and also a change over in the night nurse. Student Government, under the leadership of the Student Concern Committee wants to find out how beneficial these changes have been. The last survey will be conducted to find out why students leave the campus on weekends — the response should be interesting.

There appears to be a lack of awareness on Campus about social issues that are before us all. Student Concerns has established a Social Issues Committee to combat the problem. All interested students and faculty are invited to the organizational meeting after Christmas vacation. Issues such as Pollution, Inflation and Amnesty will be presented. Please attend. For more information, contact Shelly Kaltenbaugh or Carl Glaeser.

In the near future a large forum of students, faculty and administration will be held to discuss the course evaluations being taken. More information will be disclosed at a later date.

Another matter of importance is a symposium to discuss and help students with their program of emphasis. This symposium will be very beneficial although the exact date is not available. The Admissions Committee is urging that all interested students help the Admissions Office and Juniata by returning to their respective high schools and talk to prospects. Literature can be acquired in Admissions Office. Any questions can be answered by Bruce Moyer.

Senior Class with collaboration of other classes sponsored a semi-formal dance on Tuesday, Dec. 17 at the Elks Club. Congratulations and many thanks to all classes involved for jobs done well.

It is at this time I would on behalf of Student Government, like to wish students, faculty and administration a happy and holy holiday.

Vacations

Probably the most unpleasant aspect of any vacation, however, is the fact that it has to end. In this case though Mr. Time may actually be doing you a favor. Can you imagine what kind of mood you'd be in if you found out that your shoes had to be surgically removed because you let your toenails grow through the leather? Or picture yourself not shaving for so long that your beard gets caught in your zipper? In this respect, returning to Juniata doesn't seem nearly so agonizing. In fact, after a good vacation one has trouble discerning if College is a preparation for or protection from the real world.

A Little From Moore

by Gary Wayne Moore

"Hey, Hey, whada' ya' say?! Take that ball the other way! Hey, Hey, whada' ya'. . . . " Screams of defiance, such as these, sadness and pure excitement are melodiously bellowed out by eight young, "A dynOmite" Juniata women time and time again during sports events, to cheer our athletes to victory. I'm speaking of Juniata's own Women Varsity Cheerleading Squad, who tiredlessly try to keep the adrenalin flowing in our athletes during sports games. Sounds like a rosey job doesn't it? Well it isn't! Sound like a lot of work? It darn sure is.

Before interviewing Juniata's Cheerleaders, I thought that this would be an easy article to write. I figured they go out on the gym floor, do a couple of twists and leaps in the air, and that's it. They always seem to be smiling, so I decided before I even interviewed them that all I would have to do is paint a rosey picture. Period. End of article. But unfortunately, you and myself included. turn their work into what senior captain Patty Fogel calls, "a thankless job."

You see, these women workout their routines each and every day — they practice as every other athletic team does. But we the students of Juniata refuse to appreciate them as we do the other athletes. For instance; at the basketball game against UPJ, everyone was really excited. We shouted at the referees, and cheered our team till we were hoarse. The cheerleaders took to the floor, excited about all the emotions stirring from the crowd and hoping to get us into more of a frenzy. They shouted, "Giveeme a j . . . .!" Talk about silence being golden. You could hear a pin drop. These women don't ask you to come up to them after an event and say, "nice game." (Though Carl Meditch did — Basketball Coach — which the Cheerleaders greatly appreciated). The best way we can thank them, and show our appreciation is; when they ask us to give them a "J," lets give it to them — and more — with all the power our lungs can muster. Must we have someone "light a fire under us" as freshman Cheerleader Patti Sayell suggests?

The irony of all this is that these women still enjoy what they are doing and continue to face us with their shouts and cheers, though we seemingly only return them with jeers. Here are some of their reactions:

Karen Lotz junior co-captain, "Cheerleading is worthwhile. But the students make it hard to enjoy oneself. Most students seem to look at us as a joke. I don't know why, but I wouldn't want to give cheerleading up."

Pauletta McDowell a junior says, "Our skills should distinguish us from the spectators. We should be unique in the respect that we are the main force and the instrumental persons in cheering. Even though we don't seem to be that main force, it's still a lot of fun."

Nancy Heffleger a fres!.man feels, "I never look at cheering as being a task. I despertely want the crowd to join in on our shouts of defiance and view us as something special. I'm not disappointed with the students, simply because I'm from a school where sports weren't too popular. This doesn't mean to suggest that things can't get better though."

Patti Sayell a freshman views, "Cheerleading is exciting. But why do the students shut-up the minute we go onto the floor? I sometimes wonder if they even know we are there. Must we light a fire under them? But it's fun! I don't know what else I can really say!"

Patti Fogel senior captain says, "It's a thankless job, but I could never give it up. We have our problems just as any other athletic team. As a matter of fact, we had twenty women try out for the team but we could only accept three. You know why? We didn't have enough uniforms to go around. And it's a shame, because some of them were really good. Even though all of this though, I love cheering and would never give it up."

The remaining Cheerleaders are: Carolyn Setzer, Joy Akerman, and Ruthie Roger. All of whom are freshman.

Take a tip from Moore. The next time these fine women take to the floor, lets give them a hand — and a mouth.

Basketball Team Shoots To First Place In MAC

by Alan D. Wirt

The Juniata cagers got off to one of the best starts in recent history, as they won three of their first four contests in young 74-75 season.

The "New Breed" Indians, under first year coach Carl Medich have beaten MAC foes Susquehanna 66-57, and Lycoming 83-58. The two wins established Juniata in first place, with a 2-0 league mark. The lone loss of the year came at the hands of powerful U.P.J., by eleven points. The Indians recorded their third win of the season via a 74-71 squeeker over Westminster, on the road. In this game, the Indians' Bill Bickel was playing with an illness, and scoring ace Donnie Williams was half strength due to a nagging knee injury. Despite their handicaps, they combined for 22 points in the fray. Tim Tabor picked up the offensive slack and poured in 20 crucial points, to help the cause.

After the first four games, Donnie Williams paces the team with an 18 point per game average, and is tops in the rebounding category, with an average of 7.8 caroms per game. Mark Jula is the authority on assists, and leads the team with 19.

At this point, prospects look good for a banner year in basketball. The Indians will try to extend their number of wins during the Christmas vacation, when they journey to Ohio and compete in the Muskingum tournament. The Blue and Gold will return to the home court on January 10th to face Ursinus.

Net Men Win Fall Soccer!

by Mike McElhinney & John Graybill

The fall intramural season of six-man soccer ended with the Net-Men winning the championship game, climaxing a 12-0 regular season record and a 2-0 playoff record.

In the first playoff game Genesis, led by Skip Hartman, battled No-Names, captained by Steve Denison. When the game ended the score was 2-2 but Genesis won 1-0 on corner kicks.

In the second playoff game John Graybill's Net-Men defeated Broasted Chicken, anchored by Geoff Clarke, 2-0. The game was a close and well played contest. Broasted Chicken, which finished second in the league with a 9-3 record, was the only team which ever came close to beating the Net-Men in regular season play.

The Net-Men then battled Genesis in a cold and rainy championship game. The Net-Men came out on top, as they had all season, 4-1.

The Net-Men played solid, consistent soccer throughout the entire season. In many of their games they would jump to an early lead and then play through defense, forcing their opponents to make mistakes. This strategy produced many break-away goals.

Betrand Hell, Al Kulp, and Walt Palmer made up the front line for the Net-Men with Ken Saul, Jon Streich, and Mike McElhinney playing defense. The captain and goalie was John Graybill.

The spring intramural season will again bring another season of six-man soccer. Start getting your team together now.

JC Women Tip Off With Gargula!

by Jacque Prentiss & Mardi Frye

The women's varsity basketball team has just begun its season. They began their new season with a few fresh members and a new coach, Mr. Ed Gargula. We decided to interview the coach, with the feeling that he would have much to say about the team, since this is, his first season. We began by asking him a series of questions:

Where are you from? Lansford, Pa. He received his bachelors degree from Bloomsburg State College and his masters degree from Penn State University. He is currently working as a counselor at the Middle School here in Huntingdon.

How much coaching experience do you have? Five years experience on the elementary and junior high level. He has also coached with Mr. Frazier, 1973-74 women's coach.

Have you ever coached a women's team before? No, not in an organized way.

Do you enjoy coaching women? Yes, immensely.

Do you find it difficult to coach women compared to men? No, I find it easier for the women to learn and to adjust to different situations but this could also be caused by the age difference.

Do you find it different to coach women compared to men? I find there are very little differences but I wasn't looking for any differences when I began. The only thing I was looking for was the differences in rules but they are now very similar and this makes it much easier.

Did you feel the women would be more skilled or less skilled than they were? I wasn't surprised at the amount of skills the women have. One reason being I have talked to Mr. Frazier about the team. So far I am pleased with everything.

What do you think the prospects of this year's team are? It is hard to say, because I don't know what the other teams are like. We should do well, but the only question is our rebounding and our height.

At the end, we then asked him to comment on the team and what his plans are for both offense and defense. He felt the main emphasis would be for a speed controlled defense, by this meaning, more pressure basketball and taking the fast break when the opportunity arises. He feels that with our height, being smaller than most other teams, he will use more hustle, speed and pressure defense. Defensively, he will be using primarily man to man a and a little zone in order to throw the other team off. Offensively, he will use a few basic offensive plays, using cuts, screens, and very basic and simple plays. He feels he can't set up a lot of offensive plays because of the time element involved, and because the women will probably be playing under the 30 second rule.

With only the few practices the women have had, they look good but only time will tell. As Coach Gargula said, "We shall see with our first game."

"The Oil Bowl: Another Exercise in Obsession"

by Bob Meacham

Recently Henry Kissinger was quoted as saying that the United States would avoid war as a means to obtain controlled Middle East oil but did not rule out the possibility of taking forceful action as a means to that same end. I find it highly unlikely that even some of Kissinger's Harvard compatriots could successfully point out the distinction between the two terms. An evaluation of a statement such as this reveals a situation directly analgous to the penniless junkie needing a fix who is said to be perfectly harmless except for the fact that he will kill (if necessary) to support his habit.

Recent developments across the nation have added credence to the notion that the United States may actually be considering the use of force to obtain oil. American troops are reportedly stepping up training in the arid areas of our nation. Refinement in the procedures of desert warfare certainly does not signal the possibility of an invasion of Iceland. And the movement of the Enterprise task fleet toward the Indian Ocean may just be a routine naval maneuver as announced. And just maybe the United States government decided to further increase the riches of understudy Ma Bell by allowing Reserve commanders to recently call many Reservists and instruct them not to leave the continental United States. There could be numerous explainations for such phenomena. Being only common citizens of the United States, we are not offered wholesale explanations of these events, we can only speculate. Two such speculations appall me. First, I have an intense dislike for international gaming. Strategy, bluffing and all the elements of a fine game of chess are characteristics the when mastered deserved to be envied. However, a chess board is filled with ivory or wooden pieces, not so many members of the human element. I detest the role of being one of a vast number of pawns, especially since the consequences of losing a game of international chess with oil possession replacing the situation of checkmate are far more serious than Fischer-like seclusion. The current oil situation is far too potentially explosive to spend time trying to bluff and indirectly show support for the threat of force by blatently carrying on internal activities for the sake of food for thought for foreign cloak and daggers. What is needed is an outright appeal by President Ford for some type of international summit conference to decide a future course of action concerning the worlds oil resources. This is not a time for Kennedy-Kruschev type chess games reminiscent of the Cuban Missle Crisis, because the ramifications of mutual foolishness could bring grave consequences.

The second possibility lies in the grim thought that the United States is actually preparing for the exercise of force to obtain Arabian oil. The United States has about one sixth of the world's population yet uses about 33% of its energy supply, the majority of that consumption coming in the form of crude oil products. We drive in oversize cars, turn on too many lights and heat our homes to excess. In typical gluttonous manner we have nearly

by Michael Martin

Well, here we are—or at least some us, at amy rate—safely at the end of the year 1974. Yessirree, poised in fear and trembling at the edge of the black abyss that might be 1975. The preceeding year proved to be more than people could handle. Most of us would have to agree that 1974 came on us extremely like a German panzer division. What with Nixon and all his little elves running over everybody else, a trampled economy, and a new president (if that is what he can be called), how could any of us catch our breaths let alone uncross our eyes. The year turned out to be a real pain in the butt for all involved.

However, I'm not going to sit here and depress you all with my talk about the woes of 1974. As befits the remaining dregs of the holiday season and the celebration of the new year, I intend to make an awards presentation. It is time for a few deserving awards I propose to distribute with an unstinting hand. I trust that we have all recovered from the holiday scene and are finished with the Murine so as to grasp what is about to overwhelm you.

Ladies and Gentlemen, the first and last Schlock Awards for 1974;

1.) The Carpenter's Award for the Furtherment of Pop Schmegma- Bo Donaldson and the Heywoods who recorded Billy Don't Be A Hero.
2.) The Oscar Bonavena Loose-Brain Award- A word of explanation is in order for this award. Bonavena was the other Argentine firecracker but was a boxer who was banned by the W.B.A. from fighting because his brains kept running out of his nose. This year the award goes to Gerald Ford.
3.) The Short Romance of The Year- Gerald Ford and the press.
4.) The Al Copone Award- John Mitchell, who never told a lie.
5.) Sieve of The Year- John Dean (who?)
6.) Greased Crack Award- Robert Valco.
7.) The Hermann Goering Award for Hostile Liberals- To a Mr. Peter Hamitt for suggesting that our B-52's should be used to eliminate Turkey's poppyfields and also a special prize to Richard Nixon for his world-wide alert of U.S. troops.
8.) The oh, really Award- To Ford's economic advisors for telling us that we're not in a recession.
9.) Most Discretely Covered Story- The masectomies.
10.) I Never Want to Hear About It Again- Energy, masectomies, Watergate.
11.) The Juniata Alumni Award for Productive Journalism- Steve Townsend, who reputedly lost the school $10,000 in gifts due to his nauseous articles. Really Steve!
12.) The Ad Nauseaum Journalism Award- Again Steve Townsend who sent me screaming to the can everytime a new paper came out.
13.) Attilla the Hun Award- Philadelphia Flyers.
14.) Rumor of The Year- Nixon's resignation.
15.) Surprise of The Year- That he resigned.
16.) Anna Kolso Posture of The Year Award- Mick Jagger's lips and Olga Korbut.
17.) Furtive Pleasures Award- What did Nixon and Bebe do together?
18.) Regret of The Year- That Kissinger didn't resign.
19.) Myth of The Year- Evil Kneivel.
20.) Now You See Him, Now You Don't- John Lindsay, and Bobby "Monster Mash" Pickett.
21.) Solution of The Year- The idea of getting back all our petro-dollars by letting the Arabs buy Pan Am., Lockheed, Penn Central, and the U.S. Postal Service, for which no amount of money seems to rejuvenate.
22.) Best Dressed- Gerald Ford in Japan.
23.) Ballon Job of The Year- To the press for their "discovery" of Sam Ervin and the oil crisis.
24.) Silliest- Miss Elliot's engagement to her pubescent (as compared to her) Welsh chauffeur.
25.) The Thank-God It's Over Award- The entire year of 1974.

Understanding The Situation Thru The Other Guys' Eyes

by Tom Kutz

"When in the course of human events" - that was our opening line used about two hundred years ago during a period of conflict between two groups of people. It may be said that a major conflict between two groups of people. It may be said that a major cause of this problem was misunderstanding. As we know the end result was a war with all the trappings; the dead and defeated, and a new nation.

The nation has survived and unfortunatly so has misunderstanding between people. Problems can be found throughout American society. Many of them still come from one person's or one group's inability to see the other situation. We don't even have to leave campus to find this inability. Many of the disagreements between students, faculty or administration could serve wholly or in part as an example of misunderstanding.

It can be a minor disagreement; one person becoming angry, another insulted; or it can be major, many dead and only a few "winners". But in every case it causes a problem, a problem that could partly or completly elliminated through a willingness to see the other's position.

It may appear trite to write a reminder that understanding is a key to alleviating much of the friction that appears "in the course of human events". But misunderstandings constantly occure and therefore reminders are always in order.

Seeing the other's position will not always solve the situation but it may slow it down before feelings are hurt or a war is started. We must aim for understanding if we ever hope to reach a solution to our problems.

Student Gov't Happenings

by W. Stephen Cordova

Having returned from a lengthy Christmas vacation the Student Government has returned with revived hopes of making '75 a year that the students will best be served.

The Student Government is strongly urging interested and hard working students to help work on a Juniata Handbook; this handbook would principally serve freshmen but would be beneficial to all. For further information, contact Carl Glaeser.

In addition to SAC's effort to look into full utilization of athletic facilities, a new, non-acedemic judiciary committee has been formed to look into any possible problems that may or may not exist in the judicial process. This committee has some fine members in Dean Robinson, Carl Glaeser, Cricket Smith, Prof. Robert Fisher, Bob Meacham and others. Yet another new committee which will consist of a cross section of the Senate, will be formed to bring the food service's problems to the students and student's problems to the Food Service. This is not to say that the Food Service Committee has not served us well, it's just that special attention is needed and a new committee can get to the heart of the problems at this time.

Student Concern's co-chairmen of the month are Shelly Kaltenbaugh and Brian Smith. The committee is compiling the information gathered from the Health Service Survey and the RA survey. The results of the first survey will be done on a joint committee meeting with the Dean of Students and the Health Service staff for action needed. The RA survey data will be released pending permission of the RA's.

Do You Have Commitments?

by Jonathan Streich

Now it's 1975, a new year. Big deal. Is there anything new about it? Some people like to make resolutions or promises; they want to turn over a new leaf—it's more appropriate with a new year. Some of us want to make new commitments, which can take many forms. We would like to get rid of bad habits, alter our lifestyle somewhat, perhaps. Then again, some of us don't care, or it isn't any big deal to us.

But there are some things which we carry with us into the new year. Every one of us! We're in the middle of the term, nothing really new. Some of our resolutions will stand up to the burden of keeping them, while other ones will last a few days, maybe weeks. But, resolutions or no resolutions, there are some things which don't get better because we are not responsible. Poverty still exists in 1975—the technological age—crime exists with some figures(stats.) increasing, war exists—the only solution?—and there are lots more, including all our personal problems. We are responsible. We are getting the education, "private" at that. Meanwhile there are problems other people are having, not just OUR problems. But we couldn't care less about someone else's problems! We're going to get good jobs, eat well, live well—maybe 70 years more. But, big deal. What value do those jobs have when people are fighting and killing each other because they don't want bussing?

No matter when you make your commitments—January 1 or January 16—what will they mean to you? What will they mean to others? What actions will we take? We couldn't care less. . .

Rudy Presents A Year In Films

by Brad Rudy

Now that the new year has belched itself forward, we pretentious and snobbish amateur critics like to sit back and examine the bygone annum, perhaps even giving a "best of the year" list. In staying with our policy of keeping the student body abreast of current cinema, I hereby submit for your perusal, enlightenment, disgust, and/or "bathroom tissue", my version of this hackneyed and useless cliche.

Of course, ladies and gentlemen, 1974 will go down in the movie books as "the year of the disaster" (pun intended), with 5 or 6 disaster epics on the nation's screens and more to come. This was the year an ocean liner was bombed, a subway was hijacked, a jet-liner was wrecked by an indiscreet heart-attack and terminal diabetes (from the sweetness and light graciously provided by Linda Blair and Helen Reddy,), Los Angeles was totalled, Paul Newman and Steve McQueen battled for the best billing and the bluest eyes in what was perhaps the grandest heartburn movie ever made, and Harry Cohn's ass short-circuited because of hemorrhoids (pretentious in-joke #463). These were all delivered with the subtlety of a Panzer attack, but, what's worse, they all seemed to work. There's something exhilarating about seeing your favorite stars blown up, burnt up, knocked up, and crushed by flying skyscrapers. You might call it the aesthetics of schlock, I guess. Unfortunately, though, they are opiates—when their effect wears off, they turn on you. Going back for a second or third viewing, or even thinking about the first causes their "suspense" to crumble, their "logic" to disappear, their cliches to multiply, and their essential characters to decrease. (In "The Towering Inferno," for example, out of 10 or 15 top name entertainers, I counted 3, at the most 4 essential characters.) Herein lies the difference between entertainment and escapism. A truly entertaining film is always entertaining no matter how many times you see it. But escapism is like virginity—one shot and it's ruined (male chauvinist quip #4,603,942). But this is matter for another article. Of course "Juggernaut" was made nominally better by its self-parody and unknown cast (relatively), and "Earthquake" went so far as to cynically sneer at its audience (including a subtle method of telling you there's an earthquake going on —vibrating the theater). But all of them seem to show by their popularity and their especially effective special effects that there is something sick and masochistic about our society. And, of course, it's easy to see that this masochism is going to be exploited to the hilt by the producers in Hollywood.

There are many other aspects of movies in 1974 that bear mentioning, but we are suffering from a lack of space, so I'll have to just touch lightly on them. Like 1973, 1974 was particularly barren in women's roles, and a great deal of incompetence in those that were there. (I shudder to think what a talented actress could have done as Daisy Miller.) The year was also barren of comedy, with, I suppose, the work of Mel Brooks being most apparent here (I especially missed Woody Allen this year). Foreign imports were especially heavy, but, for the most part, none of these were seen outside of New York City. I'm looking forward to an opportunity to see Fellini's "Amarcord," Bergman's "Scenes from a Marriage," Bunuel's "Le Fantome de la Liberte," Malle's "Lacombe, Lucien," and Resnais' "Stavisky." I'm most optimistic about the Fellini film, because it has shown enough box-office potential to run in the same NYC theater since September.

Oh, well, on to the lists. These are my favorites of the year, for one reason or another. When you disagree (and you will), get in touch and I will defend my choices.

Best picture: "The Conversation," "Theives Like Us," "The Godfather (II)," "Chinatown," "California Split," "Law and Disorder".

Best performance: Al Pacino (God. II), Gene Hackman (Conv.), Jack Nicholson and Faye Dunawaye (China.), Art Carney (Harry & Tonto), James Caan (The gambler), Shelley Duvall (Theives Like Us), Joan Goodfellow (Buster & Billie),

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the Editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatian. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name. It is also requested that all letters be double spaced with 70 spaces per line.

Recently it has been brought to the attention of a few members of the Senate, that there possibly exists a direct or indirect relationship between a possible new drinking policy and the rise of destruction and vandalism.

As elected officials, how are we to intepret such action? Do we allow the isolated cases of a few individuals who have to prove "gone they were last night" ruin it for the mature and responsible individuals? Despite the fact that the new drinking policy hasn't been in effect long enough to draw a complete picture, if destruction and intolerable behavior of some persist, the complete picture could be the re-introduction of the stringent drinking policy that was before in September.

I'm trying to make a plea to those students who appreciate and are content with the status quo: 1) Discourage behavior that can serve no purpose but harm 2) Report destruction and vandalism to the RA's who'll then find the proper channels 3) Respect the rights of other students concerning dormitory and personal belongings. If we come to grips with these few guidelines we'll be going in the right direction that should be most fulfilling to the greatest number.

W. Stephen Cordova

Thank you,

I see on the last page of the December 19th issue of The Juniatian an ad from a term paper company. I think that to inform students of the availability of such services without giving them warning may be a disservice.

You may not be aware that a superior court in California has issued a preliminary injunction against a Los Angeles term paper firm barring it from selling written materials which students might submit to receive academic credit at a college or university.

According to a recent report, the injunction opens the way for legal discovery of the firm's list of customers who may include students.

A number of other states have put legal sanctions on these companies and I am under the impression that Pennsylvania is considering such legislation.

Wilfred G. Norris

Editor Reply,

In response to Dean Norris's letter concerning the term paper company we felt that to place a warning would be doing a disservice to the company who is paying us to advertise. It is our belief that if the student wishes to use the material as an aid in writting a paper or as a paper itself it is not for us to judge. However we did not realize the consequences. We appreciate the warning and hope anyone who cares to take advantage of the service will now be aware of the situation.

Thank you.

Romance and Reality
High Gothic: 13th Century

(Along Muddy Run)

BY Henry Siedzikowski

The Christmas holidays are only a memory now. For most of us, they are pleasant memories. We can look back on the good times we had with our friends. And we all have fond memories of the many good meals we enjoyed.

Now we are back at Juniata, and facing hard reality again. We still have an occasional good time with our friends, but good food is a thing of the past.

If there is an issue that unites the vast majority of Juniata students, it is the food service. Since I have started writing this column, a number of people have requested a column devoted to the quality of the food service. So, in the spirit of service, I will use this column to report student's feelings on the good and bad points of the food service.

I will cover the good points first. This section can be gotten out of the way quickly. The simple fact is that there are very few compliments being given to the food service these days. As a matter of fact, it has been so long since I heard one, that I really cannot remember any to report.

The bad side of the ledger is a different story. There have been so many complaints lately that I feel compelled to offer a blanket apology to anybody who doesn't get their favorite peeve included. I made an honest effort to include all the frequently mentioned complaints, but with the vast array to choose from, some were inevitably left out.

One complaint involves the lack of necessary eating utensils. It seems now that three out of four meals, you have to go without one item of silverware. There are never any salad bowls. Glasses seem to be in short supply constantly.

Food is another item that is difficult to come by if you go to dinner around 5:30. At least one, and sometimes two of the choices seem to be unavailable. The only remaining choice is usually dehydrated fish or "mystery meat", (Perhaps "mystery soybean" would be more appropriate).

Another question has been raised concerning the new system of meal tickets. Now with a sticker on your ID card, it is virtually impossible to sneak in. However, if, for some reason, somebody forgets their ticket for one meal, our lovable Mr. Straub, refuses to let them eat, even if it is clearly known they are on the boarding plan. While everyone grants the food service the right to protect itself from those seeking a free meal, it is another story to turn away those who have paid for their meal.

The biggest complaint, though, is the absurd quality of the food. We are in one of the rare places in the world where scrambled eggs can come off the grill cold. We are also the proud owners of the only vegitarian beef stew in existence.

To keep this in a reasonable space, I will close with these few complaints and devote a later article to a further listing. However, it is my hope that the food service seeks to answer some of these complaints before I get my second shot.

Hell From Shell

By the time most readers reach this article, I imagine all will have had their fill of resolutions, reflections and predictions! But that can only be expected for the first JUNIATIAN of 1975! So, bear with me because this is another of the same.

Student Government has tried to keep most of the campus informed through the JUNIATIAN, posting of minutes, and the now disfunctioning Issues Desk, of exactly what they are doing. Aside from these few mediums, maybe you've gotten the scoop from a Senator or two. I happen to know that more goes on than the average student is aware. Being a Senator myself, I now see that the Senate Meetings are more than can ever be realized through reading the Minutes or an article in the newspaper.

The minutes are overwhelmingly characterized by introductions of motions, seconded by so and so, and approved or disapproved by the following Senators. The Public Relations committee is rejuvenating the Issues Desk, usually by giving it a new name, the Student Concern's committee is investigating another Earth-shaking question, and Budget and management is budgeting and managing. A meeting rarely goes by that a new committee is not formed. Business of various other types is also executed. The session is always unanamousily adjourned. The minutes are articulately written and respectfully submitted by the secretary.

Little do you, the electorate, know actually what takes place from studying the minutes while waiting in line for a meal. It is not realized how the threat of impeachment, resignation, and neglect of duty has hovered over the Juniata College

If Ever New Years Resolutions Are In Order, Surely This Is The Year!

by Steve Townsend

1974 was not a good year. But it was an entertaining year. And considering the General State of Affairs, that's about all one can ask for.

If someone sat down and tried to find some comparable aspect of Juniata, he'd come up with a campus-wide booze bust in which the entire college population lapsed into terminal dry heaves. 1974 was very similar to such a party. It was fun as long as we were able to maintain the energy. However, nothing is perpetual. So as the Watergate fun faded, and 1974 turned into 1975, we found ourselves in the grips of a hellish national hangover. The most painful feature of which is the present Recession.

The vast majority of us have probably never taken the time to realize the full implications of that word. Our fathers still work, we still eat, and the tuition still gets paid. Though none of us are truely immune from economic tragedy, it's a fact that a great many of us are snugly insulated. What may effect us more than anything else in the coming year, is not the hangover itself, but its perscription: it's not uncommon to hear persons speak of war as an economic remedy.

Though the history books seldom draw any direct links between economic downturns and conflict, it still remains a fact that the Nation's last three armed struggles followed hot on the heels of a recession.

In 1937 the country's yet tender economy nosedived into a new slump, despite the muscle of the New Deal. The 1939 recovery was weak indeed for it left 9.5 million persons without work. It was against this back-drop that America amended its Neutrality law and set its massive war machine into motion on November 4, 1939.

By 1949, Uncle Sam's pocket book was again experiencing symptons of sag. And whether by coincidence or not, President Truman ordered troops into Korea one day after the U.N. Security Council voted 9-1 that a breech of peace had occured. That was June 25, 1950.

Fourteen years later we found that the economy was still subject to growing pains. And even with a successful tax slash from L.B.J., 1964 none the less saw the tragic Gulf of Tonkin Resolution which sent us snowballing into mass involvement in Vietnam.

So in 1975 it is no wonder that a great many persons are again predicting the appearance of war. And if present indicators are of any meaning, they may well be correct.

By far the most frightening aspect of the young year is the possibility that thousands of college-aged young men will become cannon-fodder on the sands of the Middle East. Though the invasion must still be considered remote, its fate is directly related to that of our economy. Could the United States stand for higher oil prices? Even worse, would the country be willing to drastically alter its consumption habits? Regretfully, the answers to such questions are probably negative.

Of equally dismaying proportions is the more immediate question of renewed involvement in Vietnam. Recently, the Saigon regime has suffered its worst military setbacks since early in the 1960's. The Vietcong are now in control of Phuoc-long Province, and Pentagon officials are not willing to rule out United States intervention should the situation worsen for the repressive Thieu dictatorship.

Where does all this leave us? Simply put, it suffices to say that wars are fought with young men. It was persons like ourselves that were killed and maimed in Vietnam; and should 1975 bring renewed fighting, whether in Vietnam, or Arabia, the victims will be much like our closest friends.

If ever New Year Resolutions are in order, it is this year. All of us must resolve to keep the predictions of war from becoming self fulfilling prophecies.

Student Government just as it has nationally. Never does it show how rules of order are at times used as little more than tools for revenge. The attendance record is listed but it does not indicate which Representatives are in the habit of coming late, leaving early, and doing their homework while the regular meeting is in progress.

What I guess I am doing is pleading for some involvement and concern from the Student Body. It is only when we get this sort of commitment that Student Government can have credibility. Put the books aside for an hour and attend the Senate Meeting when we meet in your dorm. It is through this type of interest that Student Government can become a more responsible organization. In order "to bring student government back to the student" it is also important that the student make some effort to come to us.

sentation, I seem to have found out that there wasn't anything to really cheer about in 1974. I thought that there might be at least one thing that could be handed an award that wasn't of a dire nature to us all. I suppose that the only thing left for ourselves to do is to resort to that delightful panacea known as nostalgia. Either that or we can all enema ourselves to death. Anyway, until my next manifestation in this medium stay calm and pray!

drained our domestic oil supplies through excess demand and waste. As a result the United States can be deemed, as I mentioned before, a junkie needing a fix. The current state of affluence which we have so long required as necessary to American survival is about to swallow us and the rest of the world in one big dry gulp.

So instead of arriving at government legislation to curb excess energy usage and prompt individual consideration concerning unnecessary abuse of world resources, instead of world leaders meeting immeadiatly to solve this threatening problem and instead of resulting to logical means to solve the problem, the United States is preparing to exercise force to support our selfish affluent wastefullness.

This idea sickens me, especially since means other than war are available and no doubt popularly desirable. I doubt if any of us appreciate the role of pawns in warlike moves made by government officials to solve a problem the way they see fit.

It is no wonder that football is quickly becoming the national obsession. It seems to exemplify all the United States stands for. One coach tries to out smart the other coach in a game of territorial take and defend, each leader exercising the whims of his strategical genius at the expense of the sacrificed multitudes he commands. Unfortunatly the Middle East seems to have been selected for a bowl sight. Being a possible first round draft pick for Uncle Sam's team, I just may not report to training camp.

The Admissions Committee has drafted letters to exceptional minority students that have shown interest in Juniata. They are planning on drafting letters to "preferred students" for possible weekend visits. Pictures are badly needed to update all Juniata publications such as brochures, bulletins, etc.

Recycling Committee headed by Felix (Pete Pappalardo) will not be taking any recyclable materials until further notice — thank you.

The newest possibly brightest addition to the Student Government may be Women's Awareness, a new governing body for the young ladies who are ready and willing to get involved. A special organizational meeting will be held.

George Segal (Calif. S.), Carroll O'Connor (Law & Disorder).

Best supporting performance: niro (God. II), Sam Waterston (Great Gatsby), Geraldine Fitzgerald (Harry & T.), Lee Strasberg (God. II), John Houston (China.) John Schuck (Theives L. U.), Vincent Gardenia (Death Wish), Cloris Leachman (Daisy Miller), Madeline Kahn (Blazing Saddles). Austin Pendleton (The Front Page).

I've seen only 30 or 40 films (as opposed to the hundreds made), so this list does not include such critically raved films as those I mentioned in the foreign films section above, or such performances as Dustin Hoffman and Valerie Perrine in "Lenny" and Gena Rowlands in "A Woman Under the Influence." But, to give you a less one-sided view of the year, I've polled several people around campus for their favorites:

Hanging around the information desk, I discovered that Maria Argiro and Jeff Norris both like "Chinatown," that Sally liked "The Longest Yard" and that Jim Angelo liked "The Taking of Peiham 1 2 3," "Juggernaut," and "Blazing Saddles." Wandering around Tote, I ran into a great divesity of opinion: Mark Conti liked "The Three Musketeers" and "The Odessa File"; Nathan Wagoner liked "Chinatown," "The Conversation," and "Stavisky" (Where'd he see that!!!); Kit Salisbury liked "Chinatown," "Harry & Tonto," "California Split," and "The Parallax View"; Debbie Zeigler liked "The Godfather II," "The Great Gatsby," "Chinatown," and "The Parallax View"; Bruce Moyer liked "Harry & Tonto"; and Mary Ackroyd liked "The Three Musketeers" and "The Trial of Billy Jack." Finally, I moved to Founders for some faculty input. Prof. Croce couldn't think of any favorites, but he did think "Daisy Miller" and "The Great Gatsby" were disappointing (although he said they had their good points); Prof. Church also complained about the lack of opportunity to see good films around here, but said, if he was forced, he'd pick Chinatown" as "top 10" quality; finally, Prof. Davis picked "The Conversation," "Badlands," "Love and Anarchy," and "Phantom of the Paradise" as those he "found exciting in one way or another," but he also regrets not seeing "Lacombe, Lucien," "Scenes from a Marriage," and "Amarcord".

This Week At Juniata

by Nancy Nordberg

On Friday night at 7 P.M. Center Board will sponser the film, "Paths of Glory" in Oller Hall. The 1957 film stars Kirk Douglass and Ralph Meeker. It is a powerful film which attacks the rigid formality of military life. 'Ordered to make a hopelessly suicidal attack by Generals trying to look good, a company retreats to save itself. Three soldiers are court martialled and executed for cowardice as an example to the rest of the company.

Other events on the JC campus this week include:

Saturday, January 19
11 A.M.—Women's Basketball at Messiah
1 P.M.—Wrestling at home with St. Francis
6 P.M.—J.V. Basketball with Bucknell (home)
8 P.M.—Varsity Basketball with Bucknell

Owens-Corning Recruitment

The Office of Career Planning and Placement will sponsor one of a series of its yearly activities on Monday, January 20. On that evening Robert M. Paul, Personnel Director of the Huntingdon Plant of Owens-Corning Fiberglas, will come to campus to talk with interested students about the job interview process. Mr. Paul will speak in 202 Good Hall at 7:30 p.m., and although the topic of his presentation will probably be most timely for seniors, students of any class year are welcome to attend.

In the course of his talk, Mr. Paul will cover pertinent aspects of the initial interview, secondary interview, plant trip and other helpful hints about what a student applicant can expect in interoiewing and hiring procedures. As a College recruiter for Owens-Corning Fiberglas, he will share pertinent insights from the perspective of the interviewer and the company. Following his formal presentation, Mr. Paul will be prepared to respond to questions from the audience.

Mr. Paul's visit is particularly timely since it coordinates well with the beginning of the on-campus recruiting schedule of the Office of Career Planning. As another service provided by the office, the arrangement of an on-campus interviewing schedule of company and school district representatives provides a convenient means by which graduating seniors can conduct interviews with a number of different organizations without leaving campus. A schedule of companies intending to conduct interviews is maintained in the Office of Career Planning in 208 Founders, and interested students can schedule interviews there.

In addition to these programs the office provides a gaumet of other services to assist students in areas ranging from decision making about career choice to materials about job seeking upon completion of degree work at Juniata. For underclass students who are deciding about a career to pursue, the office offers

by Gary Wayne Moore

WOOOSSSSH! The nets were smoking! There was a roar of excitement in the air last Friday night, which had been lost for a few years. Excitement generated by the hustling, rustling, stylish Juniata Cagers. Juniata basketball that marked the beginning — or rejuvination — of athletes who want to win with prolific proficiency. Defeating Ursinus 82-66.

Many may say that we didn't play very well. In earnest, I must agree with those sentiments. But sometimes the old metapher that states: "It's not whether you win or lose that counts. But how you play the game." The atheletes played it together!

Everyone knows about Don "Gumby" Williams. The man who "leaps like a gazelle," and lands softly as a feather. We know that he's not afraid to "rock the pill" (basketball) with style. His 12 points and 8 rebounds are proff of that. Likewise, we know the name Billy B (William Bickel). B is excellent in outthinking his opponents. Scoring 11 points, B deminates his many experience. Now how mean is that!?

Oscar 'Ricky' Hatchett, sleek and sly as a panther, will run his man into picks for a gliding layup. Ricky glided in for 8 points. 'Daddy' Jules, (Mark Jula), who passes the ball with a uniqueness of his own, gained 4 assists, and earned 2 points. Daddy is a bad. . . .!

Big T, (Tim Tabor), who uses his mack truck — like body to set picks, snatched 8 rebounds and threw in 4 points. "Ruff, (Greg Ruffo), Ruff, Ruff," was the cry of many fans last Friday against Ursinus. Ruff' set fire to many eyes as he tossed in 13 points.

Don "Blessed" Martin used his distinctive legs to leap for 8 rebounds, and popped in 8 points with his flicking left hand, Pat Nakle! Negle is a freshman. But he's mean as a devil. Shooting with superb marksmanship, Pat tossed in 6 points.

Chris Rowan, a sophomore, jumped off the bench after putting a whipping on Ursinus's J.V.'s, to sink 2 points. Mike Morgan, Craig Shrift, Tim Brady, Rick Baleh, and Steve Rossi, all assisted in devastating Ursinus, 82-66.

But the best is last! I'm talkin about a man who has nicknames such as, "the Genius," and "the Whirl." Larry Moore is his name. And he's so bad, that he can ice skate in Hsdes in mid-July. The Genius Whirls! Whirls around his opponets and under them — sometime's even through them! The Genius must be a contotionists! He twisted around his opponents for a high score of 16 points! He "jumped in their collars and hollared" by snatching 10 rebounds.

Juniata will host Bucknell in Saturday's College Basketball Day game. The Juniata Cagers are 6-4 overall, and 2-1 in the M.A.C. Division.

If this article sounds a bit biased, the tunes you are hearing are true. You see, I'm the manager of this stylish team.

Shrift and Brady Tell All

by Gary Wayne Moore

I interviewed two sophomore Juniata basketball players, Craig Shrift, and Tim Brady. Both play J.V., and sometimes see some varsity action. The conversation concerned their competion and mental attitudes towards basketball. But the talk proved even more interesting than I had hoped. This is because I think they underscored the feelings of many atheletes. Their views sought to explain the idea of competion in sports.

Shrift: "It's not necessarily so that there will be a mutual understanding between friends, that it is only a game, when there is a fighting for positions. Sometimes hostility comes into play between athletes who are the best of friends off the court."

Brady: "That's the way it shouldn't be You take for instance Ruffo and myself. On the court we go at it like cats and dogs. Off the court we're the best of friends. That's the way it should be. Everything is on the court. You can't say that he's my friend, so I'm going to relax. Your supposed to be performing to the best of your ability.

Shift: "In respect to game situations, on the court I talk to the opponents. Things like, 'rough game,' or it's 'going to be a long night,' It gets a friendly atmosphere. I enjoy the game more when things like this happen.

Brady: "To be like that is good. But in my case, I see shaking hands at the end of the game as being fine. But for me to play it to the best of my ability, I have to be mad. To be truthful, I have to feel like I dislike that guy, in order to perform well."

We than began to converse on the terms of relationship's during practice. Both men seem to feel that there has to be honesty in a player-player relationship. This is in respect to an athlete receiving something he doesn't deserve. For instance, a coach may congratulate a player on the good defense he has been playing on his man. When in actuality the player has been doing some hanky-panky on the court — such as holding on to his man's shirt. Both Shrift and Brady feel that the player is not honest when he accepts the praise. It seems that these men feel more animosity towards the players, than to the coach — even if the coach knows about the hanky-panky. To them, this is notcompetition, but a hideous vulgarity which is usually despised by most players.

Brady: "I work hard day after day. I get self-satisfaction out of knowing what I've put into it. You see, I love the sport. If I feel that I've done my job, I'm pleased."

Hostile feelings come into play when other athletes don't put out. When athletes begin looking for an easy vehicle to "stardom," without contributing or putting out, most of the players become ambivalent.

I then drew a hypothetical situation for them: If a player smokes or drinks, and still is abie to beat someone out who doesn't, what kind of feelings would the beaten have. My first assumption was; the beaten player may become ambivalent because the other player can drink or smoke, and still beat him out. Brady and Shrift convinced me that htis might not be so . That perhaps a athlete might ask himself, "is this for the betterment of the team?" Another question might be, "what does drinking and smoking do to athletes body?"

Brady and Shrift: "You can't be do that to your body and hope to perform. Drinking, smoking, staying up late, and goofing off can cause one to become deathly sick. It lowers your resistance and practice drains you even more.

On the whole, the 'rap' proved to more than interesting, it was stimulating. I appreciate the frankness and honesty these two men gave me.

I M Gym Talk

by Gary Wayne Moore

Walking through the gym the other night, I found an unusual number of persons there — or so I thought. I was told by a friend that this amount of people is far from being unusual. I asked him if the amount of women present in the gym was unusual. "No man, women are really getting into it." Interested, I began asking some of the women about the feelings they have about intramurals.

Fran Pine: "I feel that it gives students time to relax and exercise. Through IM's you can release the built-up tensions from studying and classes."

Nancy Mowry: "From a female point of view, I feel IM's are one of the few good things on JC campus for women. Unfortunately we are not given equal time on the basketball courts and it is rare when females have a chance to use them. I feel females should participate more in IM's, because they are a good way to relax, have fun, and get exercise."

Cherie Dettmar: "I feel that the athletic department has finally begun to support women's athletics, both intercollegiate and intramural. For those of us who unfortunately do not have the time to participate on a varsity level, the well-developed intramural program gives other women a chance for exercise, a study break, and most of all to relax and have fun."

Karen Lotz: "Good for those who enjoy having a good time — fur getting exercise — and learning a little more about the games. In regard to athletic interest, women are now being recognized."

Well there you have it. Men and women are out shooting hoops, playing volleyball, and having a whole lot of fun.

I've got to go now, don't want to miss my IM game!

Wrestling Rap

by John Paulshock

The Indians matmen have jumped off to a woeful start in their 1974-75 M.A.C. competition. Coached by Bill Barrier, the grapplers are a considerably young team, consisting of all freshmen, sophomores, and only one senior. The team's dual meet record of one win and five losses is not all that impressive, but improvement is bound to show once the rookies and other young musclemen mold together and gain some much-needed experience.

So far this season, the wrestlers have been downed by Johnstown-Pitt, they've placed seventh out of twelve teams at a Lebanon Valley tournament, dropped another dual meet with Susquehanna, and defeated Widener in a quadrangular meet with Windener, Delaware Valley, and Leb. Valley. The remainder of the winter holds dual meets with St. Francis, Moravian, Gettysburg, Messiah, Penn-State Altoona, and Scranton. The final meet before the M.A.C.s in the Spring is another quad, with the Indians facing Leb. Valley for the third time, Elizabethtown, and Lycoming. Overall, they have a pretty tough schedule; starting heavy in the fall with Leb. Valley and U.P.J., and a late winter with Leb. Valley again, Elizabethtown, and a second quad.

Presently, the grapplers' line up by weight class shapes up somewhat weak, with not much depth in any slot;

118 lbs. Forfeit
126 lbs. Steve Denison—freshman
134 lbs. Brian Ashworth—freshman
142 lbs. Mark Brown—senior, letterman
150 lbs. Gary Moeller—sophomore, letterman or
Bill Bruner—freshman
158 lbs. Ron Nickle—freshman
167 lbs. Steve Harper—sophomore, letterman, and team captain 177 lbs. Steve Shultis—sophomore, letterman
190 lbs. Mike Hanselman—sophomore, letterman
Hvywt. Scott "Chicken" Simmons—sophomore, letterman

Although this year's squad does carry quite a few lettermen, they are all yet young, and are considering it a rebuilding and working season. There are a few prospects for the M.A.C. wrestling finals held at the season's end, and dual meet competition should become more exciting for Juniata, as the youngsters gell into a more experienced team.

Individually, two matmen wrestled their ways to win honors at the tournament at Leb. Valley earlier this season. Simmons flattened his fellow "big boy" from Ursinus, and earned the title of heavyweight champ. Harper fought his into the final round of bouts, but was handed a loss, and a mere second place.

Injuries have prevailed this year, but not to such a damaging peak. Bruner and Simmons are momentarily mending some ailments, but plans have that they'll be returning back to the resilite mats soon.

interest inventories and career-oriented literature to aid in such decision making. For the use of graduating seniors, the office maintains resources materials about resume writing and interviewing to assist in conducting an effective job search.

Some of the services of the Office of Career Planning and Placement and some of the materials available through the office are provided in conjunction with the College Placement Council, a nationwide organization of offices of career planning and placement and company, governmental and other agency representatives. That organization emphasizes a coordination between colleges and employing organizations of efforts and information pertaining to career-oriented materials and the job market. The College Placement Annual is a major publication of the Council, and copies are made available for individual use by seniors.

Additionally, the office compiles two publications that are geared toward helping seniors with their job search. A monthly newsletter is mailed to seniors, and the intention of that bulletin is to share information about trends in the job market, placement activities, and other timely information. Seniors can also obtain a copy of a handbook published by the office which contains forms to register for the complete services of the office, detailed information about services available, and helpful hints about job seeking, interviews and letter writing.

Students wishing to utilize any of the services of the Office of Career Planning and Placement should feel free to stop by the office in 208 Founders at any time during the regular class day to either browse or talk with the Associate Dean of Students for Career Planning and Placement, Ronald Shunk. Through that means the office can offer the most individualized attention possible to career oriented concerns.

The Pleasure Of A Reading

by June Cramer

On January 12th and 13th Esther M. Doyle presented "The Pleasure of Their Company" in Shoemaker Galleries. The program was made up of personal selections from readings which Dr. Doyle has used throughout her interpretive career. She read selections from Pygmalion, The Importance of Being Earnest, and A Man For All Seasons. Also, she presented humorous verse by E. P. Lister and E. B. White and some poetry by Archibald MacLeish. Her reading of the 100th Psalm at the end of the performance was exceptionally good.

All in all, I think "The Pleasure of Their Company" was one of the best performances of the year. Dr. Doyle has tremendous talent, which culminates in a presence quite distinct. Her ability to interpret literature and communicate these interpretations to her audience is remarkably effective. When reading from Pygmalion, her eyes sparkled and she became Eliza Doolittle speaking to Mrs. Higgins— "How-w do-o-o you do?"

Dr. Doyle's handling of the humorous and dramatic verse was delicately balanced. Everyone enjoyed the poem about the sex life of a bee. The conversation between Henry VIII and Sir Thomas Moore from "A Man For All Seasons" was very dramatic. The variety of the selections and the skills of both authors and interpretor was most refreshing, and I thoroughly enjoyed the pleasure of their company.

About 1975 What's Next?

by Robert Lopresti

(Written after noticing that seven out of fifteen articles in last week's Juniatian began with reviews of 1974 or predictions for 1975.)

Well, it's that time of the year again. Now that two weeks of 1975 have passed its time to look over these fifteen or so days and see of the year has lived up to our expectations.

As all sociology students know, studying a sample (an opinion poll, for example) is a legitimate way of learning about the whole. So I feel no hesitation whatsoever on reviewing 1975 on the basis of its first 23 days. After all, critics have reviewed books and movies after examining much smaller percentages.

All in all 1975 has been a good year at Juniata. The tuition hasn't been raised. We haven't had one major booze bust. And no alumnus have gotten mad over Festus's articles for the year.

But in the nation as a whole the year has been rather gloomy. Gerald Ford has not been able to solve inflation in the past two weeks. Five days have passed since his State of the Union message, without any significant improvement in our financial situation, so we must hope for long range progress, since his new program has had no immediate effect.

Very little progress has been made in this year toward solving the knotty problems the international community faces. Disarmament, Hunger, and the Middle East are all painful memories as we look back at 1975. At least the terrorists have been fairly quiet.

In other areas 1975 has been a fairly dull year, entertainment for instance. I nominate "Paths of Glory" for the best picture of the year, because its the only one I've seen. But there were a few highlights in entertainment this year:

Free Time Can Be A Real Drag!

by Wendy Jacobus

It seems apparent that year after year January has been a rather "blue" month. Perhaps it's due to the let down after Christmas, or New Year's resolutions broken during the first week of the new year, or having to study for mid terms. But alas, January never quite reaches the high expectations the first month of the year deserves.

January at Juniata, so far, has lived up to this reputation. When the students returned to the campus after vacation they found the monthly calendar published by Center Board in their mailbox and it appeared as if January was going to be very "uneventful". In fact, there were highlights like "Casino Night", the "Civilization" film series, and especially the new innovation by Food Service, Date Night, but few real "earth shattering" experiences. No one has to tell you the weekends and weeknights here can be pretty dull; the question is, do they have to be?

A few days ago I was skimming through the 1970 Alfrata and was almost shocked to see how much Juniata has changed socially in the past four years. Although the yearbook could have been misleading, it appeared as if there were many more events for the students to participate in or attend at that time than there are today. For example, in 1970 the students and faculty presented such musicals and plays as "Lion in Winter", "H. M. S. Pinafore", and "This is Your Captain Speaking". Besides that, they had the annual events we still perpetrate like Mountain Day, All Class Night, and the Christmas Dinner (Madrigal). Realizing how slow bureaucracies are to change policy, I couldn't quite believe the administration was solely responsible for the apparent change at Juniata. Perhaps then, the problem does not lie just with the administration. Maybe the students are partly responsible. Granted, this institution could offer more activities but by the same token, a college is not a summer camp. Colleges don't hire program directors to keep you busy every waking minute. Part of the reason most of us come to college is to get away from people telling us what to do. This implies finding your own entertainment sometimes. Also, I've heard some complaints concerning the scarcity of dances. If you are really interested in having more dances on campus, get after your student government representatives. After all, the members of student government are supposedly elected to serve the students. Get them to sponsor a dance. Finally, when college events are sponsored the students should at least try to make an appearance. If we're indifferent about events and there is poor attendance, the sponsors will assume we are not interested. If the event needs some improvement or was a real flop, sug-

Has Juniata Made A Change? The Curriculum — Is It Liberal?

by Bill Brooks

Personally, I am frustrated with conforming to a course syllabus and meeting mandatory deadlines so that I can pass a test on some predetermined date. This enforced structure often negates any incentive the student might have for the subject at the outset of the course. The student should have the perogative to decide which aspects of the subject are worthy of investigation and thought. Classes should be entirely independent studies under the auspices of a professor which would render assistance and guidance when asked for. Feeding the inquisitive mind by the student himself would certainly be more satisfying and rewarding.

Reading "Loco Parentis" by Pear and Teaching as a Subversive Activity in Modes, we were confronted with fallacies and faults of our previous education which were supposedly obscure to us. In the mist of all this we were put under the illusion that somehow college or at least Juniata was different. Believe me, we're still being "infantilized."

Lecture format courses abet the students' frustrations in several ways. The established pace of the course may be directed towards the average student, and thus those who comprehend more rapidly are subject to boredom. On the other hand, some professors cover an abysmal amount of material in ten weeks so that you find yourself bogged down with so much work that you don't enjoy what your doing. Not only that, but the professor's personality often discourages ambition. How about the taperecorder professor who mimics the required readings almost verbatim. When you allow a professor to determine the material you'll supposedly assimilate, you grant him an awesome responsibility. That responsibility is incentive. The brunt of his job, many times is looked at as being superfluous, is to stimulate desires in the student or at minimum sustain their initial eagerness. One of the reasons a student may do poorly in a subject is not because the material is too abstruse, but because he is turned-off by his professor.

When I review class material during a vacation or summer months, heaven forbid, I develop a more profound understanding of the material. Why? The time is available whereby I can check numerous references and obtain a conglomeration of thoughts on a particular subject. The demanding schedule of the student doesn't allow him to do so. Also, you can control the rate at which you absorb the material and eliminate the triviality which the teacher implements so that he can distinguish an "A" from a "B". The paramount advantage of an independent study is self-satisfaction: the satisfaction of procuring knowledge on your own, not the satisfaction of getting a higher grade on a test than your friend because you regurgitate better.

Of course you get many complaints from those traditionalists

Student Lib Amendment

by Brian Smith

On December 18, 1974 there appeared in the Senate Congressional Record a report of a change in the existing law of Protection of the Rights and Privacy of Parents and Students. This was the conference report on the White House Conference On Library and Information Services.

It basically concerns the handling of student educational records. Educational records meaning the records, files, and documents which contain information directly related to the student and are maintained by an educational agency or institution or by a person acting for such agency or institution. If the student is either eighteen or is attending a school of "post-secondary education" permission or consent is required only of the student and the students then take over the same rights their parents had regarding the students' educational records.

What the amendment states is that no funds are to be made available to any educational agency or institution if that agency or institution:

1) does not allow the parent or the student (if 18 or attending a post-secondary school) to inspect the educational records kept on that student that are to be used by the school system or to be made available to parties outside the school system. Also the request must be granted in not more than fourty-five days. If requested, a hearing must be granted to challenge the content of the records, and one can insert a written explanation regarding the content of the records into them.

2) The college cannot make public any directory information without making public the type of information they intend to include in the directory.

3) The college cannot release educational records without written consent of the parents or if applicable the student, with the exception of some cases cited in the amendment itself. This information may be issued in compliance with a court order with the parent or if applicable, the student, notified in advance of the following of the order. Information may also be issued to authorized representatives of the Comtroller General, the Secretary, an administrative head of an educational agency, or state educational

Short But Sweet: Some Ideas On Discrimination

by Chip Lovett

Crispus Attakes was the first man to be killed in the American Revolution in the year 1776. The place, ironic enough, was Boston, where now in 1975 is one of the north's most racial cities.

I turned a page of "Newsweek" two weeks ago and found a picture of a black man running from a mob of whites. This had to be the South, I said to myself. As I read on, I found this incident had taken place in South Boston because white Bostonians refused to desegregate their public high schools. Twenty years ago,white refuse to open their doors to black high schoolers in Little Rock, Arkansas.

I've often heard people and attitudes change with time. I wonder what a black high schooler would think if I had told them this, while he is being escorted to school by the national guards. I wonder what the judges who voted against segregation would say. I also wonder what Martin Luther King would say if he were still alive today.

I feel we must find a way to eliminate all violence and racial tension before we eliminate ourselves. Whites must face the fact that blacks and other minorities are gaining and will continue to gain civil rights. By sit-ins, violence or becoming lawyers and teachers and if necessary — by death.

You tell your children to grow up and make this world a peaceful place to live in. But when you're told to send your children to a different school, you tend to become violent and begin turning school buses over. And when "our" government sends the National Guard to protect us from you — you get upset and start throwing bricks and stones.

The only time we as people like each other is when we're pinned down in a fox hole by a Viet Nam machine gun. Maybe we need another American Revolution so we can fight together instesd of each other. Oh, by the way, in case you didn't know, Crispus Attakes was a black man.

Hello!

I am a student from Juniata who is presently engaged in an urban study in Philadelphia. Today I received a package which had as its return address simply, Juniata College. The package was a booklet about trucks, all kinds— Mack, Peterbuilt, Kenworth— and a message in it which was signed Love, take care, The Mad Gift Giver. I have heard about other people at the college receiving packages similarly signed, but always felt it to be a bunch of hogwash. They claimed that he was from Lynchburg, Virginia, and lived with some strange man who's initials are D.P. Supposedly (as the story goes) he lives wherever love and care abide, and sends gifts to people, to cheer them up and make their day a bit better. I know this may sound a bit out of the ordinary, but I would appreciate it very much if you would print this letter in the next issue of the Juniatian, along with the following message:

Dear Mad Gift Giver (whoever you may be),

Thanks very much for the recent gift I received. You are truly a wonderful person, and I hope you continue your endeavors throughout the world. Again, Thanks, you made my day a lot brighter.

Take care,
Love,
Nancy Kohler

Dear sir,

I can't recall an issue of the JUNIATIAN that has contained information on the Raystown Lake project. Certainly a project of such magnitude is worthy of an article or two if not a complete series. It is not the intent of this letter to inform you of all the facets of the Raystown facility but rather to bring attention to a current issue concerning the dam—hydropower.

A feasibility study, completed in 1965 by the Army Corps of Engineers, showed that hydroelectric power could be generated at Raystown. However, at that time fossil-fuels were economically superior. It is now common knowledge that the acute petroleum situation has stimulated a search for alternative energy sources. A decade after the original findings, the Corps will once again conduct a feasibility study.

The District Engineers' tone already seems to be one of premature confidence—assured that Raystown will soon be generating hydroelectric power. In the near future the Engineers will report their recommendations and public opinions to Congress, who will decide whether of not Raystown will produce power for the area.

It behooves me to agree with the Corps of Engineers, but I think hydropower is in the best interests of central Pennsylvanians. I can not foresee any additional environmental change other than water temperature fluctuations. A hydroelectric installation would not be incompatible with the dam's original goals of flood control and recreation.

If you have definite convictions on the issue, the Baltimore District Corps of Engineers will be holding a public meeting (7:30 P.M., January 29th, Huntingdon Area Middle School). They encourage interested parties to attend, and all statements of important facts will become a part of the official record of this study.

Sincerely,
Perry Habecker

In the article, Along Muddy Run- January 16, 1975, Mr. Seidzikowski has asked the Food Service to reply to his seemingly justified complaints. As co-chairman, along with Ed Hinchey, of the new Food Service Committee of the Student Government, I think it's only fair to offer a reply, point by point.

Henry complains of the lack of eating utensils. The Food Service, aware of the student's habit of taking silverware back to their respective rooms, took steps to counter such action as far back as November. The delivery of additional silverware has been held up since December and has not arrived to date. Are we to blame the Food Service for late shipments or delayed orders?

A number we want to keep in mind is 1050 for that's the number of boarding students here at Juniata.

Name that? You tell us. Send answers to Box 667. Prizes for best answers.

At lunch approximately 800 of this number show, and at dinner 900. The Food Service, having knowledge of these numbers, were prepared in September to provide the students adequete and efficient service. For example they began in September with 1,000 salad bowls and now have less than 150. They started with 1044 drinking glasses and by special order brought in 900 additional. They have lost over 1100 glasses. The breakage factor could not add up to that much.

Let's consider some figures relating to items that have a lower breakage rate, silver. There were 1524 knives in September—700 now, 1700 forks in September—800 now, over 2400 spoons—less than 900 now. The Food Service can't be asked to produce what they don't have. The problem lies in the phenomenal rate at which things are being taken and the slow delivery of the needed replacements.

A worker in the kitchen gave his I.D. to a visiting friend who ate free meals all weekend. It wasn't detected until Sunday. This is why you must present your I.D. at every meal. If someone has a legitimate excuse for not having his or her I.D., Ed Straub has promised to allow that person to eat without their I.D. If the Food Service were to allow people to eat without I.D.'s, it could become a messy habit. For then two people could use the same number in the different lines and the Food Service would have a difficult time distinguishing if that number, being crossed out twice, was not a mistake on the behalf of the checker or a student trying to get in twice.

Mr. Seidzikowski talks of having one choice frequently if he comes to dinner around 5:30. I wonder to what degree does he mean by "unavailable" to describe the above situation. Unavailable for thirty seconds, or two minutes? I grant that there are times when two items are available with the line runner coming with the third selection, but only one available is highly unlikely, especially at 5:30. It must be remembered that at 5:30 both lines are still open and kitchen workers are busy with production for the 6:00 p.m. rush. Does it make sense that three choices are available at 6:00 and but only one at 5:30? The answer may be that while the line runners are coming with the third choice, only two choices are there, one of which you wouldn't personally care for, thus leaving but only one for yourself. The problem is not the Food Service is denying the students three choices, but that some students are denying the Food Service a little patience.

Finally, the case of the cold eggs in the morning and the vegetarian beef stew can be dealt with by getting the verified and consistent complaints to the Food Service Director. Another example Henry speaks of is the dehydrated fish. However, when you cook in quantity you will have the good as well as the bad. It would be absurd to hope for perfect results in every case (every portion of fish) and equally absurd to imagine that every piece of fish was distasteful or "dehydrated". In the case of the dissatisfaction over the preparation of fish, the Food Service has tried numerous methods of preparation to please the greatest number. They batter-fried the fish—they received complaints. They breaded and baked the fish—more complaints. Now they have just baked the fish and it's been called dehydrated.

It's fruitless for me or anyone to hope to defend every action and position of the Food Service, but if the complaints are as numerous as we are led to believe, why don't concerned, paying boarders come to the Food Service meeting Mondays at six o'clock in the Faculty Lounge? I believe that the Food Service is willing to meet your problems and complaints squarely. I will agree that the Food Service has its shortcomings. Nevertheless, I do believe that the students and the Food Service can meet on common grounds, Mondays at six o'clock in the Faculty Lounge. I'll see you there, Henry.

by Henry Siedzikowski

The reaction to my column on the food service was strong and immediate. It has also been very divided. I have found a great deal of agreement with my comments on the quality of the food and the meal ticket situation. However, I received a lot of criticism for mentioning the lack of utensils.

The Food Service has an obvious defense on this point. The sad problem I'm referring to, of course, is the tremendous amount of stealing and destruction going on.

This matter has been referred to in previous issues of this paper, and I hate to belabor a point. However, the pattern of stealing and vandalism on this campus is very disturbing. For those who are looking for more rights and responsibilities for Juniata students, this type of behavior is a constant stumbling block.

I believe it is important for every student to consider this. All of us want to be treated as mature individuals. This type of behavior makes it difficult for anyone to give us this treatment. The problem is ours, and we have to do something about it. It's our choice.

This Week At Juniata

TONIGHT—8:15 P.M. in Oller Auditorium will feature Jose Coronado and Dancers in the Artist Series presentation. Coronado began his training in modern dance at age 15 in Mexico City. After he gained experience with three other Mexican companies, he joined the Mexico's famed Ballet Folklorico as a principal dancer and made several American and world tours.

He also danced in his native country with the late Jose Limon and with Anna Sokolow. Later, he studied with Miss Sokolow in New York. When he found his own company in 1973, its repertoire would include numerous works which she has choreographed.

"Mr. Coronado is one of the most interesting new figures to emerge on the studio of modern dance," a New York Times reviewer remarked after watching one of the performances. Now you are given the opportunity to see for yourself and to pose your opinion. You might not be too late to pick up a free ticket at the information desk.

Other events on the JC campus this week include:

Fellini May Be Difficult But He Is Worth It All!

Warning! From this point on, expect no more unity of plot from any of the term's remaining Fellini films. Beginning with "The Nights of Cabiria," his style has been to construct a film, a character, a mood, out of relatively disassociated episodes, and momentary vignettes of almost surreal lyricism. Many of these vignettes are impossible to forget (such as the conclusion to "Nights of Cabiria") and the whole mood and effect of the films are made by the succession of these episodes.

Which brings us to "La Dolce Vita (The Sweet Life)" which is over three hours of relatively unconnected episodes. In it, we have a view of Rome, a view of the paganistic amorality seeping into every aspect of life in the "eternal city," and, holding it all together, one character—Marcello Rubini—a reporter for a scandal magazine—a leech—a crumbling idealist—an emptying artist. Marcello (played by Marcello Mastroianni) has his sensitivities—he shows it by the book he wants to write; he shows it by his relationship with his father who goes on a drinking binge with him; he shows it by the relationship with a young waitress, a symbol of innocence which he can only turn his back on at the end. But, it is his insensitivities which finally destroy him—he callously ignores a mistress who is continually attempting suicide; he is perplexed by the suicide and infanticide of his intellectual friend, Steiner; he carries a statue of Christ over Rome just to photograph the citizens' reactions. Each episode shows his deterioration of character, until he is lost in the end, totally lost in the moral cesspool symbolized by a cyclopean monster pulled from the sea.

In fact, the sea and all water becomes a symbol in "La Dolce Vita" which can't be ignored. Every episode has its water imagery—abandoned aqueducts, flooded basements, sudden rainstorms, and even a bath in the Trevi Fountain (of "Three Coins in a ". . .fame). It is a symbol which cause Marcello to constantly re-evaluate his morality, and, ultimately, a symbol from which he must turn away (unlike Zampano, who rushes to embrace the sea at the end of "La Strada.")

But this is all pretentious intellectualizing. "La Dolce Vita," like all of Fellini's films, succeeds by the sheer emotional weight of its episodes—the idiotic starlet jumping into the fountain, the pitiousness of the two children who claim to see the Madonna, the paparazzi (photographers) who mob Steiner's wife after his suicide, and, probably my favorite, the sad-eyed clown woefully serenading a loyal cluster of ballons in the nightclub where Marcello takes his father.

It would be unfair for me to tell you that "La Dolce Vita" is an easy film to watch. It isn't. It's more than three hours long, it's in Italian, and it is extremely complex. One is constantly reminded of previous (and future) Fellini films, and anyone going without full possession of all his senses will be bored stiff. But this is what makes it so rewarding, so enjoyable (once you've put forth the effort). It's as if you were part of the creative process, part of the experience.

I finally saw Fellini's newest, "Amarcord," this past weekend, and it needs no effort whatsoever on the part of the audience. There was no central character, but it was still a total joy from start to finish. (I think I'll always remember the scene where mad Uncle Teo is at the top of the tree shouting "I WANT A WOMAN" for five hours). The whole film is rich in humor and lyricism. But, "La Dolce Vita" takes an effort, an honest effort to watch. And, given this effort, it will be an enjoyable and consistently rewarding experience.

Push Button Power Next

I read an article in one of our nation's leading news magazines on our new generation's somewhat rapid decline toward becoming the intellectual illiterates of the future. I felt a spark of fear, if not to be considered concern and a hope, to reverse this tragic situation. This could very possibly be the inevitable condition if we don't take time to re-evaluate our affluent, palatial existence and the consequences thereof.

Man's inherent need to innovate and achieve the ultimate in his potential, to exist in his "crude" environment, and to find the most exclusive technological ingenuity to aid his awesome, "burdened" life, may very well run aground when he sees he can no longer communicate on the most simplistic level imaginable. In the long run, we may awaken to discover that our genius may be indeed deleterious when we consider the ramifications of not being capable of a "meager" existence without the aid of the push of a button. PUSH BUTTON POWER! RIGHT ON!

We have and are "shortcutting" our lives to such an unbelievable degree with our new math, crash courses, easy method this-and-that, and our instant, quick, and easy bag of tricks from easy pour eggs to test tube babies. Getting back to basics is not really a sign of a society in regression, but a sign of an attempt to recall and recognize the fundamental foundations upon which so many essential normative disciplines are to be distinguished and dealt with. The immense productivity of the computer age may well bring the onslaught of our new generation's shrinking ability to even construct a simple grammatically correct sentence, and simple addition and subtraction, without authorities if they need them for th study of educational programs, provided that the materiai obtained will not give information that leads to the identification of the student, and that the information will be destroyed as soon as it is no longer needed.

This is a basic picture of what the law says. An educational institution will not be eligable for funding if it violates anything set forth in the amendment. You, as a student at a college, have the right to review your record and give permission to have it made available to other persons, agencys, or institutions.

gest to the sponsors alternative activities you'd be interested in having on campus.

What I'm trying to say is free time at Juniata can be a drag but, we shouldn't place the blame entirely upon the college. Definitely more activities could and should be sponsored but maybe it's up to the students to make the first move.

Let's Face It, Our Way Of Living Will Have To Change

by Alice Boomhower

In the last issue of the Juniatian two of our more thoughtful students projected the possibility of upcoming war in the Middle East. I too am a prophet of doom, but for somewhat different reasons.

As a chemist, I see daily the economic tragedy of oil. All products that we use or make are oil-related. If it's not the synthetic fibers in our clothes, or the coffee pots we just plug into the wall, it is the heat needed for processing the paper we write on. Such institutions as this college, the assembly line, and farming industry run almost completely on oil.

There is no doubt that other forms of energy are available, but, for these to become our major energy source would mean even greater economic disaster than has been created by a country "that runs on oil."

In the past transportation problems have been our main concern. The luxury of being able to get in the car and drive anywhere we please is our main concern. This is truly unfortunate. What is not realized is that we now rely on oil and its derivatives for the "necessities" of life. As America has become more and more industrialized, we have begun to rely heavily on oil for our food, clothing, and shelter. Our food is planted, reaped, processed, packaged, transported, and sold: each step consuming petroleum. The synthetic fibers in our clothing, the dashboards of our automobiles, and the tops of our desks are all plastics: Polymers which are synthesized from oil.

Unless we have the oil we need, industries will continue to fold, prices will continue to rise, and unemployment become even more widespread. As people completely lose the luxuries of life and begin to scrape for the bare necessities, they become desperate. I imagine that I too will become desperate if I find that there is no job opening for me.

When the Equal Rights Amendment has been passed (as I believe it soon will be) I may be faced with the decision of whether to fight for my country or not. I sincerely hope that I do not have to make this decision.

Ultimately it is going to have to be the government, prodded by the American people who make the decisions. I am not an advocate of "living off the land," but it would appear that we are going to have to revert back to some of this philosophy, and government is going to have to give us the push.

It is the responsibility of each individual to avoid war, death, fear, and desperation by realizing that our way of life can be changed, without loss of happiness, joy, and love, idealistically the things we are all looking for.

Student Government Report

The newly formed Food Service Committee has held two meetings and has made some promising signs. If you haven't noticed the bulletin boards in your dorms and towers, menus have been posted in the hope that you'll be able to see what will be for lunch and dinner. The committee will be running off the menus bi-weekly. In the future the committee is hopeful that concerned students will be able to have input into the menus. Another subject that will be investigated is the possibility of weekend passes for visitors. The greatest job of the committee will be educating the students on the problems of the Food Service. Money used to replace silverware, bowls and glasses can be better spent in having steak nights more often or anything else that encompasses extra expenses. The continuance of vandalism at high rates could result in coercive measures. The committee is hopeful that the students can curb the vandalism and see the direct benefits. All students are urged to attend the Food Service Meetings, Monday at 6:00 in the Faculty Lounge.

Student Concerns has the health service surveys out. Information received from these surveys will be important and can help to strengthen any weak aspects and reinforce the strong points of our health service. Please reply and return the survey. A survey to possibly find out why students split on weekends should be interesting and should be out soon, presently it's in the hands of Jim Gerek. Course Evaluation Booklets for the Spring are prepared and ready for sale (25¢). It will be just a short while before the Fall Course Evaluations will be out, also. Take advantage of this opportunity, because these evaluation booklets have excellent and helpful data.

In the premier of "Hell from Shell" the interest shown by the students and the student senators was challenged. As for the Student Government, meetings will be held in different dormitories and I don't see how closer we can bring the meetings. On the other hand, Senators are now aware of the Accountability Amendment that makes it possible to now impeach any member of the Student Government. I hope that participation and interaction between the Senate and the student can stimulate soon. Women's awareness is potentially one of the most exciting ventures ahead. The thought of a Women's Government of any number has been worthwhile and rewarding. Any young women interested contact Steve Cordova or Jim Messner before the first meeting, February 9. We already have some good people

In writing, it is my hope to further clarify my intention in writing the first article which appeared in the Juniatian last December, and to undo any misunderstanding.

First of all, it was not my intent to criticize personally any or all the doctors at J. C. Blair. These doctors provide an invaluable service not only to Huntingdon but also to us in the college community. This service is, medical care, which we should appreciate for when someone is injured we have someplace nearby to go to recieve treatment. The doctors at J. C. Blair are all qualified doctors and I did not in any way intend to malign their professional reputation. Also, in all fairness to them, I feel I should say that I have since discovered that it is difficult to diagnose appendicitis.

However, while I had no Malice towards anyone whatsoever in writing the first article, and would apologise to anyone for any misunderstanding, I did mean to constructively call attention to what may be a serious problem that any hospital might wish to investigate.

Indians Stopped 67-45; Williams Reaches 1000

by A. D. Wirt

Bucknell Game

Saturday was college basketball day across the nation for those of you who didn't know. The day marked the birthday of the first basketball game ever played, which occured a long time ago up in Springfield, Massachusetts. Also, Juniata lost to Bucknell 67-45!

But if the founding father of basketball, Dr. James Naismith, could have been on hand here Saturday night, he might have been a little discouraged with the type of game that was played. The lopsided fray was marked by pitiful shooting and a few near-brawls. To be particular, Juniata could only manage to convert 20% of the ir shots into scores during the whole first half. The hapless Indians were out-rebounded 43-28, to add to their list of troubles. Coach Meditchs forward-oriented squad came up short this game, as starting forward Bill Bickel fouled out early with zero points, and leading scorer Donnie Williams had a season low of just eight.

The home crowd did have something to cheer about, despite the score, when Williams tossed in his 1,000th career point. The game was stopped at that point, and he was awarded the game ball, which sent the fans to their feet for perhaps the last time.

It should be noted however, that the Indians did not lose to any ordinary patsy. Bucknell has a strong ball-club, that as of now has won six straight games. The Bison's raised eyebrows across the nation when they beat national power Pittsburgh, and stuck with gigantic Penn State until overtime, before finally succumbing to the Nittany Lions.

Reserve Tim Tabor led all scorers for Juniata with 11 points, and guard Greg Ruffo added 10 points towards Juniata's total of 45.

For Bucknell, it was their 6-8 center who made the difference, with 15 of his teams 67 points, and a game leading 13 rebounds.

Perhaps now that the Indians have the bad game out of their system, and leading scorer Donnie Williams has broken the 1,000 point jinx, the Blue and Gold can regroup and put it together for the second half of the season.

Juniata's record at press time stands at 7-5 pending the outcome of Tuesday's game with Grove City. The next home game will be Saturday, February 1st against Albright. Keep up those big rowdy crowds—that's what college basketball is all about, even if it's not "mature!"

the aid of our mini-computers. I feel that it is only fitting and proper that in a society that boasts for change through technology and adaptability, that we should also contemplate our ability to maintain a kind of tenacity, to cling to certain known "traditions" or remnants of the past that actually dictate the necessary prerequisites for fundamental but vital needs, from which we base all that man has created. Unless we stop for a moment and look at our existence in the purest and most unadulterated sence we may very well be in such a lethal predicament as to have ranked among our nostalgic experiences the art of speaking and writing the English language (or maybe I should say "American"). We must absolve to ourselves that as we imbibe the pethora of goods and wealth of life we are committed, in a personal sense, in our continued mortal existence by the totality of our integrity of mind from the simplistic to the most complex as we evolve.

Grapplers Pinned, Denison Victor

by John Paulshock

Last Saturday, the Juniata matmen were downed once again, but the meet was far from a runaway as the young squad is now beginning to exhibit its fine individual talent. The Indians hammered twenty-one points, but to no avail as St. Francis over-powered them by a 28-21 margin; six of the seven deciding points coming from a forfeit in the 118 lb. class.

Individually, five grapplers from Juniata profited by tallying victories. Brian Ashworth registered six points when he annhilated his opponet in the second period, and scored the only Indian fall of the meet; time, 4:30. Steve "animal" Denison was easily muscleing his path to a win when he earned six points by default; the St.Francis 126 pounder injuring his ankle. The lone senior of the team, Mark Brown, then added a third win in a row for J.C. when he was victorious on a most controversial one point decision. At 177 pounds, Steve Shultis handed his competitor a 13-6 defeat after he had earlier in the match strained his shoulder.

The highlight, and perhaps the most entertaining spectacle came in the heavyweight bout, where 158 pounder, Bill Bruner, took on the big boy from St. Francis. Bruner just returned to the mats after nursing an ailment, and proceeded to toss his man for three periods and score a decision by a tally of 8-7, the winning point being gained from riding time.

Misfortune was befallen upon Gary Moeller, Ron Nickle, and Mike Hanselman, as the three were victims of their opponents and suffered pins. Steve Harper was a scrapegoat of the referee, and was pounded by a wide margin, and lost in a four point decision.

A summary of the meet reveals the following.

118 lbs.—St. Francis won by forfeit score (6-0)

126 lbs.—Steve Denison won by default (6-6)

134 lbs.—Brian Ashworth won by fall (6-12)

142 lbs.—Mark Brown won by decision (6-15)

150 lbs.—Gary Moeller lost by fall (12-15)

156 lbs.—Ron Nickle lost by fall (18-15)

167 lbs.—Steve Harper lost by 4 pt. decision (22-15)

177 lbs.—Steve Shultis won by decision (22-18)

190 lbs.—Mike Hanselman lost by fall (28-18)

Hvywt.—Bill Bruner won by decision

Final Score: St. Francis 28 — Juniata College 21

Overall, Coach Berrier's "Bears" put on quite an exciting performance, and split the competition by winning five matches out of the ten weight classes. Freshmen Denison, Ashworth, and Bruner were most impressive, and set a much welcome precedent of winning style for the future. Veterans Brown and Shultis both made their presence and strength known with fine wrestling.

The afternoon was also haunted by what can always be a drag, and that is a poor referee. Saturday's mat official accounted for miserable and distressing moments for both schools, as he blundered about each match with his "blind-sighted" calls. Thanks ref!

The Indians have a tough schedule to finish their 1974-75 season with, and any further injuries could greatly hinder the team. The young squad is, however, on the up-grade, and could suddenly become a strong M.A.C. contender.

Made A Change

who fear change. How would the faculty regulate the scope of the material so that a student wishing to pursue his education would have a ghost of a chance passing GRE's? Would this system hurt the academic reputation of Juniata? By what means would the faculty evaluate student progress? The answer to the first question is the faculty should not put restrictions on the scope of the material. It all boils down to the student adjusting to these new liberties. Would the student take advantage of such a system? If the betterment of his education is not enough incentive, the not so nominal fee of about $4,000 should provide the impetus. Then again, if the student did not know how to handle these new responsibilities it wouldn't be surprising. He's never given responsibilities in the first place. Secondly, who cares about the academic reputation of Juniata. We should be concerned with our personal education. The institution, Juniata, was not created to produce an aura of prestige, but to serve its tutelage, you and I. To have a diploma from a reputable college is poppycock unless you can truly admit to yourself that you have achieved something. I don't have a resolution to the question of grades, but one thing is for sure, the fundamental purpose of these evaluations has to change. They must test the quality of comprehension, not the quantity.

The independent study system would appease some of the frustrations emanating from the lecture format system.

the Smothers Brothers came back and Evil Kneivel didn't.

Since it seems to me that few of these world, national, and local situations are likely to change (at least for the better) in the next eleven months. So it's time to say goodbye to the old year of 1975, and to look hopefully ahead toward 1976, year of our nation's bicentennial and Juniata's own centennial. Let's hope that it is an improvement.

P.S. Nostalgia Quiz Question #1: What ever happened to Patty Hearst?

A Little From Moore

by Gary Wayne Moore

Monday evening I interviewed junior Stephen Cordova who is a school senator and a participant in I.M.'s. I asked him about his thoughts concerning the present and popular Intramual Program. Not wanting to be formal for Steve's a good friend of mine, I asked him to speak openly and freely, as if he were writing this article:

". . ." there's not enough which can be said for I.M.'s. This year in particular, has created more excitement, enthustiasim, and competition than ever before. I'm especially pleased with the large number of women participants, and the Co-Rec teams. The Co-Rec teams are no longer just girlfriend and boyfriend, but real competitors.

If you walk through the gym at night you see not the student athlete, but simply the student. An important thing to remember here, is that I.M. students can learn to appreciate the varsity sports more. But then too, there must be some reciprocity here. Some persons think that I.M.'s are a field day. Don't believe it. They've got teams who devise different strategies and plays, just to stop a certain opponet.

Varsity athletics aren't for everyone. I've tried it, and personally it didn't carry enough for me. I was turned off by the group therapy thing. You know, eat meals together, take showers together— always for the good of the team. I'm more into the individual.

The I.M. Program is coming on it's own. Coach Reiley, and the I.M. Department should be applauded for their efforts. They've all worked very hard to expand the I.M. Program. The students, and myself included, enjoy the opportunity to acquire a sound body, and a sound mind."

Thanks for your time Steve.

Referring To The Newsletter Why All The Problems ?

by Jon Streich

Last week we received a "Student Affairs Newsletter" informing us of the growing concern over the behavior of some students regarding various issues including damage to college property, disrespect for other students' rights in the residence halls, and a general disregard for some college policies. Also, in that same newsletter, was the following statement: "It would be unfortunate if the unthinking, irresponsible behavior of some would lead to the restriction of the privileges of those who have used privileges wisely."

Some students (not just a few) have not been able to study in their residence halls during frequent periods of the week, including of course, weekends. Several students in the various dorms have not been able to get to sleep because of the excessive noise. This can be regarded as irresponsible behavior on the part of the "noisemakers". In several residence halls the visitation policy has been non-existent at various times. When people get pushed out of their rooms because a roommate's friend is staying for awhile, then someone is being inconsiderate.

This past weekend was an exceptionally quiet time. Maybe everybody was studing, or maybe they were having a good time at Casino Night. At any rate, there weren't too many parties. But there were a few. And sure enough, there were a few irresponsible individuals involved. Several fire extinguishers were discharged, firecrackers delight (at 2:30 A.M.), and some other degrading consequences. I think that type of behavior is uncalled for. Most people also feel that way, but those few continue doing it. Certainly, the irresponsible 'responsible' persons are a minority. And ever since I was a kid I've been told that privileges have been taken away from the majority, because of the actions of the minority, many times. Will this be another time?

Student Government Report

by Public Relation Committee

This week Student Government has been actively involved in dealing with the issues that effect the student body. These issues vary from student apathy to misuse of student services and have given rise to two new and promising committees.

One such committee is "Survival" which will hopefully find solutions to the issues of student destruction, apathy, and the "weekend pack your bags, leave campus routine". "Survival" is probably going to be one of the crucial committees formed this year by Student Government. It will consist of twenty-five students who are not currently involved in any other Student Government committees; this will help increase student involvment. "Survival will be organized by those students who sign up so, please get involved; help your fellow students. You can sign up on the sheet in front of Student Government Office or see Jim Messner—box 128, Bill Mcgrath—box 1092 or Todd Lins—box 1665. It is your chance for involvement.

So how did you like tearing the steaks apart with your fingers last Wednesday due to the shortage of knives? Or how about getting up three or four times for something to drink because of the glass shortage? So why don't you do something about it and come to the Food Service Meeting Monday at 6 P.M. in the faculty lounge. We'll welcome your suggestion not only about these issues but about any area of food service.

A letter was sent by Jeff Wood of Dorm Government to the Accounting Office mentioning some repairs needed in some of the dorms and houses. The Accounting Office has informed us that the problems will be alleviated in the near future.

Minicourses May Be Offered

by Alice Boomhower

In the past four years at Juniata, there have been changes in the educational goals of the students. No longer do students take a smattering of everything in order to attain a "Liberal Arts" degree.

With the "New Program" atJuniata, there are no divisional requirements. Students are forced to write a program in their "major" field of emphasis, and take the courses they justify as pertinent to that field, but other than these 15 units, and the required HEA and HEH's there are really no bounds on elective courses.

Idealistically, this seems keyed to the individual and if a student choses wisely she can attain a "liberal" education. But, realistically, this does not happen. For example, an individual with a POE in Division I or II may desire to take a science course, but is afraid to because she thinks she does not have the background needed to keep her grade up in the course. Science students are a little luckier. There is an attitude in Division III that a science student needs to take courses in both the humanities and social sciences. Often it is suggested by advisors that a student take one course per term that is not involved in the science program.

This is indeed an unfortunate attitude. As a science major, I enjoy taking a course not involved in my POE, simply because I want to know a little more about a topic.

In an effort to cut across some of these boundaries, there is a plan for the spring term to set up a group of non-credit mini-courses. These courses will be taught by members of the college community; students, faculty, and administration. They will be held primarily in the evenings. It is hoped that these courses will be fun as well as educational. Suggested courses are: Card Games, The Care of Plants, Organic Cookery, Hadicrafts, several different courses on how to play inexpensive musical instruments, and any other courses that are requested.

A Social Trilogy - Results As "Us" ?

by Bob Meacham

In our lifetime we have gone through two distinct stages of perception in viewing our role in relation to others around us. In the late fifties and early sixties people now of college age were caught up in a movement I have labeled as the period of "Self as Others." Reflected largely in modes of dress and leisure time activity, this period overly manifested itself in the form of madress belts, John Romain pocketbooks and the Beach Boys. Young people were concerned with fitting in with the status quo. To be different was to be odd and individuality was akin to the kiss of social death. Everyone was reflected in each other and sameness and behavior as a whole was the norm.

Next we moved into a period of moral responsibility and persuit of individual desire. Spurred on by the focus of morality on the Vietnam War, as well as the breaking from boredom generated by the sameness of "Self as Others", the semi-sameness of nonconformity became the norm. The social role became one of questioning and forcing the establishment to answer. The late sixties brought many answers and this new found knowledge served as a stepping stone on which to build upon the permeating idea of pursuit of individual well being and interest. By the early seventies we found ourselves in a period I have labeled the "Self and Others". This pursuit of individual interest motivated sociatal segmentation into specialized interest groups such as the Gay Liberationists and Woman's Libbers. Anyone who had a gripe rightfully made that gripe public and worked to eliminate flaws in our system which sanctioned and perpetuated oppression and inequality. The socialization process became one of harvesting an attitude of everyone for himself and pursuit of individual happiness became the norm.

Both the periods of the "Self as Others" and the "Self and Others" served to enhance the human condition in the United States. An awareness of how others mold us enabled recognition of how one could break out of the pre-cast molding to assume control of one's life.

However, it is my contention that the period of "Self and Others" must be finalized and move into a yet to be actualized period termed simply "Us." The idea of pursuit of individual happiness has soaked down to the barest level of individual behavior. While on a broader surface level our society gives the impression of working for harmony through interest groups working for the benefit of other interest groups, individually we often seem to be working against each other. Individualness is many times expressed without the slightest indication of consideration on how that individualness prevents similar expression in others. At times, everyday interaction resembles a tug of war between vested interests.

Although I generally wish to avoid bombardment of Juniata College analogies, I think their presentation is pertinent as actions which exemplify the need for energence into the period of "Us".

Individuals rip off cafeteria supplies and book store commodities in a reflection of pursuit for their individual desire. As a result, others are plagued with barriers of inconvenience and cost which complicate their individual life situation. Destruction of individual properties by other unthinking individuals seems to be commonplace in parking lots and dormitories. People are doing what they want to do and it is costing others.

Expression with previous, concerned, thought accompanying that expression will be the generality which will mark the completion of the social trilogy I have constructed. Fortunately, we live in a substructure of society in which "Us" is a possible reality. Upon leaving Huntingdon, if we were equipped with experience in operating under "Us", it is a distinct possibility that each and every one of us could help to generalize this concerned type of behaving to the social sub-structures in which we will operate. It would be pleasing to see my optimism reinforced.

Satisfaction In Urban Study It's Made Readily Apparent!

by Tom Kutz

[note: leader by Marlyn Hoover]

Angel, one of my fifth graders, loved science, but that was it. He'd hide in the coat rack, behind the door, or sneak to the library rather than go to art, music or math class. Ishmael would "kung fu" everybody within foot or arm distance. Ay-ya! and there was Ishmael's hand in your face. Margarita, out of all the girls, never stood for it. She'd whack him over the head with a ruler. Maria and Luz listened only when they felt like it. And when they didn't, it was because "you aren't my mother". Roberto followed me like an adoring puppy. As tired as I got having him constantly under my heels, he could make me smile no matter what my mood. When I'd lean to talk to James, he'd, in an instant, duck and roll to the other side of the room. Thirty-two kids, difficult days, good days, frustrating moments and joyous moments.

Mike, owner of the luncheonette on the corner, in a heavy foreign accent, bade me "sit down, have a cup of tea, relax after a hard day", even if I just stopped in for a pack of gum. A lady on the trolley once woke me to be sure I hadn't missed my stop. One cold day a newspaper vendor, peddling his papers in the street, suggested that I wait for the bus in the shelte: of his stand. Three teenage girls challenged our right to be in their neighborhood by throwing rocks, three men on the street challenged their right to throw rocks.

All this and more constitutes the city, a system of human interaction. I lived in this network of lively and blase, frightening and friendly, apathetic and emphathetic, loving and hating relationships for fifteen weeks, studying and working under the Great Lakes College Association Urban Semester program. Four days a week I worked in a public school with fifth graders. On the fifth day I attended a half day seminar during which we studied the city, integrating our living and working experiences with sociological perspectives of the course work.

Someone in my seminar described the city as a ballet. Each person dances his part, flowing smoothly in and out of the other dancers, falling into the movements of the office choreography and then assuming the movements that take the dancer home again. The network of dancers interweave to create a smooth, intricate ballet. It was exciting to be part of that ballet for those several weeks and it was as valuable a learning experience as only first-hand participation can be.

The above was Marlyn Hoover's experience in the city of Philadelphia which she found through the Urgan Studies program. Just what is this program? The most general way to describe it is as a chance to do something different. A change from the three classes a day grind, the constant booking, and most of those tests and papers.

Coordinated through the College of Wooster's Urban Studies Program or the G.L.C.A. Philadelphia provide Juniata Students with a Urban Semester; this program can chance to combine academic study with working and living in an urban enviroment. This is done while interning in any one of over one hundred job arrangments in thirteen different cities such as Philadelphia, Portland, or Birmingham. Like

The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name. It is also requested that all letters be double spaced with 70 spaces per line.

Dear Mr. Gillen:
I weep for mankind's future when I read the offerings of the "cream of our youth" who are privileged to develop their minds and then miss the boat. To write and print articles such as appeared on the front page of a December issue of The Juniatian does not take brains nor a high cost education, just thoughtlessness, immaturity, and a desire to show off. Such a waste, when youth today can enjoy the higher levels of learning and creativity and have the opportunity to perpetuate the ideals that can elevate instead of spewing words of degradation.
True, pornography exists because it appeals to the base instincts of the ready market. So be it.
However, as a minority of one perhaps, I am exercising my responsibility of choice be requesting my subscription be cancelled and money refunded. (Subscription is in name of Joan Thilly (sic) Harmon, RD 6, Danville, Pa.) Please send refund to me, the undersigned. I have better use for my money.

Doing my laundry in dormitory laundry rooms can get to be pretty darned expensive. Last year a number of articles of my clothing mysteriously disappeared from South's laundry room. I'm sure others have experienced similar magical disappearances of clothing from various campus laundry rooms. Again this year, about 2 weeks ago, some more of my clothing disappeared from South's laundry room. I ask that this letter be printed for the sake of all students who have had illusive laundry experiences.

To the proud owner of my new toe socks, my semi-new jeans, my bra and my laundry detergent:

I am bummed out and pissed off. I feel real sorry for anyone whose wardrobe is so slim that it must be supplemented with stolen clothing. The new additions belonging to me that you may discover in your drawer or closet include 1) my new stripped toe socks (These were a gift from my little sister who scraped and saved lunch money that she might buy me a Christmas present) 2) my semi-new Naudungaree jeans (These are — I should say "were" — my favorite pants that I scraped and saved for that I might have one nice pair of jeans) 3) my bra (I honestly can't figure this one out. The socks and jeans, I can understand that. . . but my bra! ! At any rate, things will be a bit awkward for me now that I have only one bra) and 4) my laundry soap (may it get your clothing whiter than it got mine.)

I hope these new clothes and the detergent help you through the year. This all may seem very petty to you, but, as I don't even have enough money to finish school this year, replacement of these items will be next to impossible for me. Please think of me as you wear or give away or whatever the hell you plan to do with my clothing — oh — if you should feel moved to return my clothing, I should be quite pleased to find my socks, my jeans, my bra and even my detergent in the laundry room of South in the near future.

Student Government RA Survey Results

by Mike McElhinney

The Student Concerns Committee of the Student Government conducted a survey of all 30 Resident Assistants on campus in order to hear and publicize just what their feelings are about the current R.A. policy and about being an R.A. Mike McElhinney, a member of the Student Concerns Committee, interviewed each of the 30 R.A.s individually between December 10th and December 19th, 1974. The same five questions were asked of all the R.A.s and after responding in the manner prescribed by each question, the R.A. had the option of making any additional comment he desired. The questions and responses are given below.

1. The purpose of the Resident Assistant, as stated in the Juniata College Handbook, is ". . .to create a positive and meaningful atmosphere for living and learning.". . . and ". . .to help to interpret the goals and policies of Juniata, and when necessary, enforce College regulations." Do you think the present R.A. system fulfills this purpose?

Number responding "Yes":
26 out of 30, 87%
Number responding "No":
4 out of 30, 13%
Comments:
"The students make it unbearable for us to do our job at times."
"Enforcement of rules was the primary function prior to the change in enforcement of the drinking policy. Now they're (the administration) getting more towards the main goals of the program."
"To create a positive atmosphere needs cooperation."
"You can't do as much counseling as you'd like to."
"With the relaxed enforcement the administration is not hypocritical. They are dealing with the situation as it really is."
"With the new relaxed enforcement you can get closer to the students and do the job you are suppose to do."
"As the year goes on, the R.A. job will get better; it will fulfill its purpose better."
"I definitely think it fulfills the first part of the stated purpose but not the second."
"Under the old system of enforcement it was impossible to fulfill this purpose but now it is."

2. From your point of view, is the present R.A. policy more desirable, equally desirable, or less desirable than the R.A. policy of last year?

Number responding "More desirable":
19 out of 30, 63%
Number responding Equally desirable":
5 out of 30, 17%
Number responding "Less desirable":
5 out of 30, 17%
Note: One respondent was not here last year and therefore had no basis for comment.
Comments:
"The policy was less desirable before the change in enforcement but now it is more desirable."
"I like having a director of the R.A.s and the rover policy with the enforcement change, things which we didn't have last year."
"This year there is a closer relationship between the R.A. and student."
"The students view the R.A.s more negatively than they did last year."
"Before the change in enforcement, the present policy was less desirable but, now it has improved to the point where it is equally desirable."

3. Do you think R.A.s are a necessary part of life at Juniata College? In other words, could they be eliminated?

Number responding "Yes, they are necessary"
27 out of 30, 90%
Number responding "No, they are not necessary":
3 out of 30, 10%
Comments:
"The R.A. is necessary to keep things "cool" between everyone and also serves as an important link between the administration and the students."
"You need some type of focal point. If there were no R.A.s the rules would be too removed from the students."
"I think it is important that there's someone for the students to go to that is in his own age group."
"R.A.s are especially necessary for freshmen."
"They are important to relay information between deans and students."
"R.A.s are important but I think the administration is phasing them out."

4. Do you see yourself working primarily for the students, of whom you are one, or for the administration, which pays your salary? Could you answer this by giving a ratio between the two?

Students— Administration
Average: 67—33
Most frequently given: 74—25
(answer given by 8 R.A.s)
Extremes (high): 99—1
(answer given by 1 R.A.)
Extremes (low): 40—60
(answers given by 4 R.A.s)
Comments:
"We're working more with the students because we don't place the same amount of importance on things that the administration does."

5. Have you ever enforced rules, or warned people about violating rules, which you have been guilty of violating yourself?

Number responding "Yes":
8 out of 30, 27%
22 out of 30, 73%
Comments:
"I've warned people not to get caught."
"You must warn people about the rules but you can't rule with an iron hand."
"I live by the rules I enforce."
"I don't enforce the rules of the college strictly and I don't follow them strictly but the rules I enforce I follow."

After each interview was completed the R.A. had the option of making any additional comments he desired to. They were as follows.
"I wish the students would get straight just what the roving policy is. We've not out just to bust

(Along Muddy Run)

by Henry Siedzikowski

Two weeks ago, I wrote an article on the food service. This article brought a heavy and varied response. The most apparent one was Mr. Cordova's letter which appeared in last week's issue of the paper. In his letter, he attempted to refute my points by providing statistics and other interesting information on the food service.

It is not my intention to argue any of these points. Along with other related articles that may appear in this paper, the students must sift through all the varied data, and come to his or her own conclusions. My purpose in writing the article was not to discredit the food service. I merely wanted to start a debate that might provide "food" for thought for those of us who depend on the food service for the substance of our everyday existence.

This brings us right to the point. Mr Cordova ended his letter with a challenge to me to be at the next food service committee meeting. It has also been pointed out to me numerous times in the last two weeks that I should take my complaints to these committee meetings before publicizing them in print. Well, I wish to state for the record, that I have not attended a food service committee meeting this year, nor do I intend to.

There are reasons for this behavior. In my three and a half years here, I have served on at least a dozen committees. Last year, I was chairman of the food service committee. From this experience I have become convinced of the uselessness of a lot of committees, especially those of the imformation—feedback variety, such as the food service committee.

Last year, I cannot recall any meeting where more than ten people attended. Even if ten people went back and told four people each what happened, that still leaves only fifty people with the information. . On a campus of over a thousand, this is not a significant percentage.

If you consider all the time wasted on covering details and just talking, it does not really make sense to utilize these types of committees. For the time put in, you do not get significant results.

I do not offer this as an excuse. I think there is an interesting proposal that follows from it. That is, the next time a campus issue arises, and I'm sure there are many waiting in the wings, we should not rush to form a committee to handle it. Rather, we could utilize our "mass media", the Juniatian and WJC, to debate the issue, and bring things home to the entire campus. Apathy exists, but taking the trouble to overcome the inconveniences, might be a way of beating it.

Moves Being Made To Conserve JC's Energy

During the last year the energy problems facing the nation and Juniata College have become readily apparent. For years energy conservation has been an ecologically sound program. With the Arab oil embargo, conservation now is an economic and political necessity. In many areas energy costs have doubled in the last year, and some forms of energy (like the natural gas we use in our boilers) have become exceedingly scarce. Any steps that can be taken at the local level to conserve energy will have a positive impact not only on the national problem but also on the financial well-being of Juniata. As a progressive, liberal arts institution, Juniata has the opportunity and the obligation to act as a leader in the local community.

This is the second year of Juniata's Energy Conservation Committee which was established by President Stauffer to facilitate communication among the students, staff, faculty and administration. The committee is chaired this year by Gretchen Sencindiver, Judy Lerman and William Vocke. The other members include: Caroline Becker, William Berrier, John Gager, Gary Gillen, Carl Glaeser, Betty Kenyon, Cynthia Mather, Walt Nadzak, Kenneth Rabenstein, Philip Sipling, Sam Sirianni and Cynthia Smith. Please feel free to contact any of the members on energy saving matters.

The immediate plans of the committee include setting up a suggestion box in Ellis Hall. Watch for it near your mailbox in the basement. You are welcome to submit any suggestion you feel will help the college save energy. Also, an individual in each building will act as a liaison between the college community and the committee. Plans for an "Energy Conservation" bulletin board are in the works. Here you will find information on how you may help us save energy. A list of energy saving hints is now being prepared by Phil Sipling and Ken Rabenstein.

Watch for further information about the committee's work and weekly energy hints in the Juniatian.

Real Treat - Two Movies To Be Seen This Week!

by Brad Rudy

Once upon a time, and a long time ago it was, there lived two neighbors. They had names, but I can't remember them, so I'll just call them neighbor #1 and neighbor #2, okay? Anyway, they owned the two biggest houses in the neighborhood. Each of them had a toy they called "the bomb" that they liked to play with all the time. And you know how grown-ups are with their toys! Each of them wanted the biggest and the best and the most. It's what they called "keeping up with the Joneses" (or, the Solzhenitsyns, as the case may be).

Well, anyway, one day, some of the kids in house #1 decided to pay house #2 a visit with their bombs. This wasn't very nice, was it? Well, you know how delightfully mischievous some children can be! Anyway, the father in house #1 got very upset when he heard about this. He knew that if the children succeeded, the father in house #2 would come over and punch him in the nose. He liked his nose very much, so he really didn't want this to happen. So, he called up the father in house #2, and said, "Hello. How are you? That's nice. And how's your wife?.. Really? Both of them? That's really a shame!. . . Anyway, I'd have called sooner, but I've been very, very busy. . .You too? I'm sorry to hear that!. . .Yes, yes, I know, the pressures are enormous, aren't they? Oh, by the way, my kids are coming over to bomb the shit out of you. . .now, don't get upset. . . please don't get upset. . .you're getting upset. . . . .What?. . .You've got a. . .Oh, that is bad. . . Well, if you can, you have my permission to spank the children yourself and send them right home before they. . well, I'll do everything I can, too."

Now, I don't have to tell you what happened, do I? One of the kids threw his bomb. It blew up. Now, can you guess what neighbor #2 has that's making neighbor #1 so upset? It was a brand-new toy called a doomsday device. Doesn't that sound like fun? When the bomb blew up, it turned the new toy on, which sort of works like a set of dominoes or even one of those Rube Goldberg machines. The first bomb blew up, and that caused another bomb to blow up, which caused another bomb to blow up, which caused another bomb to blow up, which caused another bomb to blow up, which caused another bomb to blow up, and so on, until there was no one or nothing left in the whole neighborhood. Isn't that a fun toy? Wouldn't you like to have one just like it? Of course you would! Lucky neighbor #2! Lucky neighbor #1! Lucky neighborhood! Now, go to sleep and you will be able to dream about your very own doomsday device.

We would like to thank former President Harry S. Truman, Enrico Fermi, The Manhattan Project, Joseph Stalin, the United States Armed Forces, and Stanley Kubrick, without whom, all of this would not have been necessary!

Special reminder—On Saturday Night, "Walking Tall" will be shown along with an hour-long documentary on "The Making of 'Butch Cassidy & the Sundance Kid," which shows the processes behind the filming of a major movie and features interviews with the stars and director. This will start at 9 P.M. in Oller Hall, and, if the basketball game is not over by the end of it, we'll hold up the start of "Walking Tall" so you sports fans can join us movie freaks. Admission is only $1.00 for the entire evening, so, don't miss it.

"Values" - Moral Anarchism At JC?

by Steve Townsend

During the course of our four years at Juniata, the term "value" is one which most of us hear on a more or less regular basis. We are introduced to their existence when only freshmen. The word is further delineated during the course of two "value centered units". H.E.A. even goes so far as to subject us to an entire ten weeks of ruthless value confrontations. In short, our entire education is structured around a vital, controversial core of values.

As students it becomes our decision either to reject this concept as an intrusion upon sacred ground, or, to integrate ourselves, and our education, into this moral web. This student is very biased about the later option. In fact, I am truly convinced that Juniata may be offering us the only dangerously revolutionary opportunity we will ever face. This rather rash statement may need some explanation.

During the development of the present program, Juniata was fortunate enough to recognize "values" for what they actually represent. That is, the school came to look upon values as premises of action, moral presuppositions underlying all himan behavior. They rejected the notion that values were merely strongly held intellectual beliefs. In doing so, the college has assumed that action and value exist in a cause/effect relationship. Thus, behavior becomes completely explainable, almost individually deterministic: the program assumes no action exists independently of one's values.

Of even greater importance than this operationalization of the term, is the realization that singular values are not of equal importance. It becomes their contention that values exist within a specified hierarchy. The upper values in this arrangement being the behavioral premises upon which all personally meaningful action is based. Lower moral presuppositions become, to a greater extent, of only situational importance. In other words, values can be listed on a one through infinity scale of importance. Value number 2 effects action only in so as value number one is not logically jeopardized. This arrangement exists throughout the scale. The further down the list one progresses, the less likelyhood being that any individual action was based upon that particular premise.

However, this hierarchy is not thought to be ridgidly frozen. Lower values may progress upward and higher ones are subject to decay. In short, a person may under go a radical transformation. This is the revolutionary aspect of our program.

By professing that one's values are subject to a constant reordering process, Juniata has by implication denied the existence of absolutes. Under a framework such as this nothing is Right or sacred, nothing is Wrong or amoral, for today's sacrilege may become tomorrow's cherished value!

The question now exists as to why such a system is revolutionary? Has not science operated upon the premise that absolutisms were non-existent? Darwins evolutionary theories were certainly of this sort; they attacked a very basic value of the times. However, most scientific action has remained content to exist within the parameters of society's moral limit.

By comparison, Juniata's value centered program, if carried to its logical completion, can never exist within a moral framework. It forces persons to realize the presuppositions underlying society's basic order And because of it's realization that these presuppositions are subject to death and decay, it forces a questioning of such certainties. Thus, the kind of revolutionary confrontations conjured up by Darwin, become, upon a smaller scale, a way of life for those well versed in the true nature of "Values".

Persons equipped with the knowledge and willingness to carry on such value assaults are more than revolutionary, they are nothing less than moral anarchists. They will assault the very dominance of God. They will lash out at the heart of patriotism. They will even challange those traditional sexual norms of monogomy and heterosexuality. Indeed, they are a dangerous threat to every institution and relationship dependent upon such assumptions for they strike at the essence of legitimacy.

But is this necessarily bad? In an era of rapid change and uncertainty, we must ask ourselves probing questions concerning the practicality of the present social order. Often times these questions are not probing enough. So the job of cleansing away outmoded attitudes and institutions thus falls to the "moral Anarchists". They become the spark that ignites the fire of change. As such, these persons are an extremely valuable element of society. It is both ironic and interesting to note that Juniata offers all of us the opportunity to join this select group.

Urban Study

Marlyn, a student can choose to do something in education. Other areas such as social work, legal services, or medical services are also open to people interested in the program. And the agency which the person would work in can come from a list ranging from the Pennsylvania Bureau of Consumer Protection to the Booth Maternity Center. Internships in law offices, health services, wealfare organizations, or government agencies are all possibilities — the student does the choosing.

But the Urban Studies program is more than just a chance to study off campus, it is an entire living experience. The people in the program aren't stuck in some city college dorm. Instead they find their own apartment and roommate (with the help of the programs' coordinators). It is an opportunity to learn to live and function in the city.

There is no less of school credits either. The Urban Studies program has now been granted the same status as the Washington and United Nations Semesters available at J.C. Through the actual work experience and the academic study that goes with it three units of credit are earned. At the completion of the program these credits are transfered to Juniata. Also, there is no real hassle with the cost of the program. The tuition is just about the same as Juniata's. The room and board also come out about equal.

All in all, the program offers the people involved a chance to get into the "real world". This definitly could be just the thing for the Juniata student who wants to get off campus and into a different work and living arrangment for a while. For more information on this program check with Dr. Post, the campus liaison officer, at 426 Founders.

Interested students can also talk with people who have already gone through the program. They are Susan Agnew, P.O. 893; Marlyn Hoover, P.O. 1059; Alen Mitchell, P.O. 1103 and Bruce Moyer, c/o Admissions Office.

Preservation for Humankind Is Experience The Answer?

by Michael Martin

What are we going to do? What are you going to do? Times have changed and those changes have brought on a malstrom of events that threaten to overwhelm us as a nation and perhaps as a human race. There have been crime rate increases, drug usage increases, moral decreases, economic decreases, and a host of others that are presently confronting us. What is even worse is that there seems to be no cure for these problems no matter how many people, ideas or money are poured into the situations.

Of course, there have been many reactions to the problems by man. Some have become extremely vocal in an unusually hostile manner. Have you noticed the amount of verbal slamming and cynicism that has erupted? People of the minority persuasion are yelling at those of the majority persuasion to "suck in your bigot faces, motherf _____s." Those of the majority holler back just as loudly that they should get their "backward, spear-chucking, fried-chicken and rib-licking cotton picking, welfare-cheating, kinky-colored heads out of my world." It all seems to be related to the state of the enviroment. There are other s who run around like a chicken after a circus geek has latched onto their heads. And others have just simply retreated into their miasmic, bottomless, corners to show their heads never again.

It is perhaps this last vien of discontent that bothers me the most. It seems to be the most prevalent and the most enduring. People have just begun to say "I don't care". It is clear that most of us have ceased caring. How many of us would actually inconvenience ourselves in order to attempt to cure our present ills or what is even more important to make a sacrifice to preserve humankind for several generations more? The salvation of our system will take at least this long. Do we care enough for what we have so far (which isn't all that terrible) to negate our puny desires for its survival?

I doubt it. Who cares what happens beyond the span of a thousand years? The thought of even a hundred years short-circuits our imagination. By the year 2175, I will be dead and my children (if there are any) will be dead and my grandchildren will be in their "denture" years. What does it matter to me? Why should I strain and aggrevate myself for events that might occur? They are as intangible as the events that occurred before my lifetime.

The thing is that if you really sit down and think about it, there appears to be no reason for preservation. So what if the human race ends? Is the alternative of unending human history so desirable either?

Reason, though, just doesn't give a valid substantiation. Science has come up with the fact that if our history were compared to a global circuit by an S.S.T., then we've only been on board for six feet. Or there is the fact that our ozonic deodrants will eventually destroy the protec tive level of our atmosphere and thus will cause a rapid rise in the number of cases of terminal sunburn. Or that twelve billion years from now the earth will be destroyed by the end of the life of the sun. Who can feel like Joan of Arc with dribble like this circulating about?

This all pushed me to the conclusion that I don't care whether or not man is on that S.S.T. for six feet or six moles. These facts have caused me to lose all interest in most everything beyond what I intend to do after I get off the can in the morning.

Is this an outrageous stance? I admit that is extremely outrageous. But this is not because these previous arguements are wrong. Indeed, within a certain framework they areindisbutabely right. They have, however, been boxed within a structure of rationality. And I con-

JC Women's B-B Team Tries To Get It Together

by Kim Norris
Jacque Prentiss

On Saturday, January 18, the Juniata women's basketball team opened their 1975 season with a thrilling double overtime at Messiah College. Although hindered in route by a "disabled" car and six inches of new snow, and after arriving two hours after scheduled tip off, the women played an agressive fifty minutes of basketball. Disadvantaged by height only, they played a high scoring and well-matched game. The scoring was as follows:

Sue Rosshirt	11 pts.
Leslie Whittaker	3 pts.
Kim Norris	13 pts.
Cathy Dickey	4 pts.
Jacque Prentiss	6 pts.
Mardi Frye	12 pts.
Beth Woodworth	4 pts.

There was never more than a four point margin between the two teams, with the game ending in a very close 54-53 loss for Juniata.

Bouncing back with determination and enthusiasm, the Juniata women won their second game of the season on January 22, against St. Francis in a 34-29 decision.

Since the Indians had a cold shooting night, and St. Francis responded with little scoring, it was more a defensive battle of rebounding and passing. Leslie Whittaker led the team with 16 rebounds while Mardi Frye was high scorer with 10 points and also pulled down eleven rebounds. Three freshmen saw action and showed the potential strength that the team possesses. The scoring was:

Sue Rosshirt	4 pts.
Kim Norris	2 pts.
Cathy Dickey	6 pts.
Jacque Prentiss	2 pts.
Jan Edgar	6 pts.
Beth Woodworth	4 pts.
Deb Madey	0 pts.
Mardi Frye	10 pts.

Ice Hockey Season Opens— Future Appears Promising

by Terry Overly

Under the guidance of player-coach Mike Harrison, the Juniata Ice Hockey Club has made its season debut in grand style. On Tuesday, January 14, the club made its debut against Susquehanna University with a dazzling 11-3 win. The team was lead by freshman, Vince Sarni's 5 goal shooting attact. Freshman, Don Plummer also contributed a hat trick to the teams 11 goal attack. The game was fast and furious with a few outbreaks between the two hard hitting teams. Juniata had control from the onset of the game. On Sunday, January 19, the club continued its success by beating Lock Haven State College 8-7 in a see-saw game that held the few spectators holding on to their seats. The team was lead by junior, Dan Bauscher's 4 goals. Vince Sarni got the team off in the first period with a goal with assists going to Harrison and Bauscher. Harrison scored the second goal off a nice pass from Ken Rodgers. The third goal of the period came off the stick of Howie Nathan with the assists going to Don Plummer and Jeff Blos. At the end of the first period Lock Haven lead 4-3. The second period was all Juniata. Bauscher scored his first and second goals. Juniata lead at the end of the period 5-4. The third period was a tight twenty minutes. Vince Sarni got his second goal of the game on a nice assist by Gary Hager. The team clutched the victory with Bauscher scoring his third and fourth goals.

The teams future looks promising. The play of some freshman has helped the team. With time the team snould become much more aggressive. The team is urging the student body to back up the team and make it successful not as a club, but as a representation of the student body in competition with other colleges. The team is urging the support of car pooling to the games with sign-up sheets in Ellis at the information desk. Below is a list of the games scheduled as of now:

Sun. Feb. 2 6:00 P.M.
Penn State College Jr. Club at State

Tues. Feb. 11 9:30 P.M.
Susquehanna at Sunbury

Sun. Feb. 16 10:30 A.M.
Lock Haven at State

Other games are being scheduled. So come out and support the team.

The Juniata Basketball Team lost to Scranton 75-59, and to Wilkes 71-65. These losses give Juniata a 2-3 record in the MAC League.

Now asking a more appropriate question, Why ISN'T MORE GOING ON AT JUNIATA??? It doesn't take much time to list the events for the week, much less describe or motivate one to attend them. Perhaps there are things going on that should be publicized so that more people can participate. If you know of any other events that are worth letting other students know about, please see that the JUNIATIAN knows about them, too. Maybe you are searching for something more. Let someone know that you are not satisfied and see what you can do about it. Certainly among 1200 students someone has realized that nothing new is happening at Juniata. Why?

sider them and their structure dangerous. The problems of our times and their solutions just do not lend themselves to rationality. Our problems have stepped beyond the bounds of rational thought to a fantasy world that no one thought could be possible. Thus to use rational thought processes is self-destructive. There is no feeling in rationality for a world that screams out for it.

What, then, can cause us to care desperately for the future? I most certainly can give no definite answer, if there is one at all. Perhaps the closest thing that we will find that could be called a solution is the idea that somewhere within the depth of our being, in the intrinsic construction of our minds, lies a thing called conscience. Yes, conscience may be our saving-grace.

This is perhaps the road of most resistance for it involves sacrifice and judgement. And when these are combined, it is with anquish. Mankind cannot expect to continue unless such things as population is controlled. The control of that involves sacrificing yet born life for the continuation of life. Life arises from death.

What remains for me to say is the process that will instill or activate this conscience. Again I must use the crutch of unknowingness.there appears to be no evident solution. It could be a multitude of things or it could be a single, simple thing. However, I think one of the main motivators will be experience. For it is with the experience of wars, overpopulation, famine, and disease, that man will be able to become concerned about the preservation of humankind. So it goes.

Injuries Plague JC Wrestlers

by John Paulshock

The Indians grapplers suffered two more defeats destowed upon them; as they were up-ended by a strong Moravian last Wednesday, and were crushed by an always strong contender, Gettysburg, on Saturday.

The highlights of the Moravian match consisted of a rare few: Steve Denison managed a victory in the 126 lb. class, and Ron Nickle also profitted an exciting win, and again the long veteran of the team, Mark Brown, upheld his grapping up to par with a mere tie.

In last Saturday's meet against Gettysburg, the rewards to the Juniata "resilite kids" were even meeker. Once again, it was Steve Denison who was the muscle-man from J.C. to be the only individual to score. His decision added the only three points to the Indians tally, and cost them harsh thrashing, which dampens hopes of a winning season.

Coach Berrier's matmen are still young, and injuries, as are always damaging, have forced them to slack off, and withhold their fitness for the remainder of the season, and concentrate on the M.A.C. competition coming up in the spring. Injuries to Ashworth, Simmons, and Shultis have minimized the squads power and depth, and could continue to hinder their success. the Wrestlers' dual-meet record of one win and eight losses is not all that impressive; but all should now consider it an off year with a youthful roster, and should look forward to the fine solo exhibitions and the future champs that might perform.

Trials And Tribulations Of A JC Disc Jockey

by Rob Lopresti

Everyone (well, many people) on campus can hear them. They're the voices between songs when your radio is set at 620 AM or 108 FM. But some students visit WJC's headquarters in Founders and go away wondering: what's it like to be At The Mike? To explain the joys and agonies of being a DJ I have compiled a description of what can happen during an average show:

9:45— You arrive for a 10 PM show. By getting there early you have time to read the log and find out that your three hour show will be punctuated by three Public Service Announcements, two commercials, and two news broadcasts, plus the usual six station identifications. Reading the log takes about a minute and the rest of the time can be spent wandering aimlessly around, seeing if the new Billboard is around, what the temperature is, and if the UPI machine is working, or as is more common, is eating the paper its supposed to print on.

10:00— Play first song. Try to remember to turn the volumn control up so it goes out over the air.

10:45— News. Find out, as you read it over the air that the UPI machine typed two lines in the same space, making the end of the story you're on totally illegible. Fake it. Next, play a commercial and find out the tape isn't working, or possibly the tape player.

11:55— The FCC regulations say you must identify the station within two minutes of the hour, but the song just finished. How do you fill the time till you can do the ID? Well, that's what campus bulletins are for, so you flip over the bulletins and find that there are only two, both very short and misspelled, and one of them will turn out to be urging everyone to go to something that ended yesterday.

12:05— Who says that no one is listening out there? Someone just called up and said that everything you've played in the last half hour stunk. Why, he asks, don't you play some Hendrix? You explain that you

Econ Seminar; Reality To JC

by Mike McElhinney

I just finished speaking with Mr. Bud Wise about a seminar which the Economics and Business Administration Department held on campus on January 26th and 27th. You might wonder what you're doing reading and article about something that happened almost two weeks ago, but this and other seminars which the department plans to conduct are an attempt to do what I think all departments at Juniata should try to do more of.

Three Juniata College alumni, Mr. C. Wesley Lingenfelter (1955), Mr. James J. Warfield (1966), and Mr. Glenn L. Paris (1964), all employed in the field of personnel, presented the Alumni Seminar program. In discussion sections and individual meetings these three men came in contact with over 90 students interested in learning more about personnel work.

The purpose of this program, as pointed out by Mr. Wise, "is to bring reality into the classroom. . . .These guys said things that we could never tell our students."

While this program attempted to provide students with a general view of the field of personnel, other seminars are planned by the department to deal with topics like marketing, finance, and production.

It's not hard to feel sheltered and isolated while attending classes at Juniata College in Huntingdon, Pennsylvania. Programs such as this seminar provide a refreshing exposure to the "real world"; an exposure not often found in our lecture-oriented, textbook culture. I hope more programs of this type will be planned for the future by all departments on campus. The Juniatian will gladly publicize any such programs.

The "New" WJC— Why Not Listen?

Now that WJC is able to be heard in all the dorms on campus, you might have to decide whether to listen to WJC or WQWK. So before you turn your dial to WQWK try WJC first, you may be surprised. WJC has gone thru some changes in the past year, and in my opinion we came out on top of the situation. For one thing most of our equipment is better than some professional stations. Our staff of disc jockeys is better and more experienced than they were last year, resulting in better shows and better music. We have about double the music time per hour than WQWK does. What do you listen to the radio for, music or tiresome commercials? If you like commercials listen to WQWK if you like music listen to WJC. All this aside let's remember that WJC is run by the students of J.C. and some of these students are your roommates, friends and neighbors, so why not support them in what they do. Also if you are interested or have any suggestions about WJC see me, Greg Eveline, 102 Terrace or stop by the station and we'll see what we can do. WQWK might profess to be your radio station, but WJC is your radio station, so make use of it.

Real Need For A Positive Outlook

by Courtnaye Byron Rhone

It seems to me that we as American's are showing a devastating trend to becoming the prophets of doom, as we capitalize on all that is atrociously and "hopelessly" wrong with our society and the world around us. One can even see the great emphasis on what degrading events and problems exist at our college from week to week in the school paper. You have only to listen to the 6:00 news broadcast, pick up a daily newspaper or read a national news magazine, and I assure you that the outcome will be that of either a migrain headache or instant depression, which ever comes first or seems to be your preferred ill. For those of us who don't seem to be able to cope with the realities of life the options of alcohol and drugs are available, and for those completely torn, shattered and stifled by their existence the ultimate cop-out of suicide reigns as the grand finale. How melodramatic! I have only to ask why.

Why is it that everybody is filled with a multitude of suggestions of what's wrong with the world, and when you ask for positive ideas with which you can reply on with sound beneficial resolutions, you get an infinite amount of Casper Miquetoasty answers that would make any body spill their cookies at will? Sure there's inflation, unemployment, poverty, rampant crime, discrimination, drug and alcohol abuse, immorality, wars and threats of war (the list is infinite), but who has anything to say or propose to correct this route down the primrose path of blatant ignorance, apathy and possibly the decline and fall of mankind? A lot of false hopes we can do without!

We must each individually and collectively pick ourselves up off of our gluteus maximus, start breaking down the barriers of bureaucratic red tape, and presenting the facade of doing the most to rectify a problem, when we continually do the very least just to get by. It can only be apparent that we are not guiding our potentials in a cohesive form and direction, and we need strength in numbers moreso than ever before without a lot of obnoxious hot air. There can be nothing so finely perceived as the possible eradication of our own existence, as we calmly watch a nation and its people regress into submission. We have been likened to that of the fall of the Roman Empire, but I would rather put things into a slightly different perspective as Buckminster Fuller said, "I can prove to young people that it's completely possible to care of all humanity at a higher standard of living than anybody ever thought of; that the war which they deplore is the same as other wars, which have been based on the assumption that there's not enough to go around, so that somebody is going to have to die. But that's no longer true. . . if you can go to the moon and under the arctic ice, you can make the world work." Let's put ourselves to work and make our world function for the people, by the people and inclusive of all our people, for the present is somewhat calamitous and we must all be committed to our continued existence through this "temporary" episode of indecision and unrest. I'd hate to look back on this period of time only to be witness to what might be the "Saga of The Great American Stagnation". This must not be the final frontier. Or is it? It's up to us to decide.

S/U Grades: Your Grades Aren't The Absolute Determiner Of Your Future!

by Bill Brooks

Unfortunately, the timing for this article is extremely bad and you'll probably read this after the faculty renders some final decision. Before I go on to incriminate myself, let me say that I'm in favor of eliminating any inequity during the evalution of those students seeking admittance to a profession (medical, dental, etc.) school. Obviously, there are certain perplexing questions that muddle the mind after reading the survey on S/U grading that will be conducted in hopes of substantiating this plea. Would a change in policy jeopardize our choice of maintaining the current S/U grading of required general courses? Is the S/U grading valid? Have these students fabricated a mountain out of a molehill?

I hope this elite group is not naive enough to become infatuated with their problems and ignore the desires of others. Would this in any way hinder our option to have S/U grades? As a prospective applicant to Juniata, I found the S/U courses of the first term appealing and one of the deciding factors why I chose Juniata. These courses make the transition from high school to college somewhat more subtle. The alleviated burden of grades the first term appeases the difficulties of ajusting to an alien environment away from home. I frequently wonder why friends of mine, who averaged over 1200 on their SAT's, had difficulties at Columbia University, Pitt, and with organic chemistry freshman year first term at Bucknell. It appears they consciously omitt on the questionaire the question: Would you favor the abolition of S/U grades and the acceptance of letter-graded general courses?

One also has to ask if this is not a trumped up case of over exaggeration. After reading the second sentence, "At the present time, there is no evidence to suggest that S/U grades in any way benefit a Juniata applicant's chances for admission to professional schools.", it sounds like they're trying to avert the real issue, does it hinder one's chances? In the next sentence, a specific example is given on how S grades are automatically converted to C's. Are there other schools that uphold this policy and if so, how many? These are only technicalities and this type of scrutiny is hardly worth the space it occupies. To hit the nail on the head, the pertinence of this change in grading seems to be exaggerated because grades are not the sole determiner of the future of these students. Activities, entrance exams, faculty recommendations, and personal interviews are all factors that enlarge the scope of their evaluation. So the people in the limelight of this "injustice" are the border line cases. Could it also be that these people have in the backs of their minds the idea that their cum. might be bolstered if this policy change is carried out? (My modes professor is my advisor and he would surely give me an A.)

There is no simple solution to this dilemma and I hope the faculty committee does not go to the extreme measure of terminating pass-fail grades.

Ways To Conserve Energy 12 Helpful Hints To Follow

A Dozen Ways to Save Energy

The Juniata College Energy Conservation Committee asks your help in conserving the College's energy supply. Action on your part has contributed to an overall decrease in our electrical and heating demand ccompared to last year, but further reduction is essential. Here are twelve ideas suggested by Ken Rabenstein and Phil Sipling to conserve energy in the dorms:

1) Keep dormitory doors to the outside closed.
2) Keep heaters free from obstruction.
3) Do not tamper with thermostats; refer problems to your R.A. or energy liason.
4) Maximize the use of sunlight for heating and lighting. Open drapes in the morning and close at sundown.
5) If windows must be opened, keep room door closed.
6) Use hot water responsibly. Do not take steam baths and keep showers short.
7) If you have an "instant on" TV, unplug it when not in use.
8) Launder only when you have a full load, taking care not to overload the machine.
9) Choose the proper water temperature for the type of clothing you are washing: cold for dark colors and warm for permanent press.
10) Do not overload the dryers.
11) Turn off lights when not in use.

Sir:

I have just recently been informed that the scheduled date for all class night has been changed. I would like to express my dissent over the rescheduled date (April 26), and request that the original date (April 19) be reinstated. The reason for my opposition is that a number of months ago the Juniata Rugby Football Club petitioned the Center Board to set a date for all class night so that we could schedule our games accordingly. We purposely asked that April 26 not be the date since we had been invited to participate in a rugby tournament at IUP. This is a privilege for us, being a young club, and an honor for the school. Not showing up would be in insult, and further invitations to other tourneys would not be likely in the future.

Al class night has become a rather prestigious affair at Juniata (certainly there aren't many) and I and others look forward to the occasion. It seems unreasonable to me (and others) that such an event cannot be scheduled sooner (like when the rest of the calender is determined) and not be changed. There are certainly others to whom this rescheduling will be an inconvenience and I would like a rational explanation from the responsible (?) people for their action.

Joel E. Shaffer
Juniata RFC

To the Editor:

I regret that the article by Bill Brooks in the January 23rd issue of the Juniatian "Has Juniata Made a Change? The Curriculum - is it Liberal?) came to my attention too late for me to comment on it in last week's edition. For it does, most certainly, merit a response. When I started reading, I expected to find the old hackneyed arguments for the abolition of the traditional course structure at Juniata. I must confess that I was prepared to be annoyed. Imagine my amazement and delight as I came to the realization that Bill Brooks was a skillful satirist, The Juniatian's answer to Art Buchwald, and that he was in truth pleading for precisely the type of program he appeared to be condemning. The article's lack of structure and the lack of structure in the use of the English language (dangling clauses, plural possessive adjectives linked with a singular noun (the student. . .their initial eagerness), confused pronouns (serving "I" instead of "me"), faulty prepositions (frustrated "with" instead of "by") or prepositions totally excluded ("a chance passing GRE's")) cleverly provided a vivid example of how necessary discipline is in the mastering of a subject matter. Had the letter been written with serious intent, its form would have undermined its content to such a degree as to render it ineffective. For the sake of consistency no doubt, the author renounced the use of logic necessary for the development of an argument ad absurdum (e.g., the frustrated student could opt to find, for $4,000 a tutor who would instruct him and offer him room, board and insurance). He also carefully avoided claiming to have a solution for the problem of grades, for this, too, would have implied a structured, logical process. But he found a rich sourse of humor in the use of numerous malapropisms (to "implement" triviality, etc.). Satire of this calibre is rarely found in a college newspaper, but it is so enjoyable that I hope it will be used again to strike similarly mortal blows to old and ever-used arguments.

Sincerely,
E. M. Tilton
Assistant Professor of French, (part-time)

Alas, my assinine letter to the editor (January 23 issue) goaded no formal response. In that letter to the editor, I stated that the Army Corps of Engineers was planning to hold a local meeting at which hydroelectric power implications on the Raystown dam area would be discussed. I felt at that time that hydropower might be good for the Huntingdon area. Since that article several knowledgeable and very interested persons (who are not in a proper position to respond to my letter) informed me of the probable consequences of a hydroelectric facility. Consequently I now feel a certain (perhaps unethical) obligation to refute my initial opinion, because no one else seems willing to formally challenge it.

I'm not very knowledgeable regarding the subject of power dams, but there are two obvious effects of remodeling a retention dam into a power dam. One, to put in proper sluicing and water driven turbines will require some draining of the lake. The Army Corps states that recreational goals will not be impaired, when in fact they will be momentarily disrupted (two years?). The developing game fish are surely not going to benefit by even a partial draining. Boating would have to be curtailed. Two, to get any power requires a continuous flow of water. In spite of drought, flood, high or low temperatures the water must keep on flowing. Thus the efflux is not temperature matched to the downstream riverine environment, and the backwater shoreline becomes subject to occasional recession—disrupting what would be a normal lake environment.

There are elements of the issue that should irk the taxpayer. One feasibility study was already conducted. How many more thousands of dollars will be spent on a second feasibility study? I'm no physicist, but can the new Raystown dam produce much more power than the old Raystown dam produced? The new dam may be higher, but it isn't getting any more water than the old dam received. Heresay is never quite appropriate, however the scuttlebutt about nuclear power plants and reserve retention dams being constructed are no impossibilities.

What I had originally thought to be a good idea no longer appeals to me. As afisherman, I'd hate to see any loss in the quality of the fishing, which is already superb and getting better as the fish get larger. Also, the Army Corps of Engineers seems to be more interested in keeping its own employees employed than in taking the responsibility for the quality and utility of the projects they create. Their record for ecosystem management is not good. Why give them another chance to maintain their record?. . . So much for my bias. I hope to hear from other concerned readers.

Rudy's "Twenty Three And A Half"

by Brad Rudy

Yes gang this weeks movie is 8½ which is guaranteed to put you on your ass if you havent seen any of our Fellini offerings or never even wanted to especially then because it tends to jump from whats real to whats not so real or to whats sort of real but not really in fact it starts with a hairy nightmare to put you on your ass right away yes and it shows a movie director who is in a slumply creativity wise and really wants to make an autobiographical movie yes but he wants to put his life in order first which is usually impossible if not highly unlikely which by the way reminds me why its called 8½ yes simply because before this Fellini had made 6 features and 3 segments making this movie number 8½ and also shows he was stuck for a title which is why I called this article 23½ because I had written 22½ articles for this paper before this the half being for My Fair Lady last year but then again why should I write about a movie I havent seen yet like professional critics who never saw a movie in their lives or so it seems and no wonder they call us bastards yes because we think our opinions are better than yours because we or I should say they get paid for their opinions like I picked this movie for the simple reason that I wanted to see it not because I thought you might want to see it which you probably dont but why should I care about that yes because Im the one in charge and I might as well suit myself but youll probably hate it because its subtitled and probably hard to read because of the starkly black and white miseenscene or should I descend to your level and call it b and w pictures yes that sounds better besides I could have gotten it dubbed but then who wants to watch Marceelo Mastroianni talking with somebody elses voice yes definitely not me besides dubbed movies change the mood and Fellini relies too much on mood to hold your attention to do something like that besides lousy lip sync is much more distracting than subtitles and Fellini is especially boring dubbed because with dubbling you relax your level of awareness and pow youre out cold asleep yes but anyway youll be glad to hear that this is Fellinis last black and white movie but still who really wants to watch Fellinis creative hassles no reason for us to care about them but Judith Crist calls it a definitive statement of creative doctrine so it must be good for something other than a two hour tranquilizer and doesnt it seem somehow ludicrous that Marcello Mastroianni should play Fellinis surrogate when the two look hardly alike if youve ever seen Fellini hes built like an oversized beach ball he must be going through an ego trip but anyway next week we have Juliet of the Spirits with Fellinis wife again and now its in stark raving color stark naked color bright and beautiful color and even lewd color but its still subtitled yes and if youve been nicely following our series this term you might have picked up a little Italian along the way but he does in this to Juliet what he did to Guido thats the name of the director in 8½ only now its much easier and even more fun because Juliets problem is more universal than Guidos yes would you believe shes trapped by her marriage to a priggish philandering husband and she keeps seeing strange spirits and memories and apparitions until she frees herself by freeing a memory of herself as a dying child martyr in a church play and finds she must find something other than her stifling marriage to rely on and besides theres Sandra Milo romping around barely dressed if at all and she has a body that wont quit yes that comment seems somehow ludicrous in an article about a movie on the freedom of women but I suppose I cant help because for reasons I refuse to change I go to movies with a male attitude and watch them as such but Juliet O T S is still a fun movie which brings us back to 8½ which isnt so why should you spend a quarter to see it yes no particular reason except as a challenge yes that sounds good a challenge because from what I can tell by talking and looking youre all too stupid to handle anything more demanding than Bonzo gets a Hickey and Destroys the World type movies yes because you are too stupid to bring anything to a movie except your body and a bag of popcorn yes because you are too stupied to remember you have a brain that will work only at your beck and call yes and will operate logically with the slightest effort yes because thats all Fellini takes yes because hes more emotional than intellectual yes because youre all too lazy and apathetic to care about anything except your next beer or drag or snort or encounter with a consenting adult and I use the term with tongue firmly planted in cheek or whatever the hell it is that turns your fartsized brains on yes and that sure as hell sounds snobbish probably because it is but you can all understand and enjoy 8½ and if you put forth yes the effort yes all with effort coming yes and yes you can yes you will Yes!

Juniata's Recycling Center—Whatever Happened To It?

by Eric Weis
Diane De Rafelo
J.E.R.C.

Just before Christmas the bottom fell out of the paper market. Until the price on recycled paper rises again our recycling organization will be in a state of limbo. We began the year with high aspirations and hopes, diligently collecting all the donated materials from the dormitories only to find out (much to our dismay) that there was nowhere, in a 65.4 mile radius (really), that would accept the used aluminum, steel and glass. We found consolation in the fact that we were still able to make ourselves a service, to the college community, by recycling the small amount of paper though, we find it necessary to stop even that collection until the demand, on market, rises.

Some major flaws are revealed in this small encounter. Two years ago, when there was greater public pressure for recycling, the industries were quite willing to accept reclaimed materials absorbing the cost of putting the materials into circulation themselves, at the gain of good public relations. As with most things, time has reduced the pressure exerted by the public and the number of manufacturers willing to take, upon themselves, the expense of recycling is almost nill. Perhaps the attitudes of the industries will change in time but it is doubtful that such an occurance will happen by itself, i.e. without resumed public pressure. Until that time, the reclamation of consumer pur-

Townsend Speaks on JC Social Classes

by Steve Townsend

No matter what may be happening during any one weekend, it never seems to be quite enough to satisfy the thrill-seeking Juniata student. There are those who say that after a week of intensive brainstorming, even the appearance of a waterspout on the Muddy Run would seem old hat, but this is being somewhat harsh. What is really needed is not more entertainment, but more particular entertainment. Instead of a whole lot of everything for no-one, have a little something for everyone.

To help accomplish this task I have uncovered six distinct social types and their individual entertainment needs. From this day forward no one need be bored with long Juniata weekends.

Obviously, the group that finds their social needs most unfulfilled are the Go-Homers. Every Friday this great hoard of pilgrims pour from their dormitories in a mad scramble to obtain the distinction of being the first to leave campus. Needless to say, with a third of the students missing, it becomes hard for any social event to generate a reasonable degree of excitment. Of course, this says nothing about the damage being done to our alma mater's reputation.

However, no situation is beyond repair. A little imagination and minimal effort is sure to keep most Go-Homers content with their lot. A program that fits this description to a tee is the tried and true SURROGATE MOTHER HOTLINE. Along the lines of a Night Ministry sort of thing, SURROGATE MOTHER HOTLINE provides immediate relief for those who find it essential to speak with a mother image. By merely dialing M-O-M 9987, homesick Go-Homers may speak to any of our matronly sounding tape loops. In case of emergencies, such as an inability to wash one's own clothes, a laundry service is offered for a minimal fee. Other services for this group would include lullaby humming, bed making and bosom rocking.

The second major social category is the group of habitual Party People. Luckily, their interests are much easier to cater. It seems that all this group really needs is loud music, keg beer, and shoulder to shoulder humanity. For these people a party in an Ellis Hall study room would be just the event. Complete with live band, kegs and 200 hundred crazed persons, the seldom used study rooms would be transformed into a center of Juniata party life.

Another category of students who find the weekends a trifle bleak, are the student political people. It seems that with most everyone either away or at a party, these hapless, would be politicians find themselves in the predicament of not having anyone to campaign for, or, show off to. To make Saturday Nites more rewarding for this group, an ad hoc poker game in the basement of the Old Gym seems to be in order.

Chosen for it's isolation and properties of poor ventilation, the Old Gym offers the perfect environment for toning up crucial political skills. The talents of bluffing, cheating, lying and other cloak and dagger activities can all be brought into play during Politicians Poker Night.

No listing of groups and activities is complete without mention of the spiritually alert. Even though their agenda is usually quite full, it's no secret but that it could use a shot in the arm. This revitalization could be accomplished with the aid of two volunteers and a sack of lime. Imagine the upsurge in religious interest if on every Sunday morning the football field were to be converted into a giant Redemption Scrabble board! As an added feature triple word value could be added for the spelling of Salvation.

Next in line for their social remedy is the class of students with great athletic inclinations. From all indications it seems that ennui among this group could be defeated by showing super bowl highlights and shaving cream commercials on the walls and ceilings of Memorial Gym.

Finally, we must not forget the Study People. That diligent mass of future professionals, who, for lack of any thing better to do, spend their weekends nose first in obtuse texts. But even these people need an occasional change of pace, and the proper drawing card is sure to bring them out of the library in hoardes. A weekend seminar entitled "More Efficient Highlighting: How It Increases G.P.A. And Earning Potential.", is sure to be "right down their alley".

As for me, I prefere the more powerful rush of a simulated earthquake. Spending a few hours meditating between Penn Central's main lines seems to quench this urge rather well.

Senior Recital

by June Cramer

The Music Department will present a senior recital on Thursday, February 13th at 8:15 in Shoemaker Galleries. Betsy Shuss, contralto, and Linda Fidler, soprano, have both studied voice with Marjorie Hirsch for several years. Betsy will sing two pieces by Handel. She will also perform a song cycle, Kindertotenlieder, by Mahler, and "Stride la Vampa" from the opera Il Trovatore by Verdi.

Linda will perform a song cycle, La Bonne Chanson, with text by Verlaine and music by Faure. In addition, she will sing "Stridono Lassu" from Pagliacci by Leoncavallo. To end the performance, Linda and Betsy will stage a duet from Le Nozze di Figaro by Mozart. Gail Morgan, a junior, will be their accompanist.

This recital should be very enjoyable. Everyone is invited to come and watch their fellow students perform. Write the event on your calendars so you don't forget!

don't have any Hendrix and eventually compromise on a record you do have.

12:30— A set of carefully interrelated songs that you've planned for days turns out to be one song too long to fit in the available time, so one of them has to go. If it's any comfort, no one would have noticed that they were related anyway.

12:45— You discover that the UPI machine has given up the ghost completely. Read the news from the past report. One advantage: your so familiar with it by now you don't make any mistakes when you read it.

1:00— Play the sign-off and pack up you records for the long trek to the dorm. Then go back to sign the log. Wonder how professional DJs do four hour shows everyday.

The Day After— Someone tells you how much they enjoyed your show. They especially praise the songs that the phone caller yesterday had said stunk.

You can't win.

Wrestling - No Second Rate Sport!

by Bill Brooks

A grave injustice is being committed against the wrestling team. That injustice is a lack of fan support. Wrestling is supposedly the third major sport on campus, but as indicated from the sparsely filled bleachers at the home matches, its actual precedence lies somewhere between girls' field hockey and intramural basketball. One has to ask why this apathy persists? If I had to surmise, the complaints would have to range from: since their dual meet record is so poor they're not worth seeing or wrestling is frankly a dull sport. Those who claim it's not worth seeing a losing team are victims of a society that stresses perfectionism. Somehow they don't know how to filter out and appreciate the attributes of a team which loses a contest. Remember, wrestling is not solely a team sport. There are ten bouts that comprise a match. Likewise, there are individuals on the team with winning records; so the first argument does not seem to hold water.

Those who advocate that wrestling is a boring sport just don't know how to appreciate its uniqueness. Undoubtedly, wrestling is the toughest sport this college has to offer. (If you don't believe me ask the "Bear".) One of its most demanding requirements is perseverance. It takes supreme conditioning to wrestle eight minutes. I have seen too many football players at the end of their season die of almost near suffocation after only two minutes of wrestling during the outset of the wrestling season to convince me otherwise. One of the most aesthetically appealing characteristics of wrestling is its coordination and movement. These skills are not something that you procure in a weekend, nor a year. Some never attain these after five years. To be able to perform an adequate number of moves is only half the battle, you have to be able to assimilate this knowledge, both counter and attack, within split seconds while wrestling in a chain. One indecisive response or mental lapse could be the difference between winning or losing. Probably the clincher that validates my statement, wrestling is superior to other sports, is the tedious bother of lossing weight. Even losing five pounds from the course of one match to another is difficult when you've drained a good portion of your tissue fluid out of your system. The only resolution is near starvation.

Optimistically speaking, one of the greatest assets of the team is the freshman material. Steve Denison, Brian Ashworth, Ron Nickel and Bill Bruner are all fine wrestlers and it's just a matter of time until they blossom into a respectable and consistently winning team. One of the hardest transitions is that from high school to college varsity wrestling as a freshman. College wrestling is more physical and strenuous. Two additional minutes may seem nominal, but when you're on the mat in the third period it's unbearable. In all probibility, the greenhorn might be wrestling an opponent with two to three years college experience on him. This could be an almost insurmountable disadvantage. I couldn't neglect to mention the fine sophomore wrestlers in Scott Simmons, Mike Hanselman, Steve Harper and Steve Shultis.

Now, let's get back to the brunt of the issue, fan support, and why it's essential. What motivates the individual to give a peak performance? Certainly the dedication to an abstract thing, the college, is old hat and probably nonexistent. One would have to naturally mention self-pride as the trigger for motivation. Self-pride has its limitations. The practitioner needs the endorsement of others to restore his confidence when the going gets tough. Compounded with this is the fact wrestlers, like actors, are hams. They have to display their adroitness in order to gain satisfaction from what they are doing. Believe me, there is no glory in wrestling at Juniata. Some of the blame for the teaams unsuccessfulness would have to be put on the student body. Get out and support the team! ! ! ! !

Cross Country Skiing - Explored

by Scott MacMillin

Cross-country skiing is an excellent winter sport for those who are fed up with the commercialism of down-hill skiing, can't stand the noxiousness of snowmobiles, or for those who simply seek the solitude of the winter woods. While this sport is growing rapidly in other parts of the country it has yet to become really popular in central Pennsylvania, yet excellant opportunities for this sport abound nearby. Cross-country skiing is a way that one can travel deep into the woods in the quiet of winter and feel much closer with nature than one would riding on a loud, smelly snowmobile or traveling down a ski slope at rapid speeds after battling crowds waiting in the lift line.

Cross-country or ski touring is the original form of skiing before down-hill developed to what it is today. The skis are very light and narrow, the boots are much like ordinary shoes and only the toe is connected to the ski so that the heel can be lifted. By the use of different kinds of waxes applied to the bottom of the ski one can ski up hills by simply walking up them.

Learning how to cross-country ski is fairly easy to master. Very basically, each ski is slid forward with a push off or "kick" from the rear foot. Once the right gliding rhythm is mastered it is quite easy to move along at a fair rate for a long distance without becoming fatigued. Going down, although not as fast as down-hill skiing, has its thrills because one doesn't have as much controle of his skis as with down-hill equipment.

Equipment used for cross-country is simpler and much cheaper than that used for down-hill skiing. One can easily equip himself for about $60. The secret to cross-country is the use of the right wax. The wax adhears to the snow when the ski is planted, enabling the skier to climb hills but also allows the ski to slide with less friction thus serving a doubling function. Waxing is much less complicated than most people think. All one has to do is consult a chart matching the right wax for the particular snow condition. There are alternatives to waxing such as the use of skies with plastic fishscale bottoms but these are always more expensive and never work as well as wax.

Cross-country can be done almost anywhere there is enough snow. With as little as a couple inches one can ski over the grass. With more snow one can enjoy almost any trail through the woods. Thus the cost and trouble of traveling to a ski area and paying lift fees as in down-hill are forgotten. A pack can even be carried on your back to go back packing in snow too deep to walk in for any distance.

There are many good areas to cross-country ski near Juniata. The most immediate exists right here. One walk through the woods up at the cliffs or on the "goat path" will show you that when there is snow, there are good places to ski right here. In Rothrock State Forest, which lies between Huntingdon and State College, there are many trails possible for skiing and the higher elevation of Tussey Mtn. means that there is usually snow. Perhaps the best place to ski of all are on the abundant, but virtually unused, cross-country ski trails in Blue Knob State Park. This area almost always has over a foot of snow. Information on these trails can be found at Ted's ski shop, about 1 mile north of Blue Knob Ski Area. Skies can be rented at a rate of $10/4 days at Appalachian Outdoor 'House on W. College Ave. in State College. Telephone 234-4384. Hopefully with increased popularity more places to rent ski equipment will become available.

Women's Basketball Team Is On 4 Game Winning Streak

by Jacque Prentiss
Kim Norris

This past week was a busy one for the Juniata women's basketball team. Monday, January 27, they traveled to Susquehanna University and brought home an impressive win with a convincing 60-34 score. Every member of the squad saw action and once again proved the strength of the team. Susan "Shorty" Rosshirt led the women with 17 points and junior Cathy Dicky tallied an additional 12.

Wednesday, January 29, the women hosted Penn State Altoona Campus and marked their third victory in a row. Playing before a large and appreciative crowd added to their 54-28 victory. Sue Rosshirt once again paced the team contributing 14 points as leading scorer with Mardi Frye close behind adding 11. With the exception of injured Nancy Rinehold, everyone was able to perform before the home crowd.

Extending their winning streak to four in a row on February 1, Juniata defeated Shippensburg State College with a score of 54-48. The Raiderettes represented one of the more challenging teams of their season, but J.C. played a controlled game with strong shooting and exceptional rebounding. Once again the opponents height advantage was offset by J.C.'s hustle and determination. Mardi Frye became record high scorer pumping in 24 points in her best appearance of the season. Forward Kim Norris followed with 15.

This game proved to be more than just another win for the women in that they gained more confidence in themselves, preparing for the game tonight against the St. Francis women. Having defeated them here at home, J.C. is expecting a tough retaliatory effort by St. Francis.

Juniata's Matmen Lose By A "Heart-Thumping" Three Points

by John Paulshock
Grapplers Licked, 21-18

The Juniata matmen were beaten again, and dropped their dual-meet record to one win and nine sore defeats. Friday evening turned out fatal to the grapplers as Messiah handed them a 21-18 deficit, the fifth time in a row that the Indians have lost by only six points or less. The fact that Juniata is wrestling in the absence of a 118 pounder seems to account for their slim losses, and many costly forfeits.

The Indian wrestlers somewhat switched roles against Messiah, when the "re-born" heavy-weights took control of the resilite; and the previously mighty light-weights were subjected to over-powering contenders. Ron Nickle and Steve Harper both wrestled to perfection to earn decisions, and added six points to the J.C. tally. Mike Hanselman stole the show in the 190 lb. class when he registered a second period pin, followed by a Chick Simmons "flattenation" in the heavy-weight division. Denison, Ashworth, Brown, Moeller, and Shultis all suffered defeats, however not sacrificing a pin; still the Indians were downed by a Heart-thumping three points.

The score-card of the afternoon reveals:

118 lbs.—Messiah won by forfeit. (6-0)
126 lbs.—Denison lost by decision. (9-0)
134 lbs,—Ashworth lost by decision. (12-0)
142 lbs.—Brown lost by decision. (15-0)
150 lbs.—Moeller lost by decision. (18-0)
158 lbs.—Nickle won by decision. (18-3)
167 lbs.—Harper won by decision. (18-6)
177 lbs.—Shultis lost by decision. (21-6)
190 lbs.—Hanselman won by fall. (21-12)
Hevywet.—Simmons won by fall.
Final Score, Mess. 21-J.C. 18

Overall, the muscle-men are in quite the precarious spot in M.A.C. competition with only a 1-9 slate, but their lack of a 118 pounder has summed the winning margin for the whole season. Eyebrows were raised on Friday evening when big "Chick" Simmons returned after resting his injuries, but Bill Bruner has reportedly finished his year with a knee ailment. Coach Berrier has hopes of finishing the year with a healthy squad, and proceeding into the M.A.C.'s seeking a few first place slots.

Students Face New Probation

by Tom Kutz

This is it, the article you've all been waiting for— it's, everything you've always wanted to know about academic probation but have been afraid to tell your parents. Yes, Good readers, this article will tell you in dull colors just what the policy is and how it is to be implemented (if you haven't already learned about it on the street).

Question: Just what does academic probation mean?

Answer: Well first of all, it means that for a full-time degree student to remain in good academic standing he/she must satisfactorily complete, or be making satisfactory progress towards completing, at least two units a term. If only one unit is completed then the person is automatically put on academic probation. A student who doesn't make it through even one unit in a term may continue in the next term but there is something of a catch. This may be done only with the permission of the Academic Standards Committee and then only on academic probation. Anyone in this situation must write a letter of petition to the Registrar for the committee's permission. This letter must clearly indicate specific ways in which the student plans to improve her/his academic performance. Once on academic probation, good standing (that is satisfactorily completing two units a term) must be achieved for the next two terms. If the person fails to do this, then academic dismissal will result.

Question: Is there anyway out of it?

Answer: Kind of — exceptions to this rule may be granted by petitioning the Academic Standards Committee.

Question: When does this thing start?

Answer: The policy will go into effect in the Spring Term. So from spring '75 on, full-time degree students must pass at least two units a

Student Gov't Odds 'n Ends

Student Concerns is busy evaluating the health survey taken a few weeks ago. The number of returns was relatively satisfying. The committee is planning two speakers in February and March. One speaking from N.O.R.M.L. about the legalization of marijuana and the other is speaking on amnesty. In addition to the speakers, the committee is in the process of making a handbook which will provide useful information to the student about the campus and the general area.

Public Relations is closing in on a date on which Lieutenant Govenor Ernest Kline will come and speak. April 10 is the tentative date but a letter of confirmation has yet to arrive. The Food Service committee has issued menus to all R.A.'s and hopes that they will be posted. The committee is interested in 30 or 40 students to thoroughly go over the menu picking out the strong selections and eliminating the weakest ones. If you are interested, contact either Steve Cordove or Ed Hinchey.

The Army Corps of Engineers is doing a study of hydro-power at Raystown Dam. Federal funds will be available for studies relating to the ecology and economy of the area. Carl Glaeser has further information for anyone interested.

Course evaluation booklets have and will be on sale in Ellis lobby— take advantage of these booklets. Along with the idea of courses, remember to fill out the survey pertaining to S and U grades.

"Modes" - What Is It Worth In Units?

BY Henry Siedzikowski

This past Wednesday, the full faculty, at their monthly meeting voted to reduce the credit for the Modes of Thought course from two units to one unit. I was asked to write an article on the possible implications of this change. What I found was one of the strangest stories of administrative procedure I have ever heard.

When the request was made, I was not even aware that a change had been made. With this kind of start, I should have expected something out of the ordinary. But, totally unaware of what awaited me, I decided the best place to start was with Dr. Lakso, last year's director of the Modes Program. It was here that the story began to unwind.

Dr. Lakso first pointed out to me that he was no longer Director of the Modes Program. However, as a faculty member, he has gone before a joint meeting of the Faculty Committee on Academic Standards and the Faculty Program Committee, and suggested that they re-evaluate the Modes course and the credit allotted it. At that time, the issues were given some preliminary discussion, and a subcommittee was formed to give the question further study. Apparently before the subcommittee could get started on its work, certain members of the faculty,wishing to speed up the change, petitioned to have the issue brought before a full faculty meeting. This was done, and the change was approved for next year with virtually no study done on the consequences.

Somewhat amazed, I proceeded over to Founder's Hall to talk to the Provost for a fuller explanation. He confirmed the story I already had, and then added a few details. First, he pointed out that there was widespread agreement among the faculty that a change should be made in the credit given for Modes. According to Dr. Norris, he saw the big issue as the timing of the change. He pointed out that along with the reduction in credit for the course, corresponding changes are going to have to be made in the course format. This may be difficult to do effectively in time for implementation next fall.

Secondly, the Provost provided some encouraging news. Apparently,the issue is already being reconsidered. One of Dr. Norris' concerns was the current graduation requirements were approved by a two-thirds vote of the faculty. It was his feeling that any change in the graduation requirements, which this clearly is, should require a similar two-thirds vote. This change was approved by a slim majority of the faculty, which may raise questions as to its legitimacy.

Considering the current situation, I decided to do a little research of my own on this subject. I talked to a number of students, including Carl Glaeser, current Student Government President. Carl saw the change in light of current faculty attitudes. He said, "In principle, the changing of Modes of Thought and Inquiry to one unit of credit could be interpreted as part of the "saving atmosphere" provided to us at the previous J.C. faculty meeting. But the Modes issue was not like the academic probation and s/u grading issues. Modes was an esoteric issue, which showed an even possible larger split between the academic divisions than previously existed. With this possible continuing caucus voting by the academic divisions, alienation of the original intent of J.C. education might occur."

While this provided an interesting perspective, I interviewed a number of freshman who had just finished the course to see how they viewed the change. I found two major schools of thought. There were those who said they liked the change because they thought it more beneficial to get into "Substantive" courses right from the beginning.

On the other hand, a number of students preferred the current setup because they felt it made adjustment to college education easier, thereby improving their later performance. I did not get a chance to talk with any involved faculty about how they perceived the implications of the change. However, I find it difficult to believe that there are not members of our faculty supporting both of these viewpoints.

Even with this little bit of information, I wonder if this change was illconsidered. I find it difficult to talk about possibie implications, because I have been taught here that an educated person studies a problem before jumping in and recklessly making changes.

However, for the benefit of those faculty who are choosing to reconsider the issue, I will offer some speculations on this question. First, there is the consideration of the change in format that the Modes course will now have to undergo. I was a freshman the first year that Modes was taught. That year, Modes was somewhat disorganized and badly in need of refinement. In the last four years, we have seen the development that seems so crucial for one of the keystone courses of the new curriculum. It seems one might question whether we will throw that all away by this change.

Secondly, there is the matter of

JC Red Tape In Academics

BY Brian Smith

Just recently I went to the head of a department here at Juniata to see about taking an advanced placement test in that department to try to get credit for a course I had in high school. At that time I found out that to take an advanced placement test for any department one must be a first term freshman. So, a little bit frustrated, I set out to find the reason behind such a policy.

After checking around a bit I found the reasoning behind such a policy to be as follows: The school would like to have the student receive advanced placement within the first ten weeks of him/her being on campus. This, according to the school, would be better for the student for the sooner after high school that the test is taken the more information the student is liable to remember. Really, if the student waits a year he/she could always review and take the test then. Another reason for the policy is that it was found in the past that students would take hard courses and then go back and take advanced placement tests for the easier courses. This could be countered by a policy that tsudents already having credit for an advanced course in an area could not be able to take the tests for a simpler course. The last reason given to me was that it was easier for the school to keep the records efficiently. I really don't see where that comes into play in our program of emphasis.

With this in mind I set out to find possible alternatives to advanced placement. One is called credit by exam. This, I understand, is where one does not attend classes but takes the test for the class when ever the regular class tests are given. Credit by exam would have to be taken as one of the regular three courses during a term or it would have to be taken as an overload. The former suggestion would

by Wendy Jacobus

Colleges, as well as other institutions of learning, often feel compelled to separate the academic from the non-academic. They seem to harbor the philosophy that their school must either work toward an intellectual goal, or a social/cultural goal. There can be little integration of aims. In the first instance physical plants, cultural and social activities are sacrificed in favor of academic allocations. The measuring stick for a college in this first category becomes academically oriented. (The questions most frequently asked include: What percent of the graduating class got jobs in their field? What percent of the pre-med students were accepted at medical schools?)

Up to this point in our college history, Juniata fit the mold of the first college example. Task forces were assigned to investigate curriculum but generally disregarded campus life. Committees attempted to place the educational opportunities offered the students in a vacuum while assuming the quality of life on campus was not influential. They inferred that activities outside the classroom had no bearing upon response, interest, and progress in the classroom. But today we are finding evidence to the contrary. Neglect of the social/cultural aspects of college life may be jeopardizing the mere existence of the JC community. There appears to be a definite correlation between the academic and the non-academic and we must realize the impact one has upon the other in order to insure our own well-being.

Recently some faculty and students became genuinely concerned over the cause and effect of discontent on campus, which some felt evolved from this neglect of the non-academic. Through their efforts, developed the idea of the colloquy which took place on campus Tuesday February 11th. The purpose of the day as stated by Carl Glaesar, president of student government, was to "define a concept of wholeness of community; to seek a better relationship among segments of the college community." There were teams of professors and students assigned to halls within each dorm and college house in order to identify mutual concerns and to look for solutions to these concerns. Later in the day there was a Town Meeting, guided by a panel composed of President Stauffer, Provost Norris, Dean Robinson, students and faculty members.

But the greatest single promise the day held was, it was not a farce. Tuesday, Quality of Life Day, was a sincere effort on behalf of the administration to communicate with the students. It was the first step in a long term process of changing the non-academic at Juniata. The President has already been involved in the formulation of a commission to further investigate possible causes and solutions to this complicated problem. Tuesday therefore was not simply a day for communication, reaching out; it represented the beginning of change.

Finally, it's ironic to note that the sole stress placed upon curriculum, which imposed some neglect upon the non-academic, the principle cause of the problem, provides us with a situation whereby we can apply the communication processes, data collecting techniques, and Modes of Thought our academic program stresses. It will be interesting to note if our value-centered education has truly impressd upon us the tools necessary to improve the non-academic quality of life and thereby guarantee a future for Juniata College.

I would like to comment on Brad Rudy's article, "Rudy's Twenty Three and a Half ", on February 6. I applaud you, Mr. Rudy, on your unique style of writing. i thoroughly enjoyed what you were saying until the final approximately ¼ of the article. Personally, I resent being called "lazy and stupid" with a "fart-sized brain" just because I am not interested in Fellini movies. On the weekends, I like to relax with my friends — and this does not mean having a rowdy party. My idea of relaxation does not include getting a sore ass from sitting in the dark for two hours nor straining my already near-sighted eyes to read subtitles. Don't get me wrong. I enjoy watching movies, especially in a bona fide movie theatre. In fact, I attended many of last years productions. But, and perhaps I'm being prejudicial, from my experiences last year, the equipment used was none too good. Every film I went to malfunctioned in one way or another. And I'm still wary of J.C. productions. Personally, I would rather talk with friends whom I haven't been able to see all week (and they don't have subtitles) than to see a Fellini film. To refer to HEA, am I to be criticized for professing different values than someone who is obviously a movie buff?

by MK

Dear M.K.,

No, you are not to be condemned if you do not like Fellini, and I honestly apologize to you and to others who may have wrongly taken offense. My article was aimed at that not-so-silent majority who condemn the films without seeing any of them. This shows a closed-mindedness inconsistent with a college community, and deserves every epithet I tossed. But if you discovered you really hate Fellini, I can't do anything except be glad my series made you discover that for yourself. Thanks for your comments.

Brad Rudy

— note—we have now projectors that work. . . . . .sometimes — notenote—after the movies there's 46 hours of weekend left for visitation purposes 30 if you don't count sleep.

Dear Editor—

On the evening of August 5, 1972, a white women was reputably raped by three black men in the city of Tarboro, North Carolina. These three men were arrested, convicted and sentenced to the death penalty. However, the evidence suggests that the men are not guilty of the crime as stated (forcible rape) and therefore, a miscarriage of justice is implied. Defense for the three men is the non-profit legal advisory organization, Southern Poverty Law Center, headed by Julian Bond. The Center has been involved in a lengthy appeal of this case. They have sent us, students of Juniata College, a plea for both our moral and financial support. If you are interested in more information, members of Andy Murray's HEA class as resource persons and a transcript of the trial itself are available. Donations are being accepted through the office of Andy Murray, Campus Minister. Help us help them.

Thank you, Kim Norris, Barry Specter, Elaine Becker, Jane Irwin, Dave Cockley, Denise Deaner, Steve Norris, and Linda Fidler.

Have Modern Medicine Reached Huntingdon?

Practicing medicine used to be an easy profession. All you needed to know was how to cut hair, pull teeth, and hack off a bone here ans there. There were a few important tools that every "doctor" needed to have in his black bag—a saw, a bottle of whiskey, a bullet to bite on, and leeches. Then medicine progressed with the phlogiston theory and a "doctor" needed the above paraphenalia along with the all-important glass cabinet full of various creams, salves, and ointments. Has Huntingdon progressed passed this point. Sometimes I really wonder, especially when I have to consult a "doctor" in this town.

Unfortunately this was the case again this year. I think some of the physicians (that's the technical name for Medical Doctors ala Huntingdon) practice medicine the way Monty Hall runs "Let's Make a Deal." If you're not capable of diagnosing and prescribing for yourself you're in real trouble. You are then confronted with the situation of picking disease #1, disease #2, or disease #3. If you happen to have a cynical and masochistic sense of humor this can really turn out to be real "fun."

I was given the choice of four different main categories (got that Monty, they're one up on you): and allergy, a "superficial skin infection" (for those not well read in medical terminology that's an infection on the outside of the skin, or something like that), a psychosomatic rash, or a staph infection. When confronted with this situation, I thought it best to leave it in the competent(?) hands of the physician. (Here comes the fun you masochiste)! So we first treated it as an allergy. This calls for a shot of adrenalin chloride and various antihistimines. We gave this a couple of days to no avail and decided to con sult another member of Huntingdon's medical community. Authoritatively speaking, he decided it was a "superficial skin infection" and prescribed a very explicit procedure that would resolve the problem immediately (if followed carefully), wash with phisohex, put on the "magic" cream and stick them with a pin or needle of your choice! Maybe it's because I didn't use the right pin, but the problem persisted and it was back to doctor #1. Well, he insisted the "hives" were gone and I've now contracted a Staph infection. It's funny that exactly where the hives existed the pustules appeared, but let's not get technical. More pills were prescribed and I was to see him in a week. In the meantime the "infection" was rapidly spreading so it was up to the E.R. of J. C. Blair. Thank God there was an alert competent doctor (or orderly, I'm not sure which) on the scene and I finally felt as though I was in good hands. He inquired as to what his associates had said and prescribed a new "miracle" drug. His competence(?) was made evident by the fact that he didn't even need to see the symptoms to prescribe the drug. I had to ask him to look at them, and he agreed with Dr. #1, "it certainly is an infection of some sort." I think he could make a mint by prescribing drugs through 3rd class mail since symptoms aren't necessary. I then inquired if I could have a culture done. I don't profess to know too much about medicine but it seems as though it would (possibly) be helpful in diagnosing exactly what I have. So it was off to the lab today and it turned out that he ordered a blood count instead of a culture. Yes, this verified his "diagnosis", I do have an infection, of some sort. So here I am 6 drugs later and still scratching my gluteus maximus off!

In all seriousness, though this may seem like situational comedy, I think it is a sad problem. Admittedly, all doctors in Huntingdon are not member's of the Actor's Guild, in fact some are reputed to be quite good, so I'm told. I feel the one's that do handle their profession in this way should be looked in to and at least told that the phlogistom theory has been disproven.

Respectfully,
Kevin T. Weir

More Verbal Downer's Demise of Institutions

by Mickael Martin

I think that somewhere, in my distant and indistinquishable past, there must have been some relative of mine who had as a hobby griping. That relative probably sat around all day "gluming" everybody out. It would then appear that there are such things as glum genes in the makeup of the human chromosomes as it seems that I am following the same path.

This is but one of my excuses for my constant verbal downers that appear every so often in this medium. It's not that I want to be this way. It's that something seems to grab the pen (other then my hand) and force it to spew forth globs of negatives. There are things everywhere that just won't leave me alone. There appears to be monsters everywhere, that influence me. The monsters of our environment and society that just don't end like a good B-rate flick. These perhaps influence me more than anything for I'm a constant observer, a watcher of the skies, a coward, and a "n'er do well" pessimist who can't take off his dark glasses.

Let me show you some of the things that stimulate me. Some of the things that make me react in the ways that I do. For instance, just the other day, I found out that they've finally come out with the Godfather, Part II. I had thought all along that perhaps the Hollywood moguls were joking and wouldn't dupe the American public into sitting through another Mafia malestrom. The first one was so gritty that whenever anyone now says, "Hey, sonny!", I dive for the nearest aisle. What is even worse is that I have visions of thousands of more "pizza" film. What with one disaster film after another why not hordes of "pizza" films? Couldn't you just see the titles alone of these "pizza" movies I certainly can. How about La Dolce Pizza, The Posseidon Pizza, Behind the Anchovy Pizza, The Big Pizza, Citizen Pizza, or Gone with The Pizza How about Clockwork Pizza, The Pizzabroker, and Butch Pizza and the Sundance Pepperoni But why stop there Why not The Return of the Pizza Snatcher, or the Creature from The Pizza Logoon And we could even have black exploitation"pizza" films like Pizzula. You see what this stuff, this human junk, does to me

Of course, there was also the item reported not too long ago that talked about the possible demise of that American institution, the supermarker. It appears that supermarkets these days are only operating on a profit margin of ½ of 1 percent. As far as I'm concerned, they could let the stupid things die. Now I know that would be a blow to the American economy and would inconvenience many of America's housewives, but somehow what they've wrought upon the American public seems to be adequete evidence for the coup de grace. From them we'vee gotten stainless steel place settings, tons of Muzak, endless printout slips, strawberries packed in plastic boxes without revealing the green ones in the center, and the ten foot high shelf. At this point, I don't know what you feel like doing, but as for me, I feel like making a run for cover.

Perhaps, though, this is not of any interest to you. Maybe I should bring it to another level. Hoe about the campus level There are a pletera of topics here on campus, too. These are most pertinent as they affect us all. Being connected with the food service at dinner as the student lead, offers me many topics. I'm sure you all know who I am. I'm that nice young man whom parades up and down in front of the cafeteria hour and at whom most of you glare at from time to time. I also catch some of you taking things from the cafeteria. I also catch all the grief that results from these captures. Now that really doesn't bother me that much, though I am basically a coward. What bothers me are the ways in which some of us attempt to take things from the refectory. Most of us appear to be quite stupid. Then there are the lines that I get for the reason why some should have unlimited checkout priveleges. There are the standards of "I've paid for this so why not take it," or "This whole loaf of bread (or quart of milk) is for the entire table—of two," or "That this whole bag of salad is due to me since I didn't eat any." I wish that somebody would think up something novel for once. But what irks me the most is the fact that everyone screams about how much this joint costs and how lousy the food is or how screwed up the social life is, and on and on. Yet no one seems to realize that what causes all of these troubles at the incessent stealing of food, the vandalism, and the social cliches that are present. Thus we

by Bob Meacham

FLASH½The UPI has reported that Swedish Communists are trying to bring the sacred Golden Arches of McDonalds tumbling down. Franchised hamburger chains area danger to the working people". An irate party member accused the ..merican cultural imperialism of spreading food not native to Sweden. The hamburger culture is a danger to the people. The people have to eat very fast and under pressing conditions ? lots of people and noise."

America—Where is your pride, vim and vigor Are we going to put up with these insults McDonalds is the All-American institution. They not only sell hot apple pie, but they employ mothers. My mother, your mother. . .they all have the chance, the great American dream of working for individual profit. All those hours of working the semi-automatic french fry salter and being lusciously bathed in hamburger grease are rewarded with a forty-hour pay check of $61.57. Employment of the common person, the key to the lock of social mobility, is made available by this great institution of the Golden Arch.

Why, the gall to criticize the hamburger as a danger to the people Lots of noise and lots of people That is good old American socializing. One might even run into his neighbor who he hasn't seen for five years while trying to force his way to the counter with the fastest moving line. Doctors, lawyers, Indian Chiefs. . .we all rub elbows in quest of purchasing a Friday evening Big Mac dinner. Lots of noise, lots of people. It is the American way. Busy parking lots. Horns and hangouts. McDonalds wrappers decorating our highways. Signs, billloards, advertisements and Ronald McDonald, the burger deity. Triple thick shakes bolstered with artificial sweetening. Soybean, grease, dirty bathrooms and security guards.

The Godfather Is Coming To Town

by Brad Rudy

"The Godfather," along with its "Sequel" (I prefer to call it conclusion), comprise an epic vision and condemnation of America and the stale souring of its way of life. In the first part (to be seen next week on campus), we are shown a gangster family, one we felt empathetically drawn to, despite ourselves. In the second part, we have the beginning and the end of the story—we finally know why we felt sympathy for the Corleones, and we are finally compelled to hate the Corleones. The two are inseparable, and, together they create "The Great American Movie"—a hostile view of our way of life in a form which is both escapist "trash" and "artistic creation."

The novel by Mario Puzo, to give it the best compliment I can think of, is a couple hundred pages of mindless crap. The characters are all cardboard cliche figures (they can all be described in a sentence or two) and the situations are sensationalism, pseudopornography, or mindless violence—effects meant to make it "readable" and "gripping," but actually make it "monotonous" and "boring." Puzo is given partial credit for screenwriting in both parts of the movie, but, after seeing his shoddy work in "Earthquake," I suspect that this was for royalty purposes only.

What screenwriter-director Francis Ford Coppola has done was to take the bare bones of this piece of schlock and develop a highly subtle, highly lyrical, and highly watchable two part epic. (One hardly notices the three hour time span of part one.) He has reduced the acts of violence to a bare minimum, and made these climatic peaks of episodes. The tension is created subtly and carefully by the photography, by the music, by the performances, by the editing, until you are so caught up that the violence "purges" the viewer with a somewhat cathartic effect— this is the main reason why the second viewing is better than the first: you know exactly what's going to happen, and Coppola's style thrives on this—it's as if he expects the audience to know what's going to happen. Also, the greater the tension build-up, the more detailed the violent scene is. This buildup can be several minutes long—as Michael's "initiation" at the restaurant—or only a second or two—as Sonny's "execution." The "surprise" deaths are usually garrotings or even off-screen gunshots. The violence is not played up for its schlockosensationalist value but for its greatest dramatic effect, being underplayed when it's not really that important.

But enough of this apologizing for the material. What really makes "The Godfather" so important is its view of the corrupting influences Americanization has on the Corleones (Puzo's novel ignores this totally, or, at best, makes it less important than the Corleone's effect on America). Don Vito Corleone is the Godfather—a protector—someone his family and people can come to for help. His son Michael is pure swill—a rotting American—a gangster out for all the power he can get no matter what the cost. Not until the end of part II do we really see what that cost is—his

by Suzi Baker

Since my return to campus, I have been startled by the prevalent feeling of dissatisfaction among students. This is not to imply that discontent is a new phenomenon for Juniata, quite to the contrary. Yet, the general mood of the student body is disturbing and seems to be more deeply-rooted than in previous years. This is particularly evident by the already vacant rooms and the incredible number of underclassmen contemplating transfer. If you are considering transferring, act on judgment and not on impulse.

Last semester I had the opportunity to attend American University in Washingto , D.C. It gave me a chance to experience life on a larger campus in a metropolitan area. I can only conclude that all colleges have advantages and disadvantages, some peculiar to their institution, others shared with institutions of a similar size. For instance, I hear a number of complaints about the Juniata food service. For four months I lived without benefit of the food service. It's both tiresome and time-consuming to come back after class and still have dinner to think about. I often wished the little man would have my meal on the table when I got home, but unfortunately that was not the case. The availability of a food service makes life a lot easier, even though you may not realize it.

How would you like to live on the fifth floor of a dorm, with the clouds and the sporrows? That means five flights of stairs to stumble down every time there is a fire drill. (And we averaged one firedrill a week, including drills at 2 a.m. on Saturdays and 4a.m. on weeknights!) It also means waiting for an elevator every time you have to leave the dorm. (If you've ever seen any of the disaster flicks about elevators, you'll think twice.)

Following the murder of a Howard University student in her dorm room, A.U. tightened up on campus security. There is only one entrance to the dorm and this is covered by a security guard. Imagine having your room keys or I.D. checked everytime you enter the dorm. And having the door to your room lock automatically every time it closes. Intra-collegiate robbery is an extracurricular activity in D.C. Kind of like I.M. teams for petty larceny.

As for professor-student relationships, the rapport between professors and students is tenuous at best. With an undergraduate student body of 5,000 the possibility of personally knowing or having out-of-class conferences with a professor is almost non-existent.

I suppose at this point you're saying "Hail Juniata!" but not so fast! The University does have its advantages. The living facilities are great.rooms are air-conditioned and private phones can be installed. Maids come in to clean the rooms once every two weeks. The halls are carpeted and fairly soundproof. Laundry and kitchen facilities are located on each floor. The Washington Post is delivered door-to-door daily. And to add a little spice to life, the halls are co-ed.

As far as educational advantages, the location of the University gives access to a wealth of resource materials. The Library of Congress, other university libraries, as well as government and independent agencies provide a mountain of data for any research endeavor. This is also the advantage of interviewing persons who are active and knowledgeable in your area of research.

The University sponsored a variety of speakers: General Moshe Dayan, Ralph Nader, Sargent Shrivor, Senator Walter Mondale, and Marvin Kalb. These speakers further supplement the intellectual scope of the student.

Because of the University's location in D.C., entertainment is no problem. A myriad of museums and historical landmarks can occupy your spare time. During the semester, the neighboring universities and the Capitol Center sponsored concerts, most notably: Elton John, George Harrison, America, Harry Chapin and the Beach Boys.

Probably the most attractive extracurricular feature of the University is an on-campus tavern. The Tavern is run exclusively by and for the American U. student body serving beer, wine and food (catered by Mr. Henry's). A small dance floor makes "the bump" a weekly affair. Generally, the Tavern is someplace to go and someplace to socialize. And oddly enough the drinking privilege doesn't seem to be abused by its patrons.

The advantages and disadvantages of a larger campus are many and varied. There is no way to impose the benefits of American U. on the Juniata campus, simply because the environment of A.U. makes it unique. If you are contemplating a transfer, however, give the idea considerable thought. There are many facets of life and curriculum at Juniata that are unique also. Things you take for granted now, may be missed later. In the spirit of ol' Juniata, the decision to transfer is a value judgment. In the meantime, you can apply for the Washington Semester and get the best of both worlds.

Gift to Give Love of Self

by alice Boomhower

Gazing aimlessly at the calendar a few days ago I suddenly realized tha Friday is Valentine's Day, ¶Hot Damn!½that wonderful day when I can tell those that I love and appreciate exactly how much I love and appreciate them. Trucking on down to the bookstore and peering attentively at the cards, I find that the country's economic situation and mine are not in tune with one another. For fifty cents I can buy a little plastic heart glued to a frail piece of recycled paper. For another fifty cents I can but someone else's handwriting and a picture of a couple running barefoot through amber waves of grain, certainly not appropriate for my mother. I decide to make my own cards this year, so I buy red construction paper and white doilies.

It is extremely frightening to see the number of people who do purchase these Valentines. These people live vicariously through other people's fantisies. Certainly not all cards are like this, some are extremely appropriate for different situations. However, how often do we purchase, say, or think what we know others want is to purchase, say, or think. What is even more frightening is that we are often not honest with ourselves. We accept without questioning, simply because we are too busy to question. After all, it is easier to go along with the Dorm."

For this Valentine's Day, I would like to advocate a little love of self. Analysis of one's self could be the greatest gift you can give to those people to whom you would normally send a card, for if you know yourself, you can know yourself with others.

World Situation Is Glum Vonnegut Is No Escape!

"KYW news time, 10:01. The top story at this hour. . . .Unemployment figures skyrocket to 8.2% despite recent Administration estiments."

Just minutes after this bulletin had left Washington, Philadelphia's all information radio station was spitting it into the airwaves over three states. In one of those states, a Juniata College student straddles a copy of Player Piano across his make shift coffee table and reaches for the volumn knob of his receiver.

"KYW news time, 10:01. The top story at this hour. . . .Unemployment figures skyrocket to 8.2% despite recent Administration estimates."

Jolted out of Vonnegut's imagination, the student falls back on the couch and listens somberly.

"The new figure represents the highest unemployment level since 1941, at which time 8.9% of the work force found themselves idled."

The students eyes drift to the binding of his spread-eagled book. It is broken. He thinks of the novel and it's tale of chronic uselessness for millions of unemployed. He thinks they are broken too.

"High economic officials are hopeful the figure will level off at eight and one half percent, but are reluctant to specify the basis for this prediction."

The student reaches for the novel. It feels heavy in his fingers. Falling from his grasp, the book knocks a china tea mug to the floor. It too becomes broken.

"The experts also noted that no quick recovery is in sight. The unusually high unemployment level is expected to continue at least through the 1976 election."

The student thinks of his graduation in 1976. He thinks of his lover. He thinks of their future.As he collects the pieces of the broken mug, he notices a reflection of himself in one of the fragments. He hopes that he does not become broken.

"In other stories at this hour. . . . President Ford's economic pac"

'So it goes', thinks the student. He spins the tuning knob randomly. He wants music, far away music. He wants to be lost. The student sets the ruined mug aside and retreats into his novel. He turns the page and his attention is caught by a disturbing passage.

". . .the smarter you are, the better you are. Used to be the richer you were, the better you were. Either one is, you'll admit, pretty tough for the have-nots to take."

The student becomes distirbed as his mind paints pictures of hav-not people. He wonders who they are. He wonders how smart they really are. He wonders if have-not people are broken. He wonders if he is smarter than the have-not people.

These thoughts are not pleasant to the student. He closes the cover of the book, it had become a burden. He decides to glue his mug instead. While covering his desk with papers, the student sees the word SURVEY typed across the top of one page. Once again, images of have-not people flood his mind's eye. None of them have surveys. He wonders if they are smart enough to have surveys.

The student looks again at the questions. He wants to prove that he is smart enough to have a survey. He reaches for a pencil.

that first term providing an adjustment period. While I don't feel qualified to make a total judgement on this question, I feel this set-up helped me, and I am aware of others who feel this way.

Finally, I have to wonder if this wave of changes is possibly the first subtle rejections of the New Curriculum. It clearly seems to be a move away from our former concepts of General Education. Also, by forcing incoming freshman to choose a regular course from what will surely be a limited list, you are reintroducing a certain rigidness into the curriculum that we were supposedly working to remove for the last few years.

In conclusion, I don't believe I'd be on very solid ground if I suggested that this change was bad on the limited amount of information I now have. However, by the same reasoning, I find it difficult to accept the faculty position. I can only ask the faculty, in the name of the college community they are trying to save, to reconsider the issue. Fundamental changes in the curriculum should not be made hastily without serious study. It is a frenzied attitude that spawned this move, exactly the type of attitude that a good liberal education seeks to prevent.

As JC Soars Higher— The Crowd Gets Rowdier

by A. D. Wirt

On Thursday February 6th the Juniata Indians hit the road for yet another test of their basketball know-how. Their opponent was Indiana University of Pennsylvania. (A school known by most Juniata males primarily for their lavish supply of females.) But, alas, they have a basketball team too. And quite a good one, I might add.

I.U.P. entered the game with an 11-4 record, compared with Juniata's 10-8 mark. The hosts wasted little time setting the pace of the game as the defending Pennsylvania Conference Champs blew open a quick 10-2 lead. Things didn't gt any better for Juniata as the game progressed, and at half-time I.U.P. was in the lead 39-29.

Watching Juniata's basketball team playing on a foreign court was like looking at a completely different squad than what we see at our home games. The team lacked the spark and enthusiasm that they posess when on their own court. not only that, but their style of play was radically different too.

As Greg Rufo explained on the trip home, "When we play away games the coach wants us to run a controled. patterned offense. We try to control the tempo of the game."

This is in sharp contrast to the fast-breaking, sometimes frenzied manner that we witness at home games. Greg went on to say, "If we ran the ball against a team like Indiana, on their home court, they'd blow us out of the game."

So much for the stratedgy. The only trouble was, that on this particular night it didn't work.

Indiania employed an aggressive man to man defense which stymied Juniata's efforts to score. Coach Meditch's charges were forced to abandon their game plan, and after that, Indiana controlled the game till the final buzzer. After Indiana's initial outburst of points, the closest Juniata came was within seven points at the four minute mark in the first half.

Juniata fell to their ninth defeat of the season by a score of 72-57. Don Williams led all scorers with 16 points, and Larry Moore added 11 markers with a team high 6 rebounds.

This past Saturday night proved more profitable for Juniata as the Indians fought off a stubborn Wagner College five at Memorial Gym, and earned a 56-54 win.

The Juniatians desperately needed a victory voer the New York City club in order to remain eligable for the Middle Atlantic Conference playoffs.

With the aid of some very pro-Juniata officiating, and good team defense, as well as all around hussle, the team notched out their 11th victory of the season. Their record now stands at 11-9, pending the outcome of yesterday's game with Elizabethtown College.

The cheer leaders had nothing to gripe about on Saturday night, as a rowdy crowd turned out with enough spirit to make their job a pleasure again. It was refreshing to see our little lovlies smiling once more. Good job student body!

This Saturday in Memorial Gym, your Indians enter another crucial MAC contest, against presently undefeated Philadelphia Textile. The game should be a thriller, and we need the win. So take a time out in your partying, and be there to catch all the action.

have no one to blame but ourselves.

What can we do Do we just send up smoke signals? Perhaps what will occur or what will have occured on Tuesday will bring about some answers. I look at it this way. Why not try to communicate with ourselves and each other. Let's try to reason this thing out and show each other how wrong we all are before we swallow each other up and create our own monsters. I don't know about you, but I'm going to try even though I am the way I am The consequences are far too great not to try. Somehow. . . . . .

Matmen Drop A Close One

by John Pualshock

Grapplers Drop Close One

The Thursday evening of Feb. 6, proved to be no different for the Juniata Matmen as they were defeated in another one of their infamous slim losses. The wrestlers from the Altoona Campus of Penn State utilized the almighty forfiet from Juniata at 118 pounds, and the six point advantage allowed them to squeak past the Indians by a moral-crushing 20-18 pt. spread. This loss gives the J.C. grapplers a discouraging dual-meet record of one win and ten losses.

Steve Denison began the Indian attack in the 126 lb. class when he hammered his opponent, and earned a four point decision. Mark Brown suffered a wound, and later some stitches; but he managed a tie and two points in the 142 lb. division. Steve Harper then sprung to life at 167, and registered a rousing pin for six more points. Steve Shultis at 177, and Mile Hanselman, at 190, both tallied wins, and Juniata was leading by 1 pt. going into the heavyweight bout. Altoona swiped the final victory and were the proud owners of another win.

The score-card looks something like this:

118 lbs.—Altoona won by forfeit. (6-0)

126 lbs.—Denison won by four pt. decision. (6-4)

134 lbs.—Ashworth lost by decision. (9-4)

142 lbs.—Brown tied. (11-6)

150 lbs.—Moeller lost by decision. (14-6)

158 lbs.—Nickle lost by decision. (17-6)

167 lbs.—Harper won by fall. (17-12)

177 lbs.—Shultis won by decision. (17-15)

190 lbs.—Hanselman won by decision. (17-18)

Hvywt.—Simmons lost by decision. (20-18)

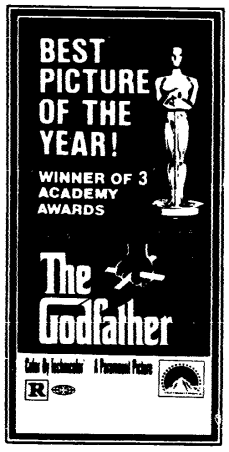
family, his college-bred and war-bred values, all contact with friendship, constant paranoia, and all the values (there's that word again!) his father would have died for. This generational schism, merely implied in part I, is blatantly expressed in part II. The celebration of the first communion of Michael's son pales at the vitality of Connie's wedding in part I. The nice Italian newlywed of part I becomes the shrewish American widow-divorcee-etc. etc. ad nauseum of part II. The deterioration of Michael's character is constantly contrasted to the rise to power and "Godfather motivations" of his father.

Part II, then, erases any suspicion that "The Godfather" was only about the continuity of power in a mafia family. It is about America—the corrupting influence of America—the effects it can have on only one generation. The father, Don Vito, is an Italian who risks his life for fellow Sicilians. The son, Michael, is an American who has his own brother executed. There is no room for a third part. To kill off Michael would be a lie. He is dead at the end of part II, dying at the end of part I. He can go no higher power-wise, no lower character-wise. Al Pacino gives Michael his life—gives him a sensitivity going paranoia totally absent from Puzo's "Joe College" cardboard character. Marlon Brando and Robert DeNiro give Don Vito vitality Puzo never could have conceived, also. "The Godfather," then, is one of the best two American movies of the past few years, if not the best. It takes what is essentially a trashy and over-long novel and turns it into a highly rewarding vision of the American dream gone sour. And, at $1.00, unsullied by the demands of commercial television, it is really an offer you can't refuse.



Women Plan A Strong Finish!

by Jacque Prentiss
and Kim Norris

This week was not a busy week for the women's basketball team, having only one away game at Saint Francis on Thursday, Feb. 6th. This game ended up to be a very tough game with the Indians suffering defeat of the season with a score of 46-40. First half action showed poor execution and cold shooting by Juniata, leaving them behind at halftime with a score of 26-11. The Indians came back, out scoring St. Francis in the second half, but failed to compensate for their earlier mistakes. Forward Cathy Dickey led the team in scoring with 12 points, following by Mardi Frye with 10.

Although an end to their four game winning streak, the J.C. women realized the shortcomings in this game and anticipate finishing the season with no more losses.

Saturday the 15th the women will host Gettysburg College at 6:00 p.m. prior to the men's Philadelphia Textile game. Hope you'll find time to support both teams when they'll face these two challenging teams.

Suggestion Box What Is It For?

by Sam Siriar

Have you been seeing small boxes marked "Suggestion Box" and small red dots on light switches throughout the College Center? Well if you have, they were placed there by the Juniata College Energy Conservation Committee to aid in conserving energy, and if you haven't well start looking.

The suggestion boxes can be found in front of the Post-office, as well as up at the Information Desk of our Center. These small boxes are just ready to be filled with your suggestions on how the Committee can save energy on our campus.

As for those red dots over light switches, well, if you see one, that means don't use unless it is necessary to insure safety. As of now they can be seen throughout the College Center, but the committee plans on extending them into all the other campus buildings, in order to help us control our use of energy. The committee also plans to use them on window-shades to suggest —Open to let the Sun shine in and close to keep the cold night air out.

These little buggers are just the first step in our campaign to Save a Watt, yet the committee is in need of a catchy slogan to lead our campus endeaver. Therefore a slogan-contest is being held with the prize for the winning slogan being $5.00, which could buy 7 super-totes, 1 order of fries, and 2 cokes, or 2 tickets to Center Board's showing of "The Godfather" on February 22th, at 1:00, or help pay the ever increasing bills of "Higher Education".

So if you feel you have the winning solgan, write it down with your name and Stuff It! (In our box of course.)

defeat the purpose of getting out of having to take the course and the second would involve having to pay the regular two-hundred and fifty dollar overload fee. The other alternative would be to start out in an advanced level course right away. This would involve getting the permission of the instructor but would not give the student credit for what he/she already knows.

From what I've I cannot see any good reaso for not offering advanced placement tests to other students besides first term freshman. It is really our program of emphasis and should be our decision as to what term and what subject areas to take advance placement tests in. It should then be up to the student to review as much as he/she sees fit.

Flushsh! Time To Admire Those Literary Marvels

by Bill Brooks

When teachers start reiterating — I told you so — and ominous schedules are being printed up, the student can instinctively sense something big is pending. Yes, finals are creeping up once again and ready to drain our minds of all our knowledge. With the advent of these keep your fingers crossed exams, the character of the conscientious student assumes a different complexion. It seems the tolerance level decreases precipitously to a nonexistent state and temper flare with the least bit of antagonism. Likewise, the waning moments can be discerned by shorter finger nails and increased milk consumption to pacify stomach jitters. Doc. Brooks has a remedy to alleviate some of these emotional upheavals.

Tentions arise because the student is so obsessed with studying that outside activities are often neglected. Students around finals allot their time too prudently to engage themselves in any entertainment, yes? No! It's medical fact and a long time accepted natural occurrence that any person within the course of his life undergoes numerous bowel movements. The number is generally proportional to how much Cream of Wheat he or she eats at breakfast. Outhouses, and any derivative thereof, have been the abode of those who can't hold it for many centuries. Keeping this in mind, it would be erroneousness to say that a sudden urge at the library would only be coincidental. When one is compelled to exercise this bowel movement he is a prospective spectator of some of Juniata's most unpublicized and often neglected entertainment. I am of course speaking of those literary marvels that adorn the toilet stalls.

If you happen to possess a discriminating taste, you might decide to overlook the pornography and profanity and intently peer over the jokes. You wouldn't believe the humor and creativity that exist on this campus. This is not to say that the pornography and profanity are not worth reading, especially if you're as uncouth as I am. Since the Green Army occasionally washes these metal tablets clean, there always seems to be a perpetual circulation of new material. Thus, repetitious viewing are greatly reduced. By far, this is not all peaches and cream. Dual participation is not often advised. You know how rumors start. One thing is for sure, I wouldn't dare say this entertainment is finger licking good.

Dr. Gooch Wins National Science Foundation Grant

by Dr. James Gooch

Some things have happened to me that may be of interest to students and my colleagues here at 'Juniata. First, I have just received a $27,900 2-year grant from the National Science Foundation for a proposal entitled: Environmental Control of Regional Genetic Differentiation in Freshwater Invertebrates: Populations of Gammarus minus [AMPHIPODA: GAMMARIDAE] in Appalachian Valleys. Probably the cryptic profundity of the title was instrumental in gaining the award. The project is based on the relatively new idea that it is possible to determine post-Pleistocene migration patterns of aquatic organisms by relating indices of genetic distance—determined biochemically and mathematically—to present and inferred former drainage patterns.

I will also be an invited participant at a symposium on Problems in Marine Biology to be held at Duke University during May, 1975. It will be a bi-national conference of 6 American and 6 Russian scientists, 1 of each in the same discipline. It is being held under the auspices of the State Department, which will send down photographers to take pictures of smiling American and Russian scientists vigorously shaking hands. My presentation will be "on the role of larval dispersal of marine populations."

Finally, V. II of Treatise on Marine Ecology Wiley-Interscience, will be published early this year. I contributed a 60-page section on the genetics and evolution of marine invertebrates. The compilation of this review turned up some heretofore unknown references such as:
Ishmael, C. M. 1851. Albino sperm whale, Physeter catodon, displays agonistic behavior toward Nantucket research vessel in mid-Paci-

Action Reported By START Panel

by The Panel

The aftermath of last Tuesday's Town Meeting Day is a sincere beginning to find solutions to the concerns presented. The following is a report on the meeting of the S.T.A.R.T. Panel which was held on Monday evening, Feb. 17th. The list of concerns presented to the Panel were classified into two categories. The first category deals with those concerns on which work has begun. The second category addresses itself to those concerns that will be worked on during the Spring term.

Where work is going on now:

1. The Academic Probation policy has been distributed to students and faculty. Briefly, if a student fails all units in a term, that student will be dismissed from college. A student passing only one unit is placed on academic probation and must pass at least two units per term for the next two terms to be removed from probation. Students wishing clarification of the policy may consult the Academic Standards Committee or the Registrar.

2. Several questions have been raised about the first term program for entering freshmen, specifically about the relative lack of structure compared to high schools, the academic responsibility of freshmen, class attendance policy, curricular content, and Writing Program purpose. A joint subcommittee of the Academic Standards Committee and the Academic Program Committee has been studying the grading policies of Modes of Thought, Writing Program and Freshman Seminar. In addition the faculty has voted for the introduction of a graded elective in the fall term. Other matters dealing with the structure and content of these units are being dealt with by the staffs of the units. The effect of the changes will be to provide additional structure in the first term. Reports on some of these matters will be made at the faculty meeting on March 12.

3. A program of mini-courses is being developed for the spring term. Student Government will send a notice to the student body the first week back after term break. Several courses have already been slated for the third term. For example: Basic River Cruising, Folk Guitar Basic Recorder, Pattern and Forms in Rocks and Landscapes, and Dart Tournamenting.

4. There will be a womens' intercollegiate varsity tennis team in the spring. Women are also eligible to participate in intercollegiate track and field.

5. A student, faculty, administrative advisory committee to the President has been studying for a month the drinking policy and practice on campus. It will be reporting to the President next month.

6. The Commission of the Quality of Campus Life had their organizational meeting yesterday and will be working full time.

7. Room G200 will be open from 9:00 P.M. until 3:00 A.M. as an extra study room, beginning tonight.

To be worked on immediately:

1. Posting of ALL campus jobs in Career Planning Office.
2. Overload policy review and clarification of the billing proceedure.
3. Release of some budget information.
4. Lack of proper maintenance in dorms.
5. Academic advising.
6. R.A. leadership and selection for next year.
7. Athletic opportunities for women.
8. Local dorm governance.
9. Health service.

February 11th Triggers Juniata's Breakthrough

by Courtnay Byron Rhone

Indeed on Tuesday when we launched the beginning of the S.T.A.R.T. program I found myself totally overwhelmed by the success of the day's final outcome. I believe the total awareness of the problems that exist is more than a step in the right direction towards solving some, if not all, of the issues that have brought unrest to the campus. I think too that it was and is quite obvious that no one person or group of persons, can or should sit back on their laurels and point the finger on any one particular area as the crux to all the disdainful activities and blatantinequities.

With all of the scintillating energy that existed at the town meeting, it appears that we, the students, as well as the faculty and administration, are willing to reach out and say that there exists some cancerous substance here and we will cure it immediately without a doubt before it immobilizes us into a frenzied stupor. The only thing that I can think of that would be a tragedy beyond belief is if this day was only one of mere verbal rhetoric with no positive active response to follow in the near future, and then I'd say we've lost before we've even begun. I seem to feel that this is highly unlikely because there were only sincere students pleading not only to the faculty and administration for their assistance, but students pleading with their peers that a sense of affirmative and responsive action lies within their very reach and that we have the ability to initiate and perpetuate constructive changes now and in the time to come.

To me Tuesday, February 11, 1975 will be a day of rememberance in that there was brought to my attention a reaffirmation of faith in not only my peers here at Juniata, but the sincerity of the faculty and administration, all of whom were working together as a well oiled machine. Man has shown without a shadow of a doubt the force and strength behind his ability to communicate to his fellow men and be sensitive to everyones quality of life. As J. Samuel Bois stated, "We transmute the blind forces of life into activities that we can plan, direct, and control. We create today our world of tomorrow." Indeed in a rapid and complex society it is the person who copes effectively with change who will be regarded most highly, and set a precedence for those yet to come where those feet have so plainly left an indelible imprint of adaptability and ingenuity to the success of his existence. For Juniata College I feel we've made another truly unique breakthrough in our small college community, and yet another lesson in the experience of life, which only goes to prove you can make the system work.

Financial Aid Applications For Next Year Are Now Available

by The Financial Aid Office

Applications for financial aid for the 1975-76 school year are now available in the Financial Aid Office. Students who were awarded aid this year should already have received renewal forms through the mail; however, other students who wish to apply for assistance can secure applications by stopping by that office in 208 Founders.

A three-patt application procedure must be completed. A College application must be completed and returned to the Financial Aid Office, and that form is normally the student's responsibility. The student's parents are required to submit a Parents Confidential Statement to the College Scholarship Service in Princeton, New Jersey. Additionally, a copy of the parents' 1974 federal tax return is to be forwarded to the College. Deadline for submission of there forms is March 10.

In addition to applications for College aid programs, Pennsylvania residents can secure applications for the Higher Education Grants Program of the Pennsylvania Higher Education Assistance Agency. Again, renewal forms should have already been mailed to the home addresses of this year's grant recipients, but other students can secure 1975-76 applications at the Financial Aid Office. That program provides maximum grants of $1200 per year.

A third aid resource could be available to students who are presently freshmen or sophomores. The federal Basic Educational Opportunity Grants Program provides grants of up to $1400 per year, and 1975-76 applications for that program are also available at the same location.

Any students with questions regarding these programs or other financial aid concerns are encouraged to contact Ronald Shunk, Director of Financial Aid.

Community – A New Reality?

Mrs. Cherry

Tuesday was a very stimulating and rewarding day for the entire college community. It proved that members of the campus community could in fact interact as persons, as well as speakers for their respective roles. I think and hope most of us not only listened but heard and even understood. Since I believe that communication, dissemination of information is one of our biggest problems, I was particularly pleased that students, faculty and administration had the opportunity at the Town Meeting to all hear together the comments being made and occasion to even get an answer. This experience, I trust, also made community" a little bit more of a reality at Juniata. I value a sense of community very highly because without it colleges such as Juniata loose some of what makes their education valuable, even excellent.

Tuesday has to be, I feel, as but one step of many yet to come. The Panel must see to it that issues raised on the floor are referred to those bodies who can act and then must see that they do act. I am firmly committed to seeing that this happens. I would urge us all to check carefully in the Juniatian the second issue of Third Term for a progress report.

Dear _____,

Hope you haven't been too impatient with me. It's been a long time since I last wrote. However this note should prove to you that I'm still alive and well. I've been so very very busy—but that's not news to you. (Enclosed are some S and H Green Stamps. The guys have been collecting them for quite a while. I know you're still Green Stamp maniacs.)

I don't know what info has been filtering down your way, but JC is in a minor state of insurrection. The administrators and faculty call it "degenerating quality of life on campus". We even cancelled classes for a day last week just to discuss it. Some people might call this in itself a success, but action remains to be seen. Anyway, it's gotten to the point where all anyone does around here is bitch. (Please forgive me if it seems like I, too, am griping. No malice intended.) Everyweek the JUNIATIAN is guarenteed to bum you out. All it is, is a gripe sheet with more moaning and groaning than a concentration camp. The only pleasurable reading I do anymore is textbooks and the comic. The natural result of this discontent is committee-monging. Everybody and his brother are on a committee.

I suppose you're interested in what's the beef, huh? Well, Divisions I and II can't get along with Division III. S/U grades and S/U courses are already well under fire. The vocal sector is down on the jocks. The drinking policy. The lousy jobs the Deans are supposedly doing. (Some folks were getting a mite blood-thirsty about the Deans issue.) Too much work. Too much damage (and this really is inexcusable).

I'm bummed out. What started out as a look at causes for existing problems turned into a demands session. I see a lot of immature things happening that really shouldn't. Not that I'm all that mature, I at least keep my nose clean. Corny as it must sound (and you know I'm not a very religous person). I still find reason to count my blessings. More strife is generated from within than is imposed from without. (Did that make sense?) To think that some of my contemporaries, grosser arsschlocks, think that $3,800 grants impunity from law enforcement.

Oh yes, I was discussing my "blessings". For one, I am in good physical health and reasonably good mental health in spite of the occasional blues. Secondly, I have security, even though I haven't quite figured out how I'll support myself when I get out of here. I don't want to continue to leach off my parents. Funny though, I Cannot stand living with them, but now that I'm away from them I am so thankful for the headstart they have given me by sending me here. Maybe my peers have yet to realize this. End of sermon— one must know when to stop proselytizing, mustn't one?

Compared to previous soupy winters, Juniata is now experiencing a real winter. It has snowed about once a week since the new year. It's not melting right away either—a veritable winter wonderland. Even Muddy Run reflects an idealized-winterized brook... (deleted)...

Must close now. My hand lacks the energy my mind has. May you be spared the flu (we weren't so lucky). Tschuss!

Editor, The Juniatian

Dear Sir:

Now I don't want to put anyone down but I don't think that Henry Siedzikowski's article on the recent faculty decision on the credit to be given for Modes of Thought really does justice to any of the "sides" to that question. Contrary to the statements and implications of the article the decision was not based on hysteria, hostility, or divisional block voting. It should be pointed out that "studying an issue" does not necessarily involve a committee. Modes of Thought as well as the rest of the program has been continuously monitored since inception by the faculty and administration individually and in groups. Faculty voted for and against the proposal to change the credit allotted for Modes for a variety of reasons. Some of the points brought up in the faculty meetings included: (1) personal knowledge by faculty of freshman viewpoints over four years, (2) surveys conducted in different years which indicated that the amount of time spent in Modes-related study did not justify 2 units credit, (3) that many departments could and would provide a variety of introductory level courses for Fall term 1975, (4) that the original committee which had recommended postponing consideration of the change had taken an unduly pessimistic view of the time required to effect the change, (5) that the credit given for Modes would not necessarily affect its acknowledged value to the program. Now none of these points was held by everyone but the final vote (approx. 60% pro) reflected the informed opinion of a majority of the faculty that even though the credit reduction might not be the best possible change in an absolute sense, nor perhaps, the only necessary change, it is nevertheless a desirable change. No one, as I recall, expressed any criticism of the content or administration of Modes. I should also like to point out that past and present members of the Modes staff were of different opinions as to the proposed credit reduction and that, if voting had been along "party lines" that it would not have been passed. The decision made at the second faculty meeting alluded to was to reaffirm the previous decision and to ask an existing committee to report with any additional or substitute data or suggestions at a March faculty meeting so that any further action may still be taken in time for scheduling for Fall 1975. I should further like to emphasize that the responsibility for these kinds of actions is not usurped from anyone, it belongs to the faculty and any committees, etc. work for the faculty as a whole (with allowance for the legitimate interests and input from the rest of the college community).

Sincerely,
R. C. Rettke

Dear Editor:

This letter is partially in answer to the accusations made by several students concerning athlete's behavior (football players in particular) on campus, and partially in answer to the accusation that football players are on "full rides" here at Juniata.

Regarding the first accusation, almost everyone on campus parties. But whenever there is damage done on campus it's attributed to the athletes because everyone believes that the athletes on campus are fthe destructive influence at the school. This type of attitude is one of the most unfair generalizations about athletes that could be made. Why not blame the destruction on another group, the science department, or maybe the band or the choir? The people in those groups party just as much as the athletes do. The truth is that certain individuals can be blamed for the destruction on campus, not any one group. So the athletes want to be treated fairly by the rest of the school; don't use us as scapegoats for the destruction on campus.

The second accusation concerning football players here at school are on full rides, is ridiculous (sic). Does anyone really believe that school officials would grant aid to any student those need doesn't qualify him for that aid? I know of no football player whose aid exceedes (sic) his need.

Athletes are no different than anyone else on campus, we take the same courses everyone else does. The only difference is that we give up a considerable amount of time to participate in a sport.

Ed Flynn

To the Juniatian Community:

We would like to dispel a misconception presented at the Town Meeting. There are no athletes at this college on full athletic scholarships from the college. The money given to athletes at Juniata is based soley on need. In regard to the person who think that athletes are getting too much money, being athletes we know how much money we are getting and the consensus is that all aid we recieve is porportionate to the amount of need we have according to the family situation of the individual through the Parents Confidential Statement. To our knowledge the money recieved by the college in a grant is often so much lower that other grants such as PHEAA. PHEAA is an unbiased organization which gives grants not asking whether or not a person is an athlete. Also, whether the persons making the allegations believe it or not, there are persons on the starting team who don't receive a penny of aid or very little.

It seem also that there is a general attitude on campus that the athletes, particularly the football players, are a significant cause of a majority fo the damage and general misconduct on campus. To this we can only ask how persons can make such generalizations about this select group when they probably only have limited experience in their interactions with these people. It seems that they can give a group of characteristics to athletes who are individuals in their own right and may have only the love to participate in a spot in common. From this we have our own theory to present. Maybe because we play sports and are in the public eye more that the non-athlete, this makes us more visable. Therefore, when an athlete gets out of line it is easier for him to be noticed and it comes to the attention of more people in the community. Next, the rumor mill spreads the word to everyone on campus and the athlete is made out to be deviant. This deviant lable is then generalized to all athletes and a bad name is developed. We can't deny that athletes do cause some problems, its just that when he does it it is given a greater amount of attention than misconduct perpetuated by a non-athlete. We'd like not to be recognized as "priviledged jocks" but just as another Juniata student.

We are all here for one reason, to get an education, not to party or play sports but these are a part of college life and shouldn't be discriminating factors in a person's judgement of another person. With all the talk at meetings of being responsible people, just one more note. Responsible persons don't make harsh generalizations based on heresay or limited observation of someone's behavior.

VOL. XLVIII NO. 15

FEBRUARY 20, 1975

(Along Muddy Run)

by Henry Siedzikowski

For a while to come, it will be very difficult to read an issue of the Juniatian without coming across an evaluation of the ideas that were brought out in last Tuesday's Town Meeting and the various hall meetings that preceded it. However, I would like to talk about another meeting I attended the day after our Togetherness Day. That meeting was a special meeting of the Juniata faculty.

The meeting started with Provost Norris transmitting the invitation for the faculty to put on an All Class Night skit. It was suggested, perhaps not in jest, that the faculty could have a winner if they simply acted out twenty minutes of a faculty meeting. A replay of that meeting would have fit in well with this years theme of tradgedy.

The agenda consisted of a reconsideration of the credit change in Modes that had been made a week earlier. Going in to the meeting, I was impressed by the fact that the faculty could admit they made a mistake, and take steps to correct it. I was soon to be disappointed.

Changing Modes to one unit might not be a mistake. In fact, it may turn out to be very beneficial. However, the method in which the change was made was a disgrace to an institution that purports to be educational. All the proper procedures were totally disregarded. The issue was given no study. The change was made in an atmosphere that was repeatedly described by faculty members as one of "urgency." The attitude of ends justifying the means and change for change's sake seem to have taken over our faculty.

The original motion on the floor at this special meeting was to void the original vote, and give at least token study to the issue. A final solution would then be voted on at the March meeting.

While this method of handling the situation seemed somewhat less than satisfying, it was a least, an attempt at rational action. This attempt was quickly and effectively destroyed. A substitute motion was passed that allowed the change to stand unless later action was taken on it. Study was initiated, but it has little hope of providing more than after-the-fact justification for the faculty's action.

The absurdity of this was easily seen by the fact that there were three distinct views of what had been done. One group believed that Modes did not require two units of work, and so they were simply reducing the credit without changing the course. Another group seemed will forfiet their right to complain that students try to make fools of them. They'll be handling that job themselves.

What's It Going To Be Then, Eh?

by Brad Rudy
with just a little plagiarism from Anthony Burgess
A Clockwork Orange

There was me, that is, Joe College, and my three droogs, that is, Pete, Georgie, and Dim, Dim being really dim, and we sat in the Tote burgerbar making up our rassoc docks what to do with the evening, a flip dark chill winter mother, though dry. The Tote sold burgers-plus-burgers plus criscomesc, greascet, or larderom, which is what we were munchywunching lomsticks of which would give you a nice quiet horrorshow fifteen minutes admiring Bog And All His Holy Angles And Saints in your left shoe with lights bursting all over your mozg. This would sharpen you up and make you ready for a bit of the old ultra-rowdiness.

"What's it going to be then, eh?"

Our pockets were full of deng, that is, nickle lomsticks or so, so there was no need to tolchok another bass or crack the unsuspecting gulliver of a babooschka for the horrorshow fun of seeing the old real red vino like gush on tap.

I viddied what I had to do. I sloshied about the sinny at the derelict Oller, taking only a fraction of our deng, that would warp our lubbing yarbles more than the old in-out in-out. And it was O my brothers! A malchick, Alex by name, was into the old ultraviolence, until his droogs, bratchnies though they were, crasted him on the gulliver and he was put away in Staja No. 84 F, among smelly perverts and hardened prestoopnicks, the shock sending his dadda beating his bruised and krovvy rookers against unfair Bog in his Heaven, and his mum boohoohooing in her mother's grief, at her only child and son of her bosom like letting everybody down real horrorshow.

Then came the real weepy and like tragic part of the story, O my brother and only friends. They fixed his gulliver so he would get sick at the thought of the old ultraviolence, or the old in-out in-out, or even old lovely lovely Ludwig Van, which was the real weepy part. He then tried to snuff it by jumping out a window, but it didn't work. Ah, but the malchicks who did this to him got in trouble with a malchicks who didn't (politics, you know) so they refixed his gulliver.

He was cured all right.

Lucky Man!

This is the story. See what you make out of it:

Michael Travis is an apprentice coffee salesman. He spends his time fending off (or not fending off) his female superior and/or his landlady (curiously played by the same actress) and attending wild parties and sex shows with his clients. Then, one day, he runs into trouble. He falls into the clutches of an army base gone bananas. He escapes, only to fall into the evil clutches of an experimental laboratory gone bananas. (But then again, why not try to change men into pigs?) He finally finds his goal. Through a series of freak accidents (for example, having a maniacal suicide pull his predecessor out a 400th story window), he becomes a toady to a rich and powerful tycoon (gone bananas? very possibly.) But once again, the clutches are evil and slippery. He gets set up and sent up. In prison, he assimilates the philosophy of universal brotherhood. He is released, spreads his new-found faith, and gets beat up by a hobo colony. He wanders into a studio where he auditions for a movie (strangely similar to "If. . ." in which Malcolm McDowell made his movie debut, oddly enough playing a character named Michael Travis). The director (Lindsay Anderson, who curiously enough directs the movie we're talking about) asks him to smile. Why? Smile. I can't smile. Smile. I need something to smile about. Smile. What is there to smile about? WHACKO!!! The first creeping vestiges of a smile begin inching across his face. What a lucky man!

Travis is, of course, an "Everyman." His "adventures" are exagerrations of problems we all face or want to face. He is ambitious beyond all reasoning and naive beyond all understanding. He actually believes he can walk into skyscraper and insinuate his way into the direct employ of the millionaire director. (The fact that he succeeds is an irrelevant product of chance). Anderson manages to attack everybody—capitalists, communists, the military, the scientists, even the artist.

Everything is phony—from the coffeeseller's "Buy, buy" smile, to the actor's smile for no reason. The very structure of the movie is artificial—Anderson employs a Greek chorus which interrupts the action to comment on the plot with song. Alan Price and his band actually appear in the plot at one short point, but their real function is to editorialize: "We all want justice, but you've got to have the money to buy it." "Sell, sell, sell, sell everything you stand for." "Don't forget, boy, look over your shoulder 'cause there's always someone coming after you." "Smile while you're makin' it, laugh while you're takin' it, even though you're fakin' it, nobody's gonna know," Ard, of course, "Teachers and preachers will just buy and sell you. When no one can tempt you with heaven or hell, you'll be a lucky man!" The lucky man is the one like Travis—the one who will adapt to the conditions, whether poverty or richness, capitalism or communism. After all, "Everybody's going through changes, No one knows what's going on."

Conserving Energy: Faculty & Staff Could Take The Initiative

The Energy Conservation Committee asks your help in eliminating the wasteful use of energy on campus. During the last year the College has instituted a number of major projects to conserve energy and reduce energy waste. A new circulating device is being installed in the boiler room to reuse previously wasted heat from the smole stack. An engineering firm has been consulted in a successful attempt to cut heat loss in the buildings on campus. These and other programs have reduced our use of energy significantly, and we will be reporting on these efforts during the next few months. We should also have some figures for you regarding energy savings. In the mean time we request your help to implement a vigorous program of conservation that is environmentally and economically sensible.

Last week we published 12 energy conservation tips that applied primarily to the dorms. The problem is community wide and this week's tips are designed primarily for offices and classrooms. Lists should begin appearing around campus. If you want one or if you have any suggestions or energy related complaints, see one of the liasons to the committee.

Hints for Office and Classrooms:

1) Use natural light whenever possible, even in conjunction with artificial light.
2) Turn off lights in office and classroom whenever you leave the room. (flourescents included!)
3) Use alternate lights in halls and stairs, if safety can be maintained.
4) Report what you consider to be excess lighting to liason people for possible removal.
5) Rearrange office furniture to maximize natural and minimize artificial light use.
6) When possible utilize facilities during daytime.
7) Maintain temperatures of offices and classrooms at pre-set levels. Do not turn off fans on heating units or adjust thermostats.
8) Report heating problems to liason people or maintenance.
9) Keep classroom and fire doors closed.
10) Keep heaters clear of obstructions.
11) Pull down blinds at night for added insulation.
12) When practical, turn off electrical equipment not in use. (drying ovens, fire hoods, typewriters, mimeo, etc.)
13) Wear sweaters and heavier clothing so temperatures can be kept down.

"On The Spot"

by Chip Lovett

And How do you think black in the Ghetto. . .?

This question and others of this type have been asked by professors to some black students here at Juniata (including myself). The reason I think these questions are asked is to get a "Black" opinion. I do hope these professors realize the fact that this "Black" opinion they set a conquest for, may never exist. You see, although our skin color may be darker, does not mean we all live in a ghetto. I also feel just because we have darker skin does not mean we look at issues so "differently" than our white classmates.

Yes, there are middle-class and upper-middle class Blacks. Just as there are different strokes for different folks. I just hope that the classroom knows that if a Black student is asked for an opinion, the professor thinks might be different from a white classmate, I do hope the classmates realize that it is a "personal" opinion. No one can speak for the Black "RACE," only individuals give their opinions of how they feel, think, and see.
see.

Generalizations can affect people in bad ways. One white person or black person can be prejudiced, but this does not mean that all are prejudiced. Realize these generalizations for what they are. They are just as valid as statistics.

Wrestlers Finish On Low Note

by John Paulshock
Wrestling Wrap-Up

The grapplers have officially terminated their 1974-75 dual-meet competition in the Middle Atlantic Conference; and what a woeful, distressing, and head-lowering season it proved to be. The Indians were strong enough to manage only one victory throughout the schedule, and that was against Widener during the early part of the year. Paired with 14 losses, the record shows the need for experience, more talent, and some depth in every weight-class. The most costly factor of this entire season has been the immense need for a 118 pounder; this forfeit causing the Juniata matmen to be defeated by many unforgettable and hair-pulling six point margins or sometimes even less.

Juniata dropped their final four matches of the winter, and bowed out of this year's competition without the desired pomp and ceremony that champions receive. Plagued by injuries, the Indians took an afternoon's drive to Scranton, only to be sent home as the losing team. Last Saturday, they hosted a quadrangular meet, but were handed no respect as the three visiting schools, Elizabethtown, Lycoming, and Lebanon Valley, all turned to the J.C. muscle-men down.

A short review of the season places very few wrestlers in the spotlight. The young varsity squad of Denison, Ashworth, Brown, Moellers, Nickle, Harper, Shultis, Hanselman, and Simmons saw most of the action, and were the primary figures in Juniata's partial success this year. Denison was a mighty strong new M.A.C. contender at 126 lbs., and exhibited much promise for the individual M.A.C. bouts to be wrestled soon. Ashworth is another freshman who earned his keep in the varsity bracket with dynamic exhibitions, and shows great potential for next year. Senior Mark Brown suffered a disappointing season this year, being the oldest man on the team, and by not being able to stay in 100% shape for the M.A.C.'s. Gary Moellers wrestled as a sophomore and saw most of the action at 150 lbs. Freshman Ron Nickle will be returning his services to the team next season, and holds a year's experience to make him a ferocious contender. Steve Harper was credited with being this year's team captain, and still has two seasons left to make pancakes of his opponents. Mike Hanselman is only a sophomore and should be returning next year as one of the most experienced and durable guys in the league. At heavy-weight, Cick Simmons has had his share of ailments this past season, but should return healthy in the fall and continue to be a prime contender.

The true accomplishments of this past season will be exhibited in the M.A.C. competition when pure individual effort is of most importance, and the real champs become known.

Action Bounces Up'n Down For Women

by Jacque Prentiss
Kim Norris

On Tuesday, February 11th, the J.C. Women traveled to Penn-State Altoona Campus to add another impressive win to their 1974-75 season. The Indians dominated the entire game and dealt Altoona a 42-27 loss. Sophomore Mardi Frye had another fine game contributing 21 pts. to the J.C. effort. Freshman Beth Woodworth added 8 pts. in addition to a strong defensive showing.

On Thursday, February 13th, the J.C. Women suffered their worst loss ever. Coming up against the IUP women, the Indians found themselves outclassed and were additionally hindered by their own passing and poor shooting. Down by 25 pts. going into the second half, the Indians failed in their attempts to offset the high percentage shooting and height of Indiana. The final score was 74-24, with Mardi Frye once again leading the squad scoring with 8 pts.

Saturday, the 15th, the J.C. Women redeemed themselves with a close 54-52 victory over Gettysburg College. The game ended with a single overtime in which Indians outhustled Gettysburg during this most crucial time in the game. Forward Cathy Dickey was high scorer, pumping in 16 pts. for the Indians, followed by freshman Jan Edger, tallying in 12 pts. with an outstanding performance. Sue Rosshirt and Mardi Frye followed close by with each scoring 11 pts.

At this point in the season the Indians hold a 6-3 record, pending yesterdays game against Bucknell and their final game Saturday against Dickinson. The women are also looking forward to participating in the MAC tournament to be held at F & M College, March 7, 8, and 9.

Wanted: Wild And Delirious Offense: Searing Opponents!

by Willy Dredge

It had been a bad afternoon for television. The gang at "Wild and Delirious" headquarters were forced to tune in the semi-final round of Championship Bowling. To their delight one of the contestants had just completed nine perfect frames.

"I bet he chokes. He looks like a choker."

On the screen, the bowler takes careful aim. He paces off four steps an d gracefully sends sixteen pound projectile skidding toward the pins. The ball rams between the one and three pins, a perfect hit. All ten targets splatter into the bowels of the automatic spotter.

"That didn't look like a choke to me."

"Just you wait. He's got to roll two more strikes and already I can see the sweat."

As the bowler readies the second ball in the tenth, the gang moves a little closer to the edge of their seats. Once again the ball solidly crams into the pocket. Pins fly like teeth slapped with a baseball bat, but strangely, the ten pin remains untouched, a lonely testament to imperfection.

"What a clown! He did choke!"

"I told you he didn't have it in him. Let's go over to the girls basketball game."

The TV is snapped off just as it shows the bowler's wife crying into a tissue. There is no sympathy for those who can t take the pressure.

As the W.D. gang enters the gym, they notice that the hometown girls are down by 10 points. However, there is no despair for the smell of weakness fills the air. Within seconds the guys had transformed themselves into an extremely rowdy, belligerently rude cheering section.

While the W.D. pounded its feet on the benches, the lead shrunk to eight, then six, then four. It was an obvious choke. The pounding grew louder and more intense. Suddenly, the entire crowd was screaming for the ear of the bull. When the final buzzer sounded, the Juniata girls were ahead by two points.

This wasn't the first time that the "Wild and Delirious" section had brought a crowd to life. The mens basketball squad had them on their side a number of times. In fact Mailand McIlroy, Daily News sports editor, credits them with "giving Memorial Gym It's old snakepit atmosphere." And what a "snakepit" it is. The W.D.'s venomous bite almost makes them a part of the game. Their ability to spot "Choke tendencies" is uncanny. And once spotted, they can bring the pressure of the entire crowd crashing down hard.

For exampie, at a recent contest with Albright, the Indian dribblers were being bothered by a fair complexioned, rather frail looking young guard. Just as the Indian defense seemed to have stalled the motion of Albrights attack, the guard would toss a long jumper through the hoop. About ten minutes into the second half of that game a voice erupted from the W.D. section.

"Hey number ten! You're cute!."

Instantaneously, the cat baiting spread through the section.

"My roommate loves you number ten."

"Give number ten a comb. His hair is messed."

Noticably rattled, the blond guard shot and missed. As he jogged down the floor on defense, he flashed a middle digit in the direction of the crowd. However, the crowd wasn't the only entity that spotted the action. The referee spotted it also and responded with the shrill whistle that signifies a technical foul. The bad guy had been identified and the gym roared in approval at his punishment.

In another incident, the W.D.'s poisonous attack was able to strike directly at the opponent's coach. As he jumped from the bench, a cry of "Shut up and sit down!" burst from the W.D.

"Eat my A___!", responded the angry coach.

It was another bad guy move. The hometown fans suddenly had more to cheer for than just a victory. The game was now a matter of good and evil. The righteous energy soon filtered to the playing floor where the J.C. squad wired into it and collected a victory.

This Saturday night Juniata's spectator phenomenon will once again raise it's ugly head in Memorial Gym. The game marks the last home appearance of this years Indians. Why not be there.

to feel that the course should be restructured to be a one unit course, implying that it was worth two units now. A third group just wanted an elective in that first term, and this seemed the easiest path towards accomplishing that.

The conflict between the first two of these views is obvious, and does raise an important question. If the course is reduced to one unit, what changes, if any, are to be made in the course content? It is my impression that few, if any, of the faculty would be able to answer that question now, even though the change is officially made. It was interesting that the one piece of data that was brought up really highlighted the lack of study. One prof argued that the course, as it stands, should be reduced to one unit because the statistics he had showed that students spent an average of twenty-five hours a week on the course, This is a curious argument when one considers that, officially, a unit is supposed to require fifteen hours a week. By those facts, the two unit credit is about right.

At this point, it seems almost a certainty that the original decision will stand. Hopefully, the token study that is being done will, at least, answer a few of the important questions that will have to be dealt with. If we are lucky, the curriculum will not be too badly damaged. Perhaps even, the whole thing will work out wonderfully, and the faculty's reputation will escape undamaged. But, if they persist in their current attitudes, they

by Joanne Dolnikowski and The League of Women Voters

The League of Women Voters of Huntingdon has compiled the following information on voter registration for the benefit of the eighteen year old students at Juniata College.

1. You become of age on the day before your eighteenth birthday.
2. You must be a citizen of the United States for one month.
3. You must reside in the State thirty days immediately preceding the election.
4. You must be a resident of your election district for one month prior to the election.
5. College students are permitted under State Law to register to vote in the locality at which they are attending a college or university.
6. The per capita tax must be paid by everyone who is eighteen years old except when exonerated.
7. If the per capita tax has been paid where you lived before coming to college, you need only give proof of this and your name will be taken off the local list.
8. The Huntingdon Borough tax collector is Mr. Paul Veitch, 1308 Mifflin Street, Huntingdon, Penna.
9. You can register to vote at the Courthouse, Huntingdon, Penna. Only during primary registration time can you change your party registration.
10. April 21 is the last day to register before the 1975 primary election.

The League of Women Voters urges all students, eighteen years and over, to exercise their right to vote by registering now for the May 20 primary election.

The League invites students participation in our program. If interested, contact Beverly Pfrogner, 643-5044 or Joanne Dolnikowski, 643-4371

A Little From Moore

by Gary Wayne Moore

Elizabethtown College received a pasionsus bite on Wednesday of last week, as they entered the omnious "snakepit" of Juniata College. Led by section WD (Wild and Delerious) and the beautiful Juniata Cheerleaders, the Juniata basketball team handed Elizabethtown a 67-62 defeat before a cheering crowd of 1400. The roaring and chanting of WD, the Cheerleaders, and a Tremendous crowd, sparked the Tribers into winning a big M.A.C. game. This victory almost assures Juniata of a spot in the M.A.C. playoffs in Reading, Pennsylvania. The Tribers need but to defeat last place (in the M.A.C.) Delaware Valley win their spot in the playoffs. But let's not get too overconfident, strange things can happen on a basketball court.

Donnie "Gumby" Williams was high scorer with 24 points and snatched 11 rebounds off the backboard glass. Tim (Big T) Tabor and Mark "Daddy" Jules both popped in eleven points apiece. Big T led in rebounding with 13 while "Daddy" Jules led in the assists category with 10. Tim (Tiny T) Brady tossed in 9 points and William (Billy B) Bickle safely floated the "pill" in for 8. Larry (The Genices) Moore whirled in 4 points and although scoreless on the charts, Gregg (Ruff) Ruffo lended some excellent defensive playing to the team.

The Tribers couldn't seem to get it together for their battle against Philadelphia Textile last Saturday. Before a crowd of 1600, Juniata went down to defeat 85-53. With 24 turnovers, the Tribers were not able to keep their hands on the ball long enough to score. This loss gives Juniata a 5-4 record in the M.A.C.'s, all that is needed — as mentioned previously — is for them to beat Delaware Valley at home, in the "snakepit", this Saturday. All is not lost!

Politics And Personalities

by Suzi Baker

Well, it's election time again. The time when all good students come to the aid of their college in selecting new leaders to carry on. From the paraphernalia and momentum of this campaign you would think some vital national issue was at stake. I'm afraid, however, that few will bother to look behind the signs and buttons and empty promises to the candidate that lies beneath.

In reality, we are not deciding on national leaders but on campus leaders. We should eliminate all the superfluous trimmings of the campaign and get down to basics. The most significant issue is one of personalities. When "dealing" in campus politics, regardless of what is right, we are dealing with personalities. In order to have a smooth-functioning student government there must be a working relationship between student leaders and the administration. The success or failure of this relationship is the product of personalities. How well can the two factions work together, each protecting their own interests yet coordinating their efforts for the common good. Keep in mind that it is in the spirit of cooperation that most political battles are resolved. Therefore, I would urge voters to examine well the personalities of

by Wendy Jacobus

Supposedly we are to view small colleges, especially J.C., as basically friendly environments where faculty assistance for students is readily available. Although this atmosphere does exist to an extent at J.C., there seems to be one serious conflict with this philosophy. Perhaps all the J.C. faculty are very willing to help the students, but this is of little consolation when one can't find them. Even though I've been on this campus less than a year, I've already spent many hours waiting for professors during their office hours, not because they were speaking with other students but because they simply weren't there. I realize faculty members have numerous commitments in and out of the classroom but their primary concern should be the student. It's very disheartening for the student, who was perhaps a little intimidated by her professor, but who finally talks herself into going to see him during those "golden office hours" and is greeted by an empty office. It is equally discouraging for the student who waits outside an open office for half an hour thinking the professor has just "stepped out for a minute" and another professor walks by and says, "If you are waiting for that professor, he's at a meeting." Granted more students should make appointments but the whole idea of office hours is that the professor will be available for consultation with the students. If a professor must schedule a meeting during his office hours it seems only fair that she or he place a note on her door stating she or he won't be in so students don't waste time waiting for someone who isn't going to appear.

Results from the START day pointed to the fact that we as a college community must strive toward respect for and responsibility to our fellow students and faculty through communicating with them. It seems many of the faculty in theory are willing to communicate with the students but few strive toward this goal in practice. Although this isn't a momentous problem, it bothers me because we cannot communicate unless we are first able to meet on a one-to-one basis. If professors are not available during their office hours, it seems to the student they are hypocritical and don't really care anyway, which quite possibly is not true. Students become frustrated and turned off, perhaps too quickly, but generally due to this type of treatment. It would restore my confidence in the faculty, that they were truly concerned with every student's well-being, if they were considerate of our time.

It would be good if I would at this point clarify that I am not referring to all the faculty members, although that could be implied from the tone of the article. Some professors are very concientious. They are almost

by Brian Smith

In some of the past issues you probably read one of the articles written by some students who have taken advantage of one of the off-campus study opportunities offered by Juniata. I am referring specifically to the Washington Semester and the London Semester offered through The American University and Drew University. After reading the article I became interested in finding out a little more about these programs.

The Washington semester is to help a person do research on our government first hand. While living at American University the student attends seminars, lectures, and discussions on the topic that he or she is going to do their research paper on. This paper is a requirement and must be in minimum of fifty pages. The advantage to doing research is the material is available first hand. Many departments and agencys open their files to researchers or let them sit in on meetings with key officials. One has the opportunity of writing their paper on the area of urban issues such as law enforcement, or transportation, etc. through the Washington Urban Semester. It's much the same as the regular governmental semester.

There are a number of mutual problems which have surfaced. As members of campus community, we are concerned about the possible consequences if these problems are not resolved. We can not begin to offer solutions to all of them but feel that we have taken the initial steps in confronting them.

Dormitory Government has been ineffective. We feel that there is a need for a new organization that will improve dormitory life, both socially and academically. In response, we propose a Residence Hall Association to replace Dormitory Government. Our proposal would stress individual dorm autonomy but yet encourage interaction between each residence hall. This multifaceted organization has many possibilities for improving the quality of life on campus.

Student Service is another area we would concentrate our efforts. There are many valuable services available to the students, such as Course evaluations, the Handbook, and the Fourth Division, that should be formed into a central organization. "The Clearinghouse" would be beneficial, in that it would insure the perpetuation of these services on campus and create new ones under this central organization. Opportunities on campus are plentiful and diverse, unfortunately these programs are scattered and poorly publisized. "The Clearinghouse" would also act as a central information bank that would increase campus-wide exposure thus making opportunities for participation much easier.

An informal type of dinner (carry your own tray) on a regular basis between students and faculty in a particular field of concentration would be instituted. These Department Tables would create greater student input in courses, an exchange of information about your area of interest, and promote better inter-relation between all parties concerned.

We cannot ignore the fact that Juniata will be celebrating it centennial next year. It is important that there be a lasting commemoration from students attending the college during this 100th year. We plan to appoint a commission to investigate a project by students to mark this important milestone in our college's history.

Shelly Kaltenbaugh, Greg Ransom, and Mike Martin, Students Generating Meaning, are eager to serve Juniata. We feel that we can bring to Student Government enough diverse experience to make it work for you.

Minicourses Are A Realization At Juniata This Term

by Alice Boomhower

A few weeks ago, I wrote an article concerning an ides I had for minicourses to be offered this term. Since that time Student Government has given financial support in this endeavor and it is hoped that classes will begin the third week of the term.

Several courses are already slated, and through the general mailing that was sent out this week, it is hoped that a few more will be included. The "Basic River Cruising" course will be taught by Natalie Wiest. She will include the basic principles of kayaking and canoing. Field trips to the Raystown area and the Little Juniata are included in the plans with more advanced classes to be taught on some of the smaller streams in the area. This course is open to a limited number of students, so if you are interested it is wise to get your name in early.

Andy Murray will be teaching the course in Folk Guitar. This course is only for beginners; another more advanced course will be offered next fall. The classes will deal with basic strums, chords, and the coordination of voice and hands in playing. Again, the course has a limited enrollment.

Dr. Norris, the Provost, who has already organized a recorder ensemble, will be instructing a course in Basic Recorder. These classes are designed for individuals with little or no previous experience with the instrument.

Greg Giebel will be teaching a course in Dart Tournamenting. These classes are designed for teams and individuals. The classes will be held at the Golden Nugget. Prerequsite is a pitcher of beer.

Centennial Leaders STEVE — RALPH — ROB

Stephen Cordova

A year ago I ran independently for the Vice-Presidency of Student Government, because I felt that the tickets at that time didn't offer the strongest of candidates for the position. This year there is a ticket that possesses the strength and talent needed to bring Student Gov't. into every dorm, house, and tower—The Centennial Leaders.

As President I offer the implementation of the following issues? 1) a committee set up to aid Career Planning and work closely with Financial Aid of extensive job placement for seniors and underclassmen. In addition to bringing recruiters on campus this same committee would keep in contact with governmental agencies for detection of what fields of employment are opening or closing. 2) Tutorial System set up through each academic department. 3) Restructuring the method of choosing committee members (applications, restructuring review board and longer interviews). 4) Dormitory Government being given more work, responsibility and recognition. Dorm. Gov't. being called the "House" with its goals and meetings and scheduled joint meetings with the Senate. 5) Working closely with Center Board to sponsor a bus to State College in the middle of the week to shop, use the library, etc. 6) If the funds are available in the spring, Student Gov't., Center Board and the I.M. department could conjunctively have a banquet for I.M. champs and club sports.

These are a few of the issues the Centennial Leaders are offering for the qualitative improvement of the academic and social life of Juniata College.

I see many vacancies for next year's Senate and have talked to numerous students who will be seeking Senate seats for the first time. With this young Senate in sight, I feel my two years in the Senate and one year of close observing that I would be instrumental in the guidance of Student Gov't. You don't earn the Presidency you qualify for it. A strong, active and responsive leader with the above qualifications is needed for the presidency throughout the Centennial Year.

L Ralph Whetstone

A not to distant time in the past I was faced with what to me was a serious question. The question was whether I should run with the Centennial Leaders ticket as their Vice-President.

Upon giving the question much consideration, I examined my

To Parents of Juniata Students

Dear Friends?

I am writing on a matter of very great importance to you, to your Juniata son or daughter, and to me. Last spring, when we announced the inclusive fee for 1974-75, I informed you that we would endeavor this year to announce the 1975-76 inclusive fee not later than early March. That time has now passed and you deserve an explanation.

A few days ago the Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees considered a proposed budget for 1975-76. This budget, in view of the presently escalating costs in every area of college operation, inevitably required an increase in Juniata's inclusive fee for 1975-76 over the present amount of $3,800. The proposed increase would maintain Juniata's favorable position as compared with fees charged in similar Pennsylvania institutions. The size of increase which was contemplated would place Juniata below the average amount in fees for 19 other comparable colleges.

As the matter was further discussed, the Executive Committee determined to make a still more stringent reduction in expenditures than was provided in the budget under consideration. As a result, we are now engaged in making additional reductions in expenditures so as to place Juniata's inclusive fee still further below the average of comparable institutions.

Beyond reductions of expenditures, we shall also seek out additional sources of revenue from gifts and grants. During the present year tuition charges cover less than 75% of the cost of the educational program. This is made possible in part by use of endowment income, direct gifts for support of the educational program, and other similar sources. We expect that next year these non-fee sources, made possible through the generosity of Juniata's constituents, will cover an even larger percent of educational costs than was true this year.

The Executive Committee expressed a strong desire to set the fee increase at the lowest possible amount. We shall, during the next two to three weeks, endeavor earnestly to work toward a yet smaller increase and, thereby, to keep the inclusive fee even father below the average than had been contemplated previously. We want to do this in keeping with the serious economic problems which each of our families is experiencing during these difficult days.

We hope to be able to report on the success of this effort in the first week of April and trust that this delay of three or four weeks from the previously announced time will prove to be beneficial to you and to your son or daughter.

As I am writing to you, it seems to me that I should also say something about the necessity of my withdrawing from the presidency of Juniata College for reasons of health. On the basis of an extensive examination, my cardiologist has advised me that the physical demands of the college presidency are not compatible with a heart condition with which I have lived for many years and which is now showing some unfavorable signs. You learned about this through a special letter which was distributed to parents, alumni, and other constituents.

Beyond the facts which that letter conveyed, I should like to tell you of my own deep confidence in Juniata's future. Mrs. Stauffer and I were classmates at Juniata from 1932 to 1936, and ever since that time we have followed the College's development with great interest. We have counted it a great privilege to be a part of the College's life, especially since 1968 when I came here as President. We believe deeply in Juniata and in the kind and quality of education that it provides and are confident of Juniata's future strength and of the benefits that our alma mater will continue to bring to young people of this and succeeding generations.

As you doubtless know, 1975-76 will be Juniata's 100th year of distinguished service to young people. The Centennial Year will be a time of celebration and, more than that, of rededication to the ideals that have been uniquely valuable to those who have enjoyed the benefits of a Juniata education.

The private college in America is a most precious asset and clearly Juniata is one that will continue to demonstrate the worth of this kind of institution with its commitment to the arts and sciences, to value-centered learning and to the individual needs and aspirations of young people. Even though circumstances of health cause me to make way for young leadership, I shall follow Juniata's future with confidence and high expectation. I know that Juniata will enable young men and young women to prepare for success in their chosen vocations and professions and for useful and happy living.

You may be assured that in our efforts mentioned earlier in this letter, I shall be working diligently with trustees, faculty, staff and students in finding the best possible solution which I hope will be helpful to you in your planning for 1975-76 and the college years that follow.

Cordially yours,
John N. Stauffer

VOL XLVIII NO 16

MARCH 20, 1975

(Along Muddy Run)

by Henry Siedzikowski

The season is autumn. It is a typical Saturday afternoon. The majority of Juniata students, and a good number of parents and alumni, are down at College Field cheering on our football team. Enthusiastically, we support our heroes. We cheer at every crackling block or bone-crunching tackle.

Then Monday comes. Every member of the Juniata community must once again face the hard reality of the senseless destruction that has been occuring on campus. We need a scapegoat to blame it all on. We think back and remember the staged violence we saw Saturday afternoon. We have an answer. The football players must be naturally violent to participate in such a game; they must be responsible for the destruction.

This is an easy answer, but any person capable of thinking on the college level should see that it is too easy. Unfortunately, the Town Meeting (of S.T.A.R.T. fame) showed that far too many Juniata students had fallen for this explanation. The abundance of that type of comment at the Town Meeting demonstrated to me that there are still far too many people at Juniata who are looking for an easy place to put the blame. This sense of self-righteousness tends to hide their own inability to take on responsibility, and until this is overcome, S.T.A.R.T. is doomed to stall.

Several letters appeared in the Juniatian after the Town Meeting regarding this matter. Unfortunately, too many of those making the criticisms discarded these letters because they were written by football players. It says something about our student body when members of the attacked group attempt to deal with the criticisms in a responsible manner, and they are ignored.

I want to point out, that I am not now, nor have I ever been a member of the Juniata College football team. However, in my four years at Juniata, I have known a large number of team members. I have not known any of them to intentionally destroy anything.

Another inference has been made that football players get special treatment. Again, I have not known of any specific instances. In addition to this, I have had four years of experience in student government. In this time, I have discovered a number of facts about the college. I know that financial aid is awarded strictly on the basis of need. I know that no one is admitted solely because they are good at football.

It would be ridiculous to suggest that no one on the football team ever causes any trouble on campus. Like any large group, they are bound to have a few that deviate from the norms. However, we must remember that the violence we see on those autumn Saturdays is only staged. The norms of the football players are not significantly different than many of us here at Juniata. For anyone who is interested, Coach Nadzak has a history of keeping troublemakers off the team. So, when we, as a community, come to the realization that we can not blame any one group for our problems, then we can start to solve them.

This article is being written to hopefully clear up and kill many of the exaggerated rumors concerning admissions procedures and financial aid in regards to student-athletes. One point that should be stressed is that a student-athlete is a student who wishes to participate in athletics, not an athlete who has the option of going to class.

Mr. Kimmey, who is director of admissions at J.C., had this to say about admissions and academic standards; "it is the responsibility of the admissions office to admit those students who have the academic potential to succeed at Juniata College. The most important credential that a student can submit to Juniata is his high school transcript, since this is a comparative record of daily achievement in academic preparation. College boards, personal recommendation and secondary school recommendations are used in support of a student's application. All this information is considered collectively in order to render a decision. All applicants for admissions are considered on the above basis."

I hope Mr. Kimmey's statements have cleared up rumors concerning the lowering of academic standards to admit athletes. Another interesting point that Mr. Kimmey noted was, travel expenses for the athletic staff to recruit in the 73-74 year was 16% of the admissions total travel budget." 16% is hardly the majority of the budget, and to say that the athletic programs are favored is nothing more than an exaggerated generalization. (B.S.)

Ronald Shunk, Associate Dean of Students, had this to say about the distribution of financial aid to students; "athletes, as far as aid is concerned, are treated the same as any other student - aid is based on need. Aid is awarded on the basis that the individual is a student, even if he no longer participates in athletics, he maintains the aid, providing the need remains the same." Dean Shunk also presented me with a copy of the Financial Aid Policies. The copy contained two interesting paragraphs concerning aid to athletes.

"Within the total financial aid budget, there is aportion set aside for assignment to athletes. This portion is between 10 and 15% of the total financial aid budget. All of these funds are administered according to a student's financial need by the Financial Aid Office. The fraction of Juniata students for whom these funds are reserved also amounts to between 10 and 15%.

When a student hs applied for admission to Juniata he begins receiving information concerning financial aid and loans. Like any other prospective student, the athlete must qualify for assistance. His parents must complete a confidential statement which is then sent to the College Scholarship Service in Princeton, New Jersey. CSS com-

American Film Theater, Oscars and JC Movies

by Brad Rudy

As usually happens after a vacation, I have a few things to talk about, so my mind might tend to ramble somewhat. So, please have patience. . . .

First thing is the American Film Theater, or AFT for short. Okay, now, what exactly is the AFT Funny you should ask! It is a yearly series of filmed plays, shown only one day, then forgotten. The philosophy behind it is to bring the theater to those people who aren't within shopping distance of New York City. Currently in its second year, the AFT has finally reached the mid-Pennsylvania hamlet of Huntingdon. Yes, folks, the beat-up and run-down Clifton Theater is carrying this year's series, and with a special discount price for college students (that's us).

Kick yourself if you've missed the first two—"The Man in the Glass Booth" and "Galileo." The first starred Maximillian Schell as a guilt-ridden concentration camp survivor who masquerades as the commandant of that camp. He is summarily kidnapped by Israeli Nationalists and subjected to an Adolph Eichmann style trial complete with bulletproof glass booth for his protection. The ending, where he is discovered and commits suicide in the booth is one of the most affecting scenes I've seen on stage or screen. "Galileo" was not quite so successful, though, owing mostly to the miscasting of Topol as the title role. He was too much of a hammy comic to make his character seem believeable. There was one scene which worked remarkably well, though. (Maybe because he wasn't in it). Galileo is being forced to recant his defense of the Copernican theory, and his pupils are arguing over why or why not he should. Above all this, his daughter is rapidly mumbling her Latin rosary, and the whole scene was played against a blank white background with everybody's shadows projected very starkly against it.

You should really make every effort to see the remaining three, here or elsewhere. The next one is "Jacques Brel is Alive and Well and Living in Paris," based on the musical revue of the works of the Belgian songwriter Brel. Next is "In Celebration," written by David Story and directed by Lindsay Anderson (who, if you'll recall, did "O Lucky Man!"). The final offering is Jean Genet's "The Maids," a little bit of absurdist drama starring Susannah York and Glenda Jackson. Despite many shortcomings (most critics agree, or at least say, that the AFT fails to satisfy either medium), these are all intriguing experiences, and are definitely worth your time.

Moving on, now, I am reminded that the Academy Awards ceremony is approaching, and it is the bounded duty of every snobbish critic to criticize the choices and, paradoxically, predict the winners. Keeping true to form, I will bore you with the same trivia. Of the five movies nominated for best picture this year, I would enjoy dismissing "The Towering Inferno" as a rotten movie. Granted, it is the most popular of the five, and last year the most popular beat out two better movies. But, at least "The Sting" was well done, extremely entertaining, and hard to find fault with. (I just thought "American Graffiti" and "Cries and Whispers" were more effective, and consequently better films.) But "The Towering Inferno" is absolutely terrible. Most of the characters are there for the sole purpose of seeing another famous face burn up; the characters who are important are cliches of the disaster genre; the movie is too long tives and found myself genuinely concerned and interested in the functions and role of our student government here in Juniata. I concluded from the opinions of my friends, and my own sincerity in regard to the role of Student Government that I would run with the Centennial Leaders because both Rob and Steve also expressed to me this desire to do a good job if elected.

Due to the brevity of this article, I feel it is important to note that I have been actively involved in many campus clubs and organizations but will not at this time elaborate on them. I feel that in lieu of my experience I can definetly provide a positive input to the office and my ticket.

In Steve's article he defined the majority of our ticket's issues, but one which was left for my explanation are the possibilities of our Student Government obtaining a grant from the various educational foundations. The object of such a grant would be to make our student government a financially independent organization. Whether or not this would be a viable method remains to be seen, yet what is far more important to note is that our ticket has the qualities of leadership, experience, and most important imagination that is very instrumental for a good Student Government.

The Vice-Presidency basically includes many responsibilities which call for a person that posseses the capability and desire to do a good job. If elected along with my ticket I can do such a job.

Rob McGregor

As Dorm Government President candidate, I would like to relay some of my ideas and feelings towards the function of Dorm government and the function of its "President." Most of my ideas on how dorm. Government should function came as a result of discussion with students involved in the S.T.A.R.T. program and from the efforts of Tussey-Terrace to organize their own independent dorm. government. Also I recently visited the University of Pitt. at Johnstown and received a few pointers from their dorm government set up.

In running for this office, I had to first realize that the position I was running for was not one of an authoritarian figure telling certain dorms what they should do, but rather more of a position of a communicator between the dorm students and the Senate. I see the position as one of initiating individual dorms to develop their own form of government, and after that to act as a chairman to meetings of representatives from each individual dorm government. The dorm government president should provide ideas and suggestions on how representatives, groups, or simply interested dorm members.

In these central meetings, the presidents position would be to present what Senate is doing to this "House of Representatives" and channel discussion on these issues to eventually decide the consensus of the "House" so that the president (who is a voting member of the Senate) can vote as the voice of the dorm reps. So my purpose, if elected, would be to act as mediator through which student government and the students of the dorm can communicate more directly on Senate issues, problems in the dorm and activities which the individual each dorm could set up their own government. I propose that at dorm government meetings, each dorm should be represented as its own government decides, either as one elected official, alternating repretion as I hope, will require great dedication and good organization. I am willing to be dedicated and hope that my past leadership experience in high school and my first two years here have developed my abilities as an organizer. As a team, Steve, Ralph, and I will work well together and I am sure that with their backing and your support, dorm government can be very sucessful in working well for you, the dorm student.

is the possible job contacts through the student's association with organizations. Many times in doing research for a paper a person becomes closely involved with a certain organization. If this tie is close enough then there is a possibility that the organization may offer the person a job after he or she graduates.

The program through Drew University, called the London Semester, is pretty much the same except that the student lives and studies in London. The student attends several lectures, seminars, and meetings in the course of learning about the British system of government. there are occasional field trips to points of interest.

How does one take advantage of these opportunities? Well you contact a prof in the political science department and turn in an application. From there on you are selected on a basis of grade point average, prof recommendation, and dependability in attending class and getting work done. The usual quota given Juniata is one, however many times we ask for extra slots if a number of qualified students apply. And one doesn't have to be political science major to apply.

From talking to students who have participated in these programs I found the general consensus to be that it was a very worthwhile experience. For one it was the most rewarding part of his college education. Especially in London, where one experiences a different society at work first hand. They were rewarding both psychologically and educationally.

One of the newer professors, Prof. Rettke, will be instructing a course in "Forms and Designs in Rocks and Landscapes". This course will deal with the formations one can see in the earth if the eyes are open. These classes will be ideal for hikers and backpackers.

I am truly excited with this project. The courses are varied and encompass individuals for all parts of the college. Judging from the response to the questionaire, this project has a great deal of interest among the students, staff, and administration.

Copulation And Fertility Rites at Juniata College

by Steve Townsend

Breeding season is here again. With the coming of spring, birds prepare to nest, mammels ready for their litter, and in like fashion, Juniata's student government makes preparation to perpetuate the species. In this case, however, the only real difference is that instead of copulating or undergoing mitosis, the government elects.

As a reproductive means, electing is a stange phenomenon indeed. It encompasses aspects of many reproductive means while being identical to none. Electing is similar to the budding of yeast in that all offspring seem to arise almost exclusively the mother body; it is similar to the mating habits of some birds in that there seems to be a marked brightening of the plummage and, as the case with the mammels, the young are tediously slow in maturing.

Its most perplexing dissimilarity arises from the fact that elections never seem to result in a net change in the government's population. The entire process is not unlike a bad case of dandruff: periodically, the old officers are replaced by new and flake bothersomely to the shoulders.

Electing most fascinating aspect, however, is the previously mentioned changing of the pluma. It seems that every year during the month of March candidates undergo a hunting metamorphosis. Usually decked out in the traditional trappings of denim and T-shirts, the candidates now begin to appear in the more striking garb of suits, manicured hair and shined shoes.

Once the great change has been completed, candidates begin a very primitive ritual known as Building Support or Campaigning. In its most spectacular form campaigning sends candidates flirting from person to person, usually during meals, in what closely resembles an Aborigine fertility rite. There appears to be only two rules to this peculiar ritual. First, candidates must speak to everyone, including total strangers, as if they were long separated relatives, and secondly, they must always be In Favor of this, that and the ever elusive Student Pub.

The rationale and motivations behind these intriquing actions are quite difficult to grasp. Unlike the rhythmic mating jerks of some fish, this cycle of table visit and promise seems to serve no useful purpose. It is certainly not attractive in its nature for many Juniata students can be seen gulping down their meals in a hurried hope of avoiding just such a visit. Secondly, it most certainly doesn't seem to aid in making friends and influencing people. Comments such as "Who the hell is he trying to impress?" abound amoung the student body. The current explanation for this irony is that due to a temporary hormonal imbalance, candidates actually enjoy making pesty nuisances of themselves.

When election day finally comes students usually breath a sigh of relief and choose the candidate most colorful in wardrobe or least obnoxious in taties. Looking objectively at the entire distastful affair it is a wonder electing ever survived the onslaught of evolution. Were it not for the environmental factors of Transcript Inflation and Status Seeking perhaps it would not have.

Politics

the candidates. Only after the fundamental conflicts have been resolved can the energy and experience of the leader begin to mobilize programs. Relinquish the national overtones that have been brought to this election. Large scale politics has no place at Juniata. Consider rather who can best coordinate efforts on campus to bring about effective student representation and government.

I suppose the only thing left to say is get out and vote. Poor leader ship is largely the blame of those apathetic non-voters. So vote, not because your life depends on it(because it doesn't). But vote because the quality of your life just might depend on it.

putes the individual's demonstrated financial need to attend Juniata. The application then goes into a pile with all other prospective students who have applied for financial assistance through Juniata."

for any effective suspense, and eventually becomes monotonous; the dialogue is absolutely gruesome; the solution is ridiculous and impossible to believe; the few really good suspense scenes are made trite by what happens to the characters a scene or two later; and the whole purpose of the movie seems only to make a few million dollars off the public's desire to see famous people burn up, which seems to me downright sick. All that can be said is that the special effects are quite good, and these are even pretty bad—the dialogue tells us that the fire is confined to the 81st floor the scene before we see two distinct sections about twenty floors apart burning in the outside shots. Neat! But it was the most popular of the five films, so the Academy will probably call it the best movie of the year.

Of the other four, we can probably dismiss them one by one until we have our best. "The Conversation," which was my favorite, will die because not enough people have seen it. If suffered from a disinterested distributor, so it will be overlooked despite its highly suspenseful nature, and its victory at Cannes last year. "The Godfather Pt. II" will be passed over because it is a sequel. People are sick of the Corleones, and, the fact that this is a better movie than the original will not affect the voters. "Lenny," which would be my second choice, will undoubtedly be passed over because it is inaccurate. (That it was not meant to be accurate is not important to these people). The Academy voters have probably seen the real Lenny Bruce, so will not like the movie for two reasons: 1) They thought he was a lousy, no-talent, dirty-mouthed degenerate, or 2) they resent the white-washing of Lenny's life and performances. Which leaves "Chinatown." This was the most popular of these last four movies, so our pretentious Academy voters will vote for it as a popular, "classy" movie by an artistic director (Roman Polanski) and with a highly popular star (Jack Nicholson). So, although I'd pick "The Conversation" myself, the Academy will probably pick "Chinatown" as the best picture of the year. As far as performers go, I'd pick Al Pacino for the best actor for "The Godfather II" and Ellen Burstyn as best actress for "Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore."

I suppose this leaves nothing to talk about except the on-campus movies before the next issue. Tomorrow at 7 is a harmless musical called "Seven Brides for Seven Brothers" which is enjoyable, if nothing else. On Sunday is "American Graffiti," at 8:15 in Oller. Admission is $2.00 if you come alone, and $3.00 for two people. As this was the biggest votegetter on our questionairre, I needn't say too much about it. On Wednesday is "Soldier Blue" in Oller Hall at 8:15. We aren't charging anything for this because of the town meeting before it. Finally, the first Friday after we get back brings us "The Wild One" for all you Marlon Brando and/or motorcycle freaks. I must apologize for the higher prices and absence of the series ticket, but we have to make up the incredible losses we made with "The Godfather" (I guess it wasn't an offer you couldn't refuse). But these are still slightly less than what you'd pay at a real theater, so why not come and enjoy anyway?

A Talk With Donnie

Donnie Williams, the ECAC All-East rookie as a freshman, leading scorer for the Juniata Tribers and the Northern Section of the MAC's with 22 points per game; third leading scorer in Juniata history with 1,260 points; and collecting 800 rebounds in his three years at Juniata has withdrawn from school. The reasons for his withdrawal are esteric and will remain so until Donnie would have it otherwise. This is not to suggest that he doesn't want to share his problems with the readers but only that secrets when revealed tend to be forgotten to soon. The intimate secretive thoughts of Donni Williams will remain in the Pandora's box until there is a time when he can be assured they will be remembered. As a close friend of his, I respect his wishes, as they are nost sincere.

I talked with Donnie Monday afternoon by phone, at his home in Pittsburgh, Pa. He hoped that I could relay a few personal thoughts of his concerning the school, athletic department and his three years as a basketball player to you.

Donnie? "I was very happy that the season went as well as it did. It make me feel good to know that I was a part of it for three years; and that this year in particular was very successful.

"It's funny, I got all the ink. But I want all the people to realize that it was the team that helped me into that position. Everything was for the players. I can't find much to say about it now. Except that we lived together; played together; and did it all TOGETHER. I want the people to know the kind of respect and feeling we had for each other. Where would I be if. . .?

"Another thing of great personal importance to me is the problem of the black athlete at Juniata. You see, I don't think Juniata is prepared to deal with them. A black athlete at a school like Juniata can't be #35079, or a John Doe. He stands out. The college is not prepared to give him a lending hand — no stares, no tokenism. As contradicting as it might sound, Juniata helped me to realize my goals in life even more. I believe that what I've done is a step forward, not backward. I've two pro-trials this summer; no matter what happens, I'll always continue to play ball.

"I've paraelled life to basketball. Sometimes you fall, and get hit really hard, but you've got to pick yourself up again. Sometimes I had to crawl off the court, everyone would cheer, no person realize how hard I had worked and how physical strain I had endured. It was far from being easy.

"All I have are good things to say about the athletic department. They are desperately trying to build sound varsity sports. But I believe that they are having problems with the rest of the administration. I see the administrators as wanting A-1 athletic teams. But somehow, someway, they see it as making them become inferior to other schools. In other words, they want their cake, but they want to eat it too. Which I say can never happen.

"I'll always play ball — no matter what happens. I'm in love with the sport. I've worked hard to get where I am. Some may think that I'm nowhere. But I've tried. I've been kicked and picked myself up again, and will continue to doso.

"I'll remember you all. I've left some good friends at Juniata. I hope to see all of you soon."

Donnie Williams, a star basketball player for the Tribers for three long years. People will miss your stylish and colorful actions, smile and fist raised in the "black power" sign. I'll miss you because you are my friend.

always available during their office hours. but from what I have seen and having heard complaints from other students, this is not true of the majority of professors. Also it is important to note I'm not criticizing those professors who cannot be reached because they are busy with another student. Most students don't mind waiting during office hours for a professor if they are assured the faculty member is helping someone else.

I genuinely hope in the future more students will "use their professors" and not give up too easily if they first don't succeed in contacting them. It may be the only way to remedy this problem. I also hope more professors will learn to show consideration for the student's time and those few faculty who already are usually available and willing during office hours will continue to be so. It's the only way to improve communication at J.C. For if we don't at least meet each other half way, we surely won't ever be able to reach each other all the way.

Big Daddy Jula Speaks His Mind

by Gary Moore

Mark "Daddy" Jula, a senior who has just played his last year of basketball for the Juniata Tribers as a guard, offered his intermost thoughts and reflections during my interview with him last Sunday afternoon. The cool, calm and seemingly unanswering "Daddy" Jula is extremely emotional off the court, as he doesn't appear to be on it.

"Daddy": "I was worried about being a senior. . .having to prove myself all over again. This was going to be my last year and I wanted to make it a good one."

Moore: "I think you did."

"Daddy": "Well I worked hard; running before the season because I knew it could be a good year, and that we had the material to make it one."

Daddy spoke the truth. As the Tribers finished 13-12 this season, one loss of which was handed by Upsala in the Middle Atlantic Conference North Section playoffs. The Tribers have not earned a playoff spot since 1970.

"Daddy": "We should have gone all the way in the playoffs. But everyone was so tight. I could sense it. And when Tabor got into foul trouble. . ."

Moore: "What are your attitudes in respect to the way a player should play the game? How did you play it?"

"Daddy": "People come first of all to see good basketball; secondly to be entertained. Think of it this way. . .if they came to a game on Saturday night, they may be giving up a movie or a dance. Basketball takes the place of that entertainment. This is why I would throw a behind the back pass instead of a two-handed chest pass. The crowd loves this. You can hear their "Ohhh's and Ahhh's". I'm not a hot-dog. I just feel as if I've got two jobs to do. The first and most important, of course, is to win. But the second job is to entertain the crowd. You know, looking the opposite way when you throw the ball — faking your opponant out. Or dribbling behind your back and givin a few fancy steps. But remember, if you can't do it, don't try. Because your first objective is to win."

Moore: "How do you view the coming year for basketball at Juniata?"

"Daddy": "I'm anxious to see what developes. Coach Meditch has good discipline. He knows his basketball. Moreover, he knows what it takes to win — the adjustments the team has to make during the game."

He's got a good thing going. The people are enthused and want to continue coming to see the games. I only wish it had started when I came here. Hell, I tell the possible recruits that their walking into a gold mine. With this attitude, there is no reason why the team shouldn't make the playoffs next year."

Moore: "How do you feel now that basketball is over for you at Juniata?"

"Daddy": "I've been playing organized ball since the 6th grade. That's want, eleven years? I'm going to miss it. Miss playing around with the guys at practices, the long road trips in which we could sit down and talk five hours at a time— one on one. It's funny, although you bitched and complained about it, deep down inside you knew it was alright. I would have been a nervous wreck without it. Now as I think about it, I can't look forward to next October. All I'm able to do is think that the guys are out there on the court doing their thing without me. I'll miss them. I felt a close relationship to them. If I were to ever run into a problem, I'd go to one of them. We're all just damn good friends. I'll definetly miss them."

Finishing third in scoring averages, 6.2 "Daddy" led in assists with 99. His coolness and moves on the court was a part of his self that he gave to the fans, for their own delight. His determination and sweat he leaves on the "hardwood" court of Juniata he leaves to the team. A man who has given his "being" to basketball for Juniata for four years is leaving. We're going too miss you Mark "DAddy" Jula, but we'll never forget you.

A Lot From Moore

by John Paulshock

"Hey man, What's happenin' " "Hey, sounds hip man" "Dynomite" Sound familiar? Well, if not, then you're not acquainted with those infamous jingles of Gary Wayne "Sports Jive" Moore, and the unique greeting tha the Juniatian's sports editor repeatedly concocts. The fast-thinking, always jovial, and seemingly popular boss of the sports department has proved to be a vital backbone to the school's newspaper, and has always escaped criticism in editorials and readers' comments. Perhaps this is so due to his immense devotion to the paper, and the "Sweet-talking" manner by which he engineers his crew. Even when his "cub-reporters" let him down, he comes through with the necessary articles. I can remember an issue of the periodical which was circulated after Christmas, and which was splattered on the back page with four stories by one author. When he's in a clutch on a Monday night to fill an empty spot in the column, he exhibits his "con-oriented" leadership talents and rounds up someone to write something for him.

I'm sure you all have seen this guy wandering to and fro' on campus, because he possesses a unique slauched type-walk, with a white adidas bag slung over his shoulder. His weekly column, "A Little From Moore" is only one reflection of his enthusiasm in the sports world, and his interest in the Juniatian. However, you can find him active in many school organizations; and he just be-bops here and be-bops there, doing what has to be done.

By the way, Gary, where did you get the energy to snap all the photos for the paper, too And I understand you can host a relaxing and entertaining bash as well.

A Final Tribute
Ruffo and Bickel

The Juniata Tribers basketball players of this season will suffer a big loss; Greg Ruffo, a senior guard will graduate this spring; while Bill Bickel, a forward, will be ineligible to play next year. Both men made enormous contributions to the team and both helped take "on the weight" in getting the Tribers to the M.A.C. playoffs.

Greg Ruffo, who is a transfer student from Clarion State, played at the guard position for Juniata for two years. Ruffo, who had his own cheering section this year chanting "Ruff," saw limited action at the end of the season. "Ruff" however, hung in there, and made excellent defensive plays, and contributed some scoring. Ruffo hit better in free throw percentage, .792, than any other member of the Tribers. He ended the season with a 4.9 game point average.

Bill Bickel who was troubled by knee ailments during the season and a co-captain of the team with Donnie Williams ended the season with a 10.2 game point average. He was second only to Donnie Williams in scoring. Bickel's two years of playing for the Tribers has helped not only by his tremendous talent but his ingenuity and experience were definitly a major factor in Juniata making it to the playoffs.

Both men will be missed in more ways than one. Their talent, dedication and drive will be remembered with their names.

Everybody Is Invited To The Big Music Recital

by Perry Habecker

Sunday, April 27 should be an interesting day for musical happenings. The Music department will be featuring a 2:00 P.M. student recital and an 8 o'clock college band concert. The student performers for the afternoon recital are vocalists Wendy Hackman, soprano, and Cricket Smith, an alto. Wendy will perform a Mozart aria accompanied by Ibrook Tower onthe clarinet. Accompaning herself on the guitar in a lute-like fashion, Cricket will perform several French Renaissance songs. Also included on the program are Mussorgsky's "Nursery Song Cycle", Wagner's "Centes Ballad", and "Gypsy Songs" by Dvorak. Both senior students, they have studied under the tutelage of Marjorie Hirsch for several years. The public is welcome to this recital, which will be held in Stone Church on April 27, 2:00 P.M.

That same evening the Juniata College Band will present a program of marches, concert pieces, and big band sounds. A special feature of the program will be the Weber Trio in G minor (Opus 63) with Nancy Inman, flute, Janet Bechtel, cello, and Esther Yu at the piano.

Even though this is the first year for the band, the band has already been quite active--football and basketball games, and orchestra-pit assistance for the play "Jumpers". Under the direction of Mr. Ibrook Tower, the ensemble has attained a high degree of morale and musicianship. The bandmembers want to share their gift of music with the public, so come on out for some visual and aural pleasure; Oller Hall, April 27, 8:15 P.M.

Give A Damn Get Involved!

by Bill Brooks

Prior to the election, both candidates running for Dorm Government President expressed their opinions pertaining to dorm autonomy and a better rapport with the students. That's all fine and dandy, but how successful will they be in trying to manipulate student involvement? The past two years dorm government has been practically nonexistent. Worse yet, the students' attitude concerning it has been rather passive.

As result of the persistent efforts by professor Giebel (for which he should be commended) and the ephemeral fervor of the students, Tussey dorm tried to supersede the present dorm government by establishing a completely autonomous group. Our purpose was twofold. We had intended to benefit from this association both educationally and socially. Plans were discussed by which representatives or subcommittees would attend food service meetings, senate meetings, and student gatherings with the administration. The fifty prospective active members we had at one time would have been an effective lobbying group. We rapped about applying a little pressure on the deans to establish coed residence on campus next year. Improving personal relationships with the faculty was on our agenda. With kitchen facilities, we discussed having faculty members over for an informal dinner and cards. Socially, we recognized the limited opportunities for entertainment sponsored by the college. We had intended to exploit the lounge and adjacent game room by holding

Interesting Addition at Beeghley

by Rob Lopresti

More study space, new research sources, and a reminder of Juniata College's origins are some of the main features which will be made available to the college community starting next week, when the Beeghly Library opens a third floor to the public.

The lower level will open this Monday, April 21, according to Mr. Robert Sabin, Juniata's director of libraries. It contains a large collection of federal and state documents, as well as the college archives room, both of which will be available for general use for the first time.

Perhaps the most interesting exhibit is a printing press which dates back to the Huntingdon of the 1870's. At that time the Washington hand press was owned by Henry B. Brumbaugh and John B. Brumbaugh, who helped found Juniata College. In fact, the first classes were taught in rooms over the printing shop.

The press, which is in working condition, was given to the college by the publisher of the Martinsburg Morrisons Cove Echo. As Juniata's centennial approaches it serves as a fascinating reminder of our beginnings.

The main section of the basement, which will be open during the libraries normal hours, has tables and study carrels for up to fifty people. It contains an extensive compilation of government documents, on both state and federal levels. Some especially valuable works (such as the 1789 annals of congress) will be kept locked away, but available on request.

Mrs. Linda Payne is the librarian who will be in charge of this document collection. It contains much primary research material on most subjects that either the federal or Pennsylvania government is concerned with.

The Archives Room, which will be open from eight to five, is the home of the printing press, as well as several interesting collections. These include all of the college's publications, a large amount of material on the Huntingdon and Juniata Valley area, and publications concerning the Church of the Brethren.

The opening of the lower level provide the students with much more then just a new place to study. A varied collection of documents, information about the college and community, and the classic printing press make the new level a place well worth examining.

Wasteful Student Eating Habits Show General Apathy Toward World Hunger

By Bess Gonglewski and Jon Streich

The other night I heard someone say that TV makes or breaks the news. I don't agree completely, but to a large extent it appears to be so. If you recall the weeks preceeding and following the World Food Conference in Rome, TV was full of articles and programs dealing with the concern of world hunger, etc. Recently you'll rarely find such coverage in the media. But world-wide hunger is still as bad today as it was in November, 1974.

With six million people on the verge of starvation in Africa alone, you might think that there is a crisis. Actually it is estimated that there are at least 400 million people around the world who are severely malnourished. And we're not talking about Africa or India alone; we've got that problem here in the United States of America — the greatest nation in the world (of about 230 million people in the U.S.A. at least 21 million live below the federal proverty income level!) Several nations of the world began to think that hunger was a problem, and they decided to convene in Rome to discuss the issue, back in November. The sessions, sad to say, resulted basically in a lot of hot air, and not many things were decided upon. One good consequence of the Conference is that it helped to make people more aware of the critical situation.

In order to take food off of the critical list, it is estimated that ten million tons of grain are needed. This is not available presently. But Canada pledged to give one million tons of grain per year for the next three years, and the U.S. pledged five million tons of grain for this coming year. Both of these countries are the only ones which produce enough grain for such surplus and therefore are important in helping out with the situation. But as much as we Americans think that we are the world's philanthropists, the U.S.A. ranks fourteenth out of sixteen donor nations in terms of the aid it provides in proportion to the GNP! The average Indian consumes about 400 pounds of grain per year, while the average American consumes about one ton! This is somewhat misleading; since we eat so much meat the figure is high. It takes about twenty pounds of grain to produce one pound of meat. You can imagine how much could be saved if we obtained our protein directly.

Added to these problems is the fact that more grain is likely not to be produced. We have somewhat reached a plateau in the "green revolution". There are also shortages of one of agriculture's basic ingredients: fertilizer, which is produced from petroleum. With this in mind, it seems that the likely alternative is to change our lifestyle, a solution we've heard so much about. Obviously the ideal thing is to cut the world population growth, as well as to provide food, etc. for those in straights today. These can be seen as both short and long range plans which, upon completion, would deal somewhat satisfactorily with the problem.

And now a word about college eating habits. . . I know that everyone is tired of being preached to about "Food Ecology"; but though it may not seem very close to home, the problem of hunger is ours, too. One short range plan we can begin with concerns our meals in Ellis. Anyone who has worked in the dishroom can tell of the incredible waste that the food service can do nothing about: people who take four doughnuts, eat two, and send the others untouched to the disposal; people who usually eat a quarter of a normal portion and throw the rest of the serving away because they are too lazy to ask for a small one; etc. If students think before they take, there will be less waste; this would cut food costs and overall consumption of resources. Another solution is to eat less meat, which would free more grain to be used to feed people. Even switching from beef to pork or poultry (have chicken instead of salisbury steak) would help because the latter two are more efficient protein sources than beef.

These are a few ideas with which to begin; more will be forthcoming the week of April 28-May 3, which is set aside as "World Hunger Week", although the primary emphasis will be on world hunger. A small group on campus, organized by Andy Murray, is planning to have some sessions which hopefully will make more students aware of the situation and give us an opportunity to fulfill more of a short range plan. The week will include some films, a speaker, and some fasting or meal-selling for those who seriously want to raise some funds for a philanthropic organization like CROP. We sincerely hope that those of you who

by Judy Swartley

On March 19, 1975, a chapter of Sigma Pi Sigma (Honorary Physics Society) was installed at Juniata College. Members were selected by a nominating committee which consisted of Dr. J. Rompala, Dr. I. Engle, and Dr. R. Pfrogner. Members were eligible for nomination if they have maintained a certain grade point average in their science courses, have had at least one upper level physics course, and intend to pursue a career in physics or a physics related field.

To initiate the proceedings, Dr. C. L. Hosler, Dean of the College of Earth and Mineral Sciences at Penn State University, presented a public lecture. His presentation on weather modification was very informative and was presented in an interesting and humorous manner. Following the lecture, there was a dinner in the President's dining room in Ellis Hall afterwhich the induction ceremony began. Dr. H. Shwe from East Strousburg State College conducted the ceremony which began with a slide presentation of the society followed by its history. Another guest, Dr. M. White from Penn State University also helped with the ceremony.

Officers of the society are: Judy Swartley, president; Renee Diehl, vice-president; and Gary Marpoe, secretary-treasurer.

Also present at the ceremony was Dr. P. Yoder, a former professor of physics at Juniata College.

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the Editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatian. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name. It is also requested that all letters be double spaced with 70 spaces per line.

The Juniata College Honor Society has run up against the Buckley Amendment. The purpose of this letter is to inform the College community of the problem and to explain Society's intended action to circumvent this issue. For those not familiar with the Amendment, its function is to protect the privacy of a student's personal records from indiscriminate violation by any party—faculty member, employer, or any organization desiring to ascertain information on a student. In this particular case, it means that the Honor Society is unable to obtain a direct listing of all students who meet the minimum GPA standards of the Society. In addition, it prevents us from securing personal information concerned with academic dishonesty or other ethical infractions on all potential candidates. This information is necessary to satisfy the Society's requirement of "moral integrity" of its members. The Society is chiefly interested in violations of academic honesty, and affronts to the College community or property. This means that only issues that reach the Judicial Board would be relevant to the Society's stated intentions.

In order to meet the obligations of both the Society charter and the Buckley Amendment, the Society will receive a list of names which 1.) meet the minimum GPA (2.5 and 2.25 out of a possible 3.00 for juniors and seniors respectively) and 2.) have no mention of appearances before the Judicial Board and no question of academic integrity. Names not satisfying these requirements will not appear on the Society's list of candidates and will not receive Society questionnaires. No individual GPA's will be listed! (Actually, we don't care what you're GPA is.)

It is important to stress at this point, that those who do not receive questionnaires (to be sent out within a few weeks) can still be considered as candidates. If this person thinks that he/she should be considered for some reason (community activities, summer research, etc.) yet is not because of a failure to meet GPA standards, he or she may contact the Society expressing this desire. The candidate will receive an interview with all current members of the Society, and be given full opportunity to explain his circumstances. The Society has the right to ascertain whether the candidate meets the original GPA standard. If his failure to be considered originally stemmed from a non-fulfillment of the second condition stated above, it is probable that questions will be directed in this area.

If there are any questions, comments or discouraging remarks, they should be directed to the Honor Society's President, Larry Stem, Box 1157 or Secretary, Jayne Keirn, Box 1071. Thank you for your time.

Haythere, Eddider:

Ah was settin' a spell on ma front porch with the missus 'bout a month ago reedin' yore little paper, when ah come to the story called "Copulation and Fertility Rites at Juniata College." Now, Ahve allus had a open mind 'bout are youth, but this here's gone a little too far.

Ma! I sez to ma wife, Ma, lookee here a this. Them college kids are now demandin copulation and fertility rites.

Why that's alful, Zeke, Ma sez.

Durn raht it is,sez I back at her.

Now, when they wuz demandin them civvil rites for blaks and yellers and reds and greens, Ah thought, okay, whah not? I wuznt too peeved either when wimmin wanted thare rites. Ah even cheered for gay rites. After all, dint Jefferson give us the rite to pursue happiness in that there Decoration of Innependince? (Althow Ah never unnerstood why no one but them pansies who wear green on Thirsdies wanted to be gay). But Copulation rites? That's gone a little too far!

Ah mean, dithnt Pressydint Eisenpouer warn us bout the comin copulation explosion? We wuz warned to make fewer coples by the pressydint of these here United States. Next thing we know, theall be askin for the rite to mess in the hay with each other.

Now Ah don't mind givin them fertility rites. I'm gettin on in time, and Ah can use all the help Ah can get to fertilize my South forty. But askin for copulation rites are the demands of younguns whose parents spoiled them too much.

Well Ahve sed all ah have to say ah rekin. Ahve never written to a big city newspaper before, so ah maht uv made a mistake or so.

This Week At Juniata

by Nancy Nordberg and Rosemary Tai

The main event of the coming week is All Class Night which will be held on Saturday night beginning at 8:15 P.M. in Oller Hall. The theme for this year's plays is tragic comedy. Each class will present their play and as the judges are making their decision the faculty will present their play. Fun will continue as the night goes on at the All Class Night Party at the Huntingdon Fairgrounds. The party will start at 11:00 and last until 3:00. Tickets may be purchased from class officers for $2.00 or for $2.50 at the door. Come join in on the entertainment and refreshments this Saturday— guaranteed to be a little different than the normal weekend at JC.

Other events of the week include:

(Along Muddy Run)

by Henry Siedzikowski

When the new curriculum was first being implemented, Juniata, like many other colleges around the country, tried to experiment with the de-emphasis of grades. The general education courses were to be graded on a satisfactory-unsatisfactory basis. This was even a step beyond the old pass-fail concept. In addition to this, the Dean's list was eliminated. Finally, in what seemed a contradictory move, the passing level was moved up from a "D" to a "C".

As the years went past, reality has set in. Pressures from graduate schools provided the obvious reason for the series of compromise systems of grading that we've seen in the general education courses. However, to the students who have taken the courses and many of the faculty who taught them, there is another reason: in most of the courses an informal system of grading developed that paralleled the formal one. There was a "very satisfactory," "satisfactory," "minimal satisfactory," "borderline unsatisfactory" and "unsatisfactory." It's tough to fool a college student with an analogy as obvious as that.

The Dean's list has been reinstituted. It is supposedly made meaningful by being based on a year's work. You can't get on with one good term. Only the change in the passing level has survived, and that one seemed out of place in the beginning.

There are some cynical members of our campus community who smugly watched these attempted reforms fail. However, the gradual return to our traditional grading system should not be viewed as a victory for them. It is a loss for everyone involved. The traditional system goes directly against the principles of a liberal arts education. The inability of the traditionalist to see this is a restraining force on the progress of this college.

On the other hand, the reformers also seem to miss the obvious. Grades are such an established part of our system, that it is unrealistic to try to eliminate them. The most promising path seems to be an attempt to make grades more meaningful, both to the student and to those who will use them for evaluation later.

The change in the passing level falls short in accomplishing this objective. It does not give the student any information on his performance in the course beyond a simple letter grade. And as for future evaluators, it makes interpretation of the grades even more difficult. Is a "C" still an average performance or is it now below average?

A further change is obviously necessary, and I have a suggestion to make. One of the alternatives to grading that is constantly offered is a written evaluation by the professor. While I do not believe this system offers a satisfactory replacement for grades, I believe it has some merits. I would suggest that with the final grade in the course, each prof would provide the student with a one paragraph explanation of what this grade means in terms of that students performance in the course.

These explanatory paragraphs would be individualized. One "B" student might be told that he learned everything he should have, but he did not contribute to the rest of the class. Another "B" student might find out that he did all the work required, but still did not appear to grasp all the material.

This system would clearly mean more work for the faculty members. But, it would be a tremendous aid to the student who wanted to improve himself. It would also make future interpretations more meaningful. It might be an oppurtunity to put the principles into practice.

Taking A Walk, It Is Not The Same Here

by Chip Lovett

People have often asked me if it is that much different living in a city than living here? Truthfully, I must admit that there is a difference but I usually add people aren't any different here than anywhere else.

Yes it is true I can relax a little more here than in the city when walking down the street, but living here I'm still paranoid, of what I'm not sure. Although I don't plan to change Huntingdon or Huntingdon's values, I still feel uneas, when walking down their streets.

When this happens, the question arises "Is it me thinking this way or is there really bad vibrations towards me actually happening? Are people staring at me or is it just my imagination?"

These questions always pop up constantly but usually continue to be unsolved. For the rest of my life must I worry about being stared at because I don't live in a particular town or because I don't have the same color? I hope not.

For one day I hope this doesn't have to be; that is why people must change to the world around them. The world is too large for everyone to stay in their own secure surroundings. One should look at life from a different perspective. Then and only then can they make value judgements on anyone.

Coming to Juniata, I feel as though I'm opening more doors to see what's in our world.

"Best Years Of Our Lives At JC"

by Brad Rudy

I can't help escaping the feeling that if The Best Years of Our Lives were re-released today, it would carry as much, if not more effect as in 1945. Released immediately after World War II, this multi-award winning film showed the attempts of three veterans trying desperately to fit back into civilian life. As everyone knows (or at least should know), Viet Nam veterans are facing the same, or similar, type of situation today. Certain circumstances have changed, though. Viet Nam represented no threat to national security, and a greater percentage of current veterans were unwilling participants. These facts will add an added poignancy and immediacy to a modern viewing of this once-highly-popular movie.

The three veterans in Best Years are of different ages, backgrounds, and military experience. First is Al, formerly a prosperous banker, played by Frederic March. He is the most established—he has a wife, family and job waiting for him. But somehow, it's different. His attitudes have changed—"Last year it was 'kill Japs.' This year, it's 'make money.'"—he has been disoriented by the war and can't accept his former standards. The second, Fred (Dana Andrews), was an Air Force captain. Before the war, he was a drugstore "soda-jerk" and therefore has no real job experience or training. He is probably the most lost—he doesn't want his former job, he's too old to go back to school (at least he keeps telling himself this), and, on top of all this, he can't find his wife to whom he had been married only shortly before going abroad. Finally is Homer, a young Navy machinist played by Harold Russell. His problem is at least more painful than those of the others—he has lost both his hands and can only function with the aids of two mechanical hooks. He faces the prospect of being repulsive to his former fiancee and utterly useless to society.

This, then, is the situation. You'll have to see for yourself how it comes out. Best Years of Our Lives is a sociological moie—it is a psychological movie—it is a suspense movie—above all, though, it is a human movie. The characters are recognizable and the situation is unfortunately all too familiar and contemporary. The movie is one of the few recognized by both public and critics. Taking the Academy Award for best picture for the year, being named best picture by almost every critics organization, the movie also broke box office records and is one of the all-time popular hits. And, because of the immediacy of its conflict, it should be found, at the least, adequate by a Juniata audience. (Friday, April 18, 7:00 P.M., Oller Hall, 25¢ admission).

CURRENT AND RECOMMENDED:

Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore. Light comedy about a sudden widow setting out to restart her premarital career as a bar singer. Thoroughly enjoyable throughout. Ellen Burstyn and Kris Kristofferson star.

Amarcord. Fellini's light-hearted look at small town life in Fascist Italy. Containing no plot, this also has none of the heavy intellectualism of all the Fellini we saw last term. More enjoyable sequences include a madman shouting "I want a woman" from a treetop, an excursion to watch a passing ocean liner, and a visit from a horny harem.

Earthquake, The Towering Inferno. Two of the year's disaster epics. Sort of fun if you have nothing to do and don't feel like getting involved. Interesting effects, but resistant to any thinking on the part of the audience (and writers).

The Front Page. The third reincarnation of the classic Hecht-MacArthur comedy about Chicago newsmen. Doesn't quite have the maddeningly hilarious pacing of His Girl Friday (a previous attempt), but is still thoroughly enjoyable.

The Godfather II. Michael Corleone shows his true colors—corruption pure and simple. His rise to unreachable power is compared to his father's rise to unblamable power. Robert DeNiro plays young Brando and Al Pacino tops his previous performance as Michael.

Lenny. More about hypocrisy than about Lenny Bruce. Intercutting of interview, performance and biographical footage creates a powerful, if somewhat inaccurate portrait of Lenny. Dustin Hoffman and Valerie Perrinne star.

Murder on the Orient Express. An Agatha Christie Whodunit. The all-star cast hams it up so much that it is pleasing despite its talky plot and cheat ending.

A Woman Under the Influence. Gena Rowlands plays Mabel, a lower-middle-class housewife oppressed by literally everything, but with a vibrant outlook on life that just doesn't mesh with her surroundings. She has a nervous breakdown, but her commitment fails to solve her unsolvable problems. Sometimes slow-moving, Gena Rowlands gives such an incredibly full and exciting performance that it is never boring. Peter Falk also stars.

Young Frankenstein. Mel Brooks at his insanest. Rips off all the cliches of the monster genre, and rips them off beautifully. Gene Wilder stars as Frankenstein (that's pronounced "Fronk-in-steen"), Marty Feldman plays Igor (that's pronounced "Eye-gore"), and Peter Boyle plays the monster (that's pronounced "Monstir").

Also: Critically and popularly received, but unseen by me. Shampoo, starring Warren Beatty and Julie Christie; Tommy, starring just about everything and everybody; The Four Musketteers, picking up where The Three Musketeers left off; The Great Waldo Pepper, in which we watch Robert Redford get high; and Hearts and Minds, a documentary on Viet Nam (the one in SE Asia, not Washington DC).

dances (live music). A dance was almost pulled off and surely this would have been the impetus for further endeavors.

This enthusiasm as a by-product of the original town meeting has evaporated. I hope Mike can stimulate some interest. He is a fine individual, but he can't do it alone or with a handful of bureaucrats. He needs something money can't buy; he needs you. Bowie And His Americans— He Hits Us Where It Hurts

by Steve Townsend

David Bowie has to be the most unlikely rock star ever to bless a vinyl pressing. But it wasn't as if he planned it that way, nature left him no other alternative. So skeletally frail are his features, so brittle his masculinity, that pretending to be anything but a rock reared, misgendered Twiggy would certainly have reduced him to a sexual absurdity. Instead, he became the anomaly he was born, intricately binding up his image and his music with the no man's land of his sexuality.

There was just one problem with this ingenious formula— America wasn't ready for it. In the land of equal opportunity even the young still clung to the idea that men should be men, women be women, and never the twain should meet. As a result, America's rock audience carelessly sloughed Bowie into neo-niggerhood as just another faggot.

But while the U.S. shunned him, Great Britan loved him. Bowie and the Spiders' music was whistling off the lips of just about every teenager under the Union Jack. Funky pumps and Tinsel Lids became all the vogue. The orange headed limey had become quite a Picadilly presence.

Somehow, stardom in a nation wasn't enough. It was idoldom in an empire for which Bowie longed. It was America that fascinated him and it was America he wanted. He needed to taste the thrill of knowing that millions of stateside chickens got all sticky over David photogs.

So when you're starving for cake eat bread, right? Right! Bowie's career suddenly reversed itself. Out came the Live album and we heard Bowie stomping all over the sweets of his career. Turn and face the changes. Gone was the glitter and the homo anthems. In their place came just the kind of seductive, maybe macho poses that saturate the American teen press.

Even the best press coverage can only deliver promises. It was up to Bowie to come through with product. And come through he did. Suddenly, the record bins began filling up with an album written, produced, and packaged for United States consumption. Self consciously titled "Young Americans", its cover depicted a Bowie that resembled more James Dean and posed more like Bogart than any Bowie we had ever known.

The albums' music was also peculiarly United States. Bowie now sounded like a castrated Elvis croaking out a funky variety of urban soul. The spectre of Bowie as a soul brother seemed a poor case of type casting, of carrying a new thing too far.

Slowly, as the music began to mesmerize, the idea of Bowie in a soul singer's garb began to lose its absurdity. Could it be any more absurd than Elvis presenting the white world with its first taste of popularized blues? Or, for that matter, you or I singing a Negro spiritual on Sunday. Maybe not, but did he have to be so obvious? Couldn't he have been more respectful by just delicately glossing over the blackness of it all? Did he have to flaunt our hypocrisy by actually telling us that white kids watch Soul Train too?

In an effort to become an American idol, Bowie has touched the tender relationship between the races, an undeniable but very unpleasant aspect of our character. In being so successful, he may well have overshot his target. For if it was the faggot in us all that rejected the early Bowie, it will be our sense of national guilt that may cause a new distaste.

On Being A Strong and Powerful Nation

by Courtnaye B. Rhone

Amidst the clamer and the turmoil that beset South Vietnam I could not help but feel a twinge of despair after seeing the country submerged by the merciless Vietnamese Communist offensive. After all the years that we spent there trying to keep this small country from succumbing to the tragedy of Communist rule, the loss of thousands of American lives in a war that was a severe controversy with regard to the American consciousness is a painful experience. We jeopardized American lives so the Vietnamese could not have to jeopardize their desire for freedom. To argue that we should not have been there is grossly inappropriate, because the fact is that we were there, and we did fend off the aggressors for the time that we remained on their soil. It wasn't a matter of winning or losing but aiding a nation that was in a critical crisis. That war was indeed a war that entailed a strong "matter of conscience."

Today the South Vietnamese despise the American people for supplementing them with additional aid to ward off the Communists and I sympathize with them greatly even though aid would probably not have terminated the inevitable fall of South Vietnamese provinces. The fact of the matter is we didn't help and South Vietnam has lost a battle that was certain to falter into oblivion from the very beginning. Consequently we are in the process of

Intramurals Are For The Guys and Gals

Accompanying every change of season is also a change of athletic oppourtunities involved with the intramural competition. Now that the doldrums of winter have hopefully ended, and the basketball season and other indoor activities have terminated, it is now the time to polish up your cleats, and leather your baseball mitts, and head out to the grassy, spring world outside. A brief conversation with Dean Rossi, director of the program, provided some information concerning the growth of the department, and some exceptions of the upcoming season.

Assisted by Dick Reilly, coach Rossi re-structured the system three years ago from a completely student governed institution, to a highly organized and quite successful service. The two men designed the program similar to that of Penn State, but scaled it down to the size of our student body, and its demands. Joint efforts among athletic officials, and the continued help from students have proved to be the substantial back-bones to I.M.'s and account for the effectiveness and efficiency.

Coach Rossi has visions of a busy spring term, and predicts the softball fields to have perpetual overflowing crowds. Sports offered include Softball for men, women, or both, Tennis for both sexes, male and female Soccer, and Track and Field. A new addition and "crowd pleaser" is March Volleyball, and has already shown a response of well over 150 participants. The highlight of the Spring is to be the All College "Picnic Invitational" which will be a track meet open to anyone in the school, and is to be a relaxing and enjoyable "fun day" on campus. This event is to be held on May 10, and more information shall be made available later.

When asked about I.M.s effect on student morale and of their beneficial aspects, Rossi responded something like: "I.M.s are one sure means of bringing the whole student body closer together. The presence of contestant seriousness and enthusiasm, the initiative of some teams to buy their own uniforms, big play-off games, and the growing amount of spectators, shows the J.C. intramural program is quite popular, and the rapid growth of the department has already led to the lack of sufficient playing areas and facilities."

Strong Powerful Nation

helping the orphans of this war torn nation by bringing them to the U.S. for American families, giving them the chance for a decent life in a very troubled world. To me accepting the orphans is the very best we can do at this point.

The title "a strong and powerful nation" (a dubious, but indeed factual distinction) has numerous responsibilities attached to it. With this distinction come the responsibilities of foreign policy relations that include not only our strong economic and political ties, but cultural and ethnic links equally as well. It's true that we literally can't afford isolationism due to our dependence on oil producing nations and countries that provide us with innumerable export goods, but if we are to think realistically about our position as a super power, we must consider our role in light of our defensive necessities, that is, those countries that lie in strategic areas that if overcome by Communist rule, would leave us floating up a creek without a paddle. If we are to survive as an influential power we must continue to befriend those who are demonstrating their freedom for their desired way of life. We have indeed a high price to pay for being the United States of America, but to retain this life of ours we're going to have to give a lot more than some of us desire, not only financially but possibly by way of valued human lives as well, which I like anybody dreads to think of ever coming to pass. There is no amount of money or man power that can replace the realm of a people's way of life, homeland and freedom, for it is so finely and dearly percieved.

A Little From Moore

by Gary Moore

Spring's in the air, offering us a new and exciting season of sports. Baseball and Track are the only varsity inter-collegiate sports this time of year at Juniata, but they look to be stimulating, exciting and just an all out "house party. And everybody's invited!"

Baseball is still under the direction of our ever-lovin' smiling Bill Berrier, who is always hanging in their with his team; though with the caliber, depth and determination of the ball club, I believe that Coach Berrier can relax. Even though the Amutucci's, McNeal's and Eckeral's are gone, the Elmer's, Sosnowske's, and Streight's are still with us. So you guys and gals be certain to tell your good friends "Take me out to the ball game".

Track is looking good this year. Though some might consider this a "rebuilding" year for Coaches Reilly and Rossi due to the large number of underclassmen, the team promises to be able to hang in the competition and come "heads up". Paul Wilson, Jack McCullough, Steve Hooper, and Bill Kibler are all the best of competitors in this league. You can be looking for a few distance records to be broken this spring. Keep your eyes on Calvin Shoenberger, a discus man who at Dickinson equalled the M.A.C.'s winning throw of last year — Calvin's a freshman.

All in all this season of sports look more than exciting, more than stimulating. It looks, "A Dynomite!"

Volleyball; NCAA Style New Sport On Campus

Juniata's club volleyball team made their debut on Saturday afternoon, March 22nd. Memorial Gym was the location of the 1st year's sport's opening contest, with Bucknell University providing the competition.

As in Rugby, the club volleyball team is composed not just of Juniata students, but of faculty and townspeople as well. Player-coach Dr. Robert Fisher is always looking for talented individuals willing to play the tough, NCAA type game he employs and contribute to the young team. Saturday's card called for the playing of a best-of-five game match. The games were to 15, and most of them were very close. The first contest ended with Juniata on top by 18-16. Bucknell retaliated in the second game behind an awesome serving attack, and prevailed 15-12.

In the third game Coach Fisher jostled the line-up to try to swing the momentum back to his squad, by inserting Gill Landis and himself. But the results were too little, too late, and Bucknell prevailed again by a 15-11 score.

Juniata was down 2-1 in games and needed a win in order to stay in the match, so they went with a line-up of Al Crane, Bob Fisher, Larry Bock (a PSU grad and employee of the Union National Bank), Pat La Port (another PSU grad) Gill Landis and Bertrand Hell— Good! These six men responded with a 15-6 thrashing of their opponants, which set the stage for the fifth and rubber game of the match.

Game five featured all the action that was deserving of the day's finale. Juniata gave their best effort, but succumbed by a heart-breaking 18-16 score.

Coach Fisher felt his team was better then they played and that they were hampered because of the necessity to juggle the lineup in order for everyone to get his chance to participate.

The team is in the process of scheduling future home matches, but they will probably be played at the Huntingdon Community Center from now on. The team uses the HCC facilities at present for their practice every Tuesday night. Dr. Fisher encourages all people interested in giving up their "jungle ball" style of playing in favor of real volleyball, to frop in at the center.

This is the WJC Program List for the Spring Term of 1975. As you can see, There are still many time slots open. If you have any kind of interest in music and want to find out what radio is like, now is your Golden Opportunity! Why not try doing it a couple hours a week? You will probably find that you enjoy it. If you are interested, call Chuck Swanson at 643-9921 or call the radio station at 643-5031. Remember, WJC Radio Juniata is your radio station. We need your support to make it work.

Viewing Life Through Art

by June Cramer

Mary Caroline Richards is a unique woman of divarse skills, talents and goals. She is the Artist-in-Residence here for the month of April. On April 17th she gave reading from her poetry and from her two books, Centering, and The Crossing Point. She also dealt with several pieces of her pottery, and several form-prints that were especially relevant to her ideas about words in art. Her basic concern is that of an interdisciplinary approach to creativity.

After receiving a PhD. in English from Berkeley, Ms. Richards taught at several universities, including Berkeley and the University of Chicago. She then taught at the experimental Black Mountain College in North Carolina. It was here that she discovered pottery and a multiple approach to communications. After this, she continued to devolope philosophy of wholeness in education. Through her interdisciplinary arts, Dr. Richards is challenging traditional boundaries that often inhibit creativity. She has developed a way of viewing communication in ways that go beyond just the verbal.

Therefore, art is more than a rigidly defined field; such as, painting or an iambic poem. It is a way of seeing all things, all types of knowledge in a creative way. It is, "A bridge between the visible and the invisible." It is taking something inward, whether it be an image or an emotion, and conveying it in "sense perceptible ways." Art is a term that cannot be rigidly defined, just as the expression of it cannot. It is a connection between matter and spirit, just as man is. Art is the expression of man's need to integrate and synthesize these aspects of existence. It is creating, as in pottery, a whole out of many different elements.

This also carries over to Dr. Richards' view of man. Man must constantly seek heightened awareness of himself as a crossing point between inwardness and outwardness. Too often, we seek personal happiness as the ultimate goal, rather than as just one part of the human experience. We must, "Bring the human being into human consciousness." As simple as this sounds, we cannot achieve any human, or worldwide advancement until we see ourselves as bound to each other by concern, understanding, and our very humanity. This has been severely neglected, as is evidenced by the world condition.

Ms. Richards believes that a sense of "spiritual destiny" helps us define our reason for being and creating.

Dr. Richards does not believe that her sex has had any detrimental effects on her career. She feels she has been given equal pay for equal work, and equal recognition. However, she does see traditional role expectations as presenting personal obstacles that must be realized and overcome. She does see the relaxing of rigid stereotypes and roles as a positive move towards freedom of expression, and healthier interpersonal relationships.

I think her philosophy seems directly related to the goals of the new curriculum, to be free to discover and expose all channels of imagination and expression, whatever field they are in. It is to cultivate a way of looking at all aspects of life and knowledge with a creative, imaginative instinct. I think Juniata should be open and responsive to Mary Caroline Richards' experiences, her "art" and her ideas. We might learn a lot about "liberal arts." She will give a lecture April 21st on "The Courage to Create," and again on April 29th, on "Wholeness in Education."

Three Calendar Proposals Are Studied By Committee

by Tom Kutz

A few months ago J.C. had its first START meeting. Classes were cancelled and everyone got a chance to say what was wrong (or right) with the old place. One of the things brought up at this meeting (and its follow up) were the problems with the college's present calendar and what could be done to change it. The Provost and others have been working on this and have come up with some ideas. I talked with Dr. Norris last Friday and discussed the alternatives that have been considered. He also said that he felt it was time for some student response to what has been done. Before an "Enlightened Judgement" can be made however, the proposals have to be known so here they are.

Dr. Norris said that there are three systems presently being looked at. The first is our present set up of three terms. The second is the four-one-four calendar. Finally, there has been some thought about going back to a semester system. There are advantages and disadvantages to all systems.

Starting with the present set up, the best feature is that there only three courses in a term. This provides us with an opportunity to put more concentration on fewer subjects. Also, this system is supposed to reduce scheduling conflicts and gives a good calendar to work in internship programs such as student teaching, business interns, etc. Finally, as a "fringe benefit" it provides us with a few more breaks than the other arrangments.

The major problem that we are all familiar with is the five hectic days of classes. This constant "push" can be a cause of a great deal of tension providing only a weekend to "relax." This calendar also doesn't quite fit with the athletic schedule so that there may be a game or meet during a break.

The four-one-four is the next possibility. . The main advantage of this one is the more relaxed work pace. While there would be four courses there would also be more time to work on them.

There are disadvantages in changing to this system however. First, a whole new set of courses would be needed for the one month term. Another problem is that of deciding the procedure for this one month term. Should it be required by all students or could we take the month off if we wanted. Also, there is still that situation of conflicting academic and athletic calendars.

Finally, there is the possibility of going back to the semester system. As with the four-one-four set up there is the attraction of a relaxed pace to work at. And the semesters would do away with the worries of a one month term. However, as with the others, there are bad points to keep in mind. First there are five courses at once. While there would be more time, there would also be two more courses. Then there is the "Christmas Crisis." The Christmas vacation would come just before finals. This could cause a problem of readjustment right at finals. While this could be corrected by starting earlier, the early start might make even more problems. (The only other solution I can think of is doing

Lower The Age, I'll Drink To That

by Suzi Baker

The formal spring initiation rites are over for another year as students slump back into the old routine with only hangovers as memories of All Class Night. What a great party! It's too bad we can't do it more often. Other schools have beer blasts regularly but alas. . . Pennsylvania has been negligent in updating its liquor laws. Negligent or simply reactionary

Pennsylvania is one among nineteen other states that have refused consistently to lower the age limit for the purchase of beer. The thirty-one remaining states have lowered the drinking age, twenty-five of these to a minimum of eighteen. I can't understand the hold up or should I say hold out Pennsylvanians can marry without parental consent at 18 and with parental consent at 16. You can be held responsible and tried for any crime in adult court at the age of 18. You can purchase a home or a car and take out a loan when you reach your eighteenth birthday. And need we recall the time-worn but valid cliches, "You can vote for state and national leaders" and "You c... fight and die for your country" the very moment you reach the magic age of 18. All of the above privileges (and sometimes requirements) indicate that maturity is recognized at age 18. Why, then, the hang-up with drinking.

I think it must have something to do with our Puritan background. A background that has managed to survive more than three centuries and still haunt our thoughts and actions with the morals and values of another era.

Perhaps William Penn country should take a look at its neighbor-state, New Jersey, that lowered the drinking age in 1973 or my home state, Maryland, that did the same last summer. The fatal step hasn't reaped great sorrow on the residents of these states. Contrary to popular belief, the traffic death toll has not risen. In fact, I expected a decrease simply because kids no longer have to drive thirty miles across state lines to get beer and then risk their lives on the way back.

The Pennsylvania legislature is to consider a 19-year-old drinking bill soon. I would suggest if you haven't written your representatives, do it. It's the least you can do. Do not send a form letter. These are merely discarded. Write a personal and preferably a factually-backed letter urging the passage of this new legislation. Then keep your eyes open and your ear to the ground. Kind out how your representatives voted. This could be valuable information to keep in mind when the 1976 elections roll around. The 18 to 21-year-olds have an over-whelming political potential if we can pull together and mobilize support. As Big Mo would say "Let my people go!" If we do it together we can all drink to that!

Note? In case some may question my motives, I am 21.)

What The Ideal Juniata Students Should Know

by Perry Habecker

The Juniata College campus has an area known as (a) Sherwood Grove, (b) Sherwood Forest, (c) Sherwood the Three, (d) The Praries of Sherwood. This area contains deciduous tree(s) predominantly the species of (a) Elmus Moribundii, (b) Elmus Healthiolus, (c) Elmus Rootstumpiae, (d) American Elm. The correct number of tree stumps on campus is (a) 11, (b) 17, (c) 29, (d) 37. The age of these stumps is (a) 15 years old, (b) 35 years old, (c) 43 years old, (d) I never learned how to count rings. Rottus stumpus is the bacteria which reduces tree stumps to turf level in 10 to 20 years — True or False. You have to be observant to answer this one — what is the replacement ratio of shrubs and tree for every tree removed? (a) 1:1, (b) 2:1, (c) 0:1.

There are plans to relandscape the campus True or False. The campus greenery has been given an undesirable rating by (a) Better Home and Gardens, (b) the author of this article, (c) Ranger Rick, (d) Huntingdon Sewage and Water Authority. There are replacement trees and shrubs growing in the college greenhouse True or False. Which area has the greenest turf (a) football field, (b) tennis court, (c) area in front of Oller Hall. Birds need trees to sit on when they get tired True or False. Who is the autor of this often quoted gem

I think that I shall never see
A poem lovely as a tree.
A tree whose hungry mouth is prest
Against the earths sweet flowing breast,
A tree that looks at God all day,
And lifts her leafy arms to pray;
A tree that may in Summer wear
A nest of robins in her hair;

The Consul-Juniata's First Musical Drama To Be Given May 15

In case your mind has been to Mars for the past few months (that probably includes all of us), the music department has been preparing its first full length "total musical drama" in years. Gian Carlo Menotti's pulitzer-prize-winning The Consul will grace Oller Hall's stage the evening of May 15 in one of the most extravagant musical production this city has ever seen. Yes, this is the big one!

But, not all is glitter and excitement. Although The Consul is 25 years old, it is still (or should I say "again") relevant. The main character is John Sorel, a "fighter for freedom" in an unnamed country. His wife, Magda, attempts to secure exit visas for them, only to run against the typical and expected red-tape and frustration. It's present-day Saigon and post-WW II Cassablanca all over: a struggle to be free, a plea for escape from repressive company and the inevitable frustration.

This is just an introduction to this "musical-drama," (of course, we won't call it an opera). It is being directed under the cooperation of five faculty members (Dr. Hirsch, Dr. Doyle, Mrs. Goehring, Mr. Briggs, and Mr. Tower) and has a cast of 4,867,942 students, alumni, and faculty. It is an experience to be shared by us all.

Find Out "Who Done It?"

by Brad Rudy

It started out as a typical Hollywood party. Everyone was acting obnoxious and drunk. Then the host, Quinton, and his wife, Sheila, began to fight (as usual). In a drunken rage, Sheila left. Going out the driveway, she was run down and killed by a hit-and-run driver.

Who is the murderer?

Such is the mystery of this week's Center Board movie, The Last of Sheila. It features James Coburn as Quinton, with the murder suspects being played by Raquel Welch, Richard Benjamin, Ian McShane, Dyan Cannon, James Mason, and Joan Hackett. Quinton decides to play a sadistic little game on his former guests: he invites them for a Mediterranean cruise on his yacht (called the Sheila, of course). Each is given a secret identity, such as "You are a shoplifter," or "You are a homosexual," or "You are a hit-and-run murderer," and challenges them to find out who each identity describes. Of course, each little "secret" describes another passenger! Quinton was always a sadistic little host, though, and he's more interested in seeing his "friends" squirm over their uncovered "indiscretion" than in finding out who killed his wife.

Unfortunately, though, one of our sunny little group takes exception to Quinton's "game," and we have a couple more corpses on our hands. "Whose?" you may ask. Now, that would be telling, wouldn't it? Who is the killer? Is there only one? Was it an "outside job"? Were they all in on it? The only thing youll get from me is that you know most of the answers before you even walk into Oller Hall.

Inevitably, comparisons will be drawn between this and the current Agatha Christie thriller, Murder on the Orient Express. As mystery-entertainment, I feel that Sheila is more fair. Murder relies too much on last-minute revelations for its solution (that is, information only Poirot could deduce). Sheila, on the other hand, gives the audience clues with almost every line, every action, and every shot. When the solution comes, we don't say, "How neat! That sure is a tricky plot!" like we do with Murder; we say, "Of course! Why didn't I see that before?"

I hope I have whetted your appetite to shell out 50 centavos for this 1973 thriller. We are showing it Saturday instead of Friday (Bonnie Raitt's on Friday, you know), and I heartily recommend it for all you mystery fans, you fun-and-excitement fans, and even you Raquel Welch fans (Would it be presumptuous of me to refer to her as an actress in stereo?). We guarantee you your four-bits worth.

HEH Units Reorganized Next Year

by E E Cherry

Two items concerning future H.E.H. units might be of interest to students. This summer, during the 5 week summer session, H.E.H. Witchcraft will be offered for the last time. Prof. Philbrook Smith will be teaching it this summer, so all who want to take it for either H.E.H. or VCU credit should register for Summer School. The History Department will be offering an upper level seminar entitled Witchcraft next fall as a regular History course only, and it, too, will be taught by Prof. Smith.

Next Spring the present H.E.H. unit, The Modern American Way, will be replaced by another American H.E.H. entitled The Founding of the Nation. It will emphasize the lives, times and mind-set of Americans, rich and poor, black and white, young and old, in the latter part of the 1700's, about the time of the Revolution. It will be a staff effort, including guest lecturers, drama and music productions, plus usual H.E.H. featured slide performances. It will be taught by Prof. Ralph Church, Director; E. Cherry, A. McBride, P. Heberling, and E. Kaylor. This unit may not be taken for H.E.H. credit by anyone who has already taken Modern American Way — all others are welcome.

by Henry Siedzikowski

This past week was supposed to be the deadline for this year's seniors to complete their program review. Your program review is that mystical examination, dreamed up by the Task Force on Curriculum, to replace Comps. Comps were supposed to be a type of grand finale examination, given to seniors, that would test them on everything they were supposed to learn in four years of college. Now there is program review.

No doubt, that this explanation leaves most people with confusion. But here, there is a representation of reality. Program review was so confusing to everyone that the deadline for completion was extended one week. Presumably, the extra time could be used to figure the whole thing out.

From my point of view, someone ought to give a lot of time thinking about program review, at least more than a week. Granting the desirability of some type of process by which graduating seniors can demonstrate the difference that four years of college has made in them, you still are left wondering about the value of program review.

As it happens, program review worked will for me. My advisors were mainly concerned with my ability to deal with the moral and value questions that are an integral part of my chosen vocation. They looked for my ability to define the coherence of my program of emphasis, to point out specific bits of knowledge, and to deal with methodology, but it was all in the context of my argumentative defense of my position on the moral and value questions.

To me, this is what this final examination should be like in an educational institution with Juniata's stated aims. However, the experience of a number of my fellow seniors demonstrated that this is not the typical application of program review.

Some faculty are apparently stuck on the old idea of Comps. They only want to test stored knowledge. Others want to go strictly by the five step guideline to a successful program review that we all received. And some are not sure what they want. I know of one case, where the faculty member approved the students proposal, then in the oral part, became upset because he did not feel the proposal fit the idea of program review.

You can not blame the faculty members for being confused, however. It seems everyone is. I've stated my conception of what program review should be, but this is by no means the only possibility. However, it is definitely unacceptable to have all the various interpretations floating around at once. Hopefully, by the time next year's seniors have to go through this, something definite will be done.

Juniata's Band Concert Sunday

by Laurel Crowley

Everyone in Oller Hall this Sunday, April 27, at 8:15 P.M. will be treated to a widely-diversified program presented by the Juniata College Band. Mr. Ibrook Tower will direct the band through marches, concert pieces and big band sounds.

The concert will begin with the first movement of the band classic, "Second Suite in F" by Gustav Holst. This entire work was written in 1911. The piece to be performed consists of two British folksongs woven together, "Swansea Town" and "Claudy Banks."

This will be followed by an interesting contemporary (1962) work, "Chant and Jubilo," by W. Francis McBeth. This work is in two connected, contrasting movements. The first, "Chant," is in a modal style, reminiscent of the early Christian church organum. The "Jubilo" then explodes, rejoicing in the lower brass and percussion.

The next piece on the program was written by Percy Grainger, an early Ethnomusicologist, who collected 500 British folksongs. The band will be performing two of these folksongs, "Irish Tune from County Derry" ("Danny Boy") and "Shepherd's Hey" (Morris Dance). This work is another classic for band, employing simple tunes in a poytonal setting; the music is in two keys at once.

In contrast, the following piece will be performed by a trio: Nancy Inman, flute; Janet Bechtel, cello; Esther Yu, piano. They will present Carl Maris von Weber's "Trio-Op. 63" in four movements: Allegro Moderato, Scherzo, Shepherd's Lament Presto. Weber was inspired to write this work while spending the summer at a country place in Austria, working on an opera. The piece was written with much contrast, and uses the instruments as operatic characters, rather than just as devices for thematic development.

The entire band will then return with Clifton Williams' contemporary march (1960), "The Sinfonians." This piece was commissioned by the Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia Fraternity of America (professional musicians). The song, "Hail Sinfonia", taken from a Sullivan opera and sung at fraternity meetings, is quoted in the work.

This will be followed by "March Intercollegiate" by Charles Ives. Ives wrote this before his 18th birthday to be performed at a local fair. It is typical of late 19th-century American "folk" music in march style. In this work, Ives subtly alters the rhythm of the familiar melody, "Annie Lisle" and also changes the key abruptly at the Trio.

Vincent Persichetti's "Pageant" is next on the program. Persichetti is considered one of the most interesting and important of comtemporary American composers, having written over 9 major works for bands. "Pageant" (1953) opens with a 3-note motive in the horn. This slow chordal section is followed by a lively "parade" section, introduced by the snare drum, and leading then to a lively climax. Persichetti has molded here seemingly incompatible ideas into his own unique style.

Since the band's performance during "Jumpers" there has been an increased demand for stage band music. This will be met by the two following numbers. "Where or When", Rodgers and Hart, will include Betsy Shuss as vocal soloist. Cole Porter's "It's All Right with Me" features John Wooley on trumpet.

The concert will conclude with the entire band presenting the "Rondo" movement of Robert Jager's "Third Suite." This piece opens with a five-chord introduction. Then three major themes are thrown from instrument to instrument, lightheartedly, often with a new idea interjected in the middle. There is a climatic finale based on the five notes of the introduction.

The program promises to provide a wide variety of sounds to meet every musical taste. Why not stop in and hear what the band has to offer you?!?—this Sunday night, 8:15, in Oller Hall.

World Hunger Drive Initiated

by Karl Honsacke

A group of concerned persons from the college community are organizing a CROP fast to be held May 2nd and 3rd at the Stone Church of the Brethren. The purpose of the fast is to do more than raise money to send starving people overseas (although those who wish to may find sponsors to pay them for not eating; the money will be sent to CROP). The fast will attempt to educate participants more fully to the facts concerning world hunger, and to study ways of dealing with it as individuals and communities. The fast will begin on Friday at 5:30 P.M. with a meal and will end between 6:00 and 12:00 P.M. Saturday with another simple meal. Jon Tomlinson, editor of The Reporter, a monthly periodical by NIBSCO (National Inter-religious Service Board for Consciencous Objectors) Wes Albin, the Pennsylvania CROP representative, and several local persons will be present to lead discussions, mini-classes, workshops, etc., on topics such as militarism and world hunger, third world situations, biblical and non-biblical aspects of fasting, food co-ops, organic gardening, homesteading, meditation, and nutrition. Films and filmstrips dealing with the topic of world hunger will also be shown. Those wishing to participate are invited to bring sleeping bags or blankets, if they wish to stay at the church overnight. All interested people are invited to contact either Cal Shoenberger (Box 1604) or Miriam Smith (Box 954).

away with the Christmas break, But I don't think that would be too popular.) One last advantage, the academic and athletic calendars would match.

There are some "practical" constraints against switching right away. It should be kept in mind that the three term system has not been around long as far as school calendars go. Another thing to remember is that any switch would call for more redesigning in course structures. Finally, Dr. Norris stated that too many changes at one time could have a disruptive effect. A shift in systems along with President Stauffer's leaving could have a bad result on the college.

These are the pros and cons. Now it is time for the student response. Each option has both good and bad points to them. If you are interested in seeing something done let your opinion be known. The people to contact are Carol McFate or Lewis Silver.

Sophomores Take Top Honors In Annual All Class Rituals

by Steve Townsend

By seven o'clock of All Class Nite 1975, a crowd of people had already gathered on the steps of Oller Hall. Throughout the afternoon a black market in admission tickets had been doing a flourishing business and counterfeiting of standing room passes was also proceeding on a wholesale basis. All Class Nite was the tradition among all traditions. Even the freshmen began to sense that there was far more at stake than just a trophy. It was class pride and integrity in jeopardy.

No doubt they had heard of such All Class Nite highlights as "Rock & Roll is Here to Stay" and the Sophomore debacle of two years past. They had heard how the crowd transforms itself into a single organic mass rearing up in disapproval and erupting in delight at the sight of a mamouth Pill floating down from heaven. It wasn't any wonder that the on-slaught of knowledge froze in its tracks for a single Saturday evening.

Inside Oller, Peter Lentini was doing a creditable job of keeping the mob from getting too crazy. Though most didn't understand what that box-like bellows of an instrument was all about, they sensed it was good and sporadically broke out in warm rounds of appreciative applause.

About 8:20, Pete and his accordian bowed offstage and the curtain went up for the first act of the evenings major attraction. Unfortunately for the uninitiated freshmen, no one either understood nor sensed anything good about the performance. In no time at all, the mob had cemented itself into the organic mass they had heard so much about.

"Booooooo, Booooooo!"

"This is the saddest act I've ever seen!"

"The hook! The hook!"

As the second fight scene broke out upon the stage the accordian player breathed a sigh of relief for he knew he had done no worse than fourth place.

Act Two of All Class Nite 75 was more to the liking of everyone. The sight of our favorite nemises being brutally impersonated upon the stage was just the kind fare the mob wanted to see. Norris, Lewis, Russi, Jones, Friedman, Croce, Doyle, to name a few, were all being humorously parodied by the Sophomore actors. And when Bobby Cunnion rambled across the stage in a perfectly uncanny impersonation of Dr. Lakso, the organic mass once again welled up, only this time to shadder in absolute joy.

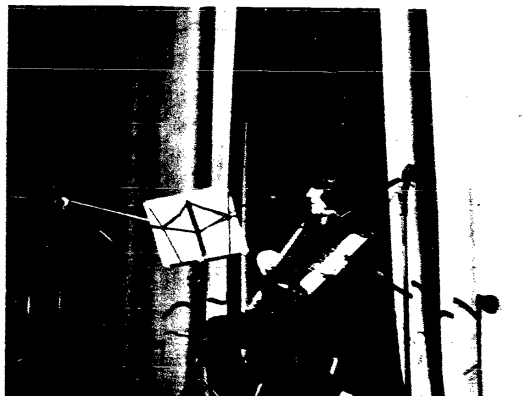
This was obviously the class to beat. In fact, If it wouldn't have been for the sour ending, it would have been a gem in the finest tradition of the Class Nite thespian endeavors. But that can be forgiven, because its inspiration, "The Towering Inferno", also sucked air. And what could be more appropriate for a theme of comedy and tragedy

The Sophomore Class was definitely a tough act to follow. Juniata's group personality was now tittering and swaying as it contemplated whether or not the Juniors had the meddle to meet the challenge. It remembered last year's blending of the best of Fred Astaire and the atomic worst of Harry Truman, but found no clues as to what was about to begin.

Happily, the juniors met the challange. Even if they weren't quite as bombastic as the Sophs, They were certainly intelligent and very entertaining. The idea of God as a stereotyped Jewish Mother was quite appropriate. And what was Moses doing alone on the Mountain for so long No matter, however, because it was down in Fairyo's desert sands that the best performances were turned in.

Mark Smallwood made one hell of a hip Moses. If there was a best actor award it would be his by a runaway. This cat was believable. Instead of bringing the crowd to its feet, he turned it on. "Yes, Moses! We are stoned!" thought the audience.

Fairyo is not to be overlooked eithero, Phil Klippert made it as queeryo, even if he was a bit tackyo. The two played off of each other well and provided a human spark to a very imaginative, Lenny Brucian production.



Peter J. Entertains the gracious mob.

It was now time for the Seniors to defend their title. As the curtain went up the upper classmen instantly realized that they were playing it safe by sticking to last years winning formula? Politics. There was Gary Gillen introducing Mark Brown, last year's Nixon, as Dr. Kiss-asser. A ripple passed through the audience, and suddenly, it was Cold Shoulder Charlie. No way were they fooling anybody. Kissinger may be a clown in his own right, but he just ain't in the same league as Nixon.

Things weren't all bad, the seniors did have their crowd pleasing moments. Geoff Clark making a tradition of falling off the stage, Larin Ritche's legs, and a few moments from the Three Stooges. But those stop action! How gauche! Crys of "Bring back Lentini" ping ponged around the auditorium.

The House lights came up as the curtain went down on the Seniors. It would be a short wait for the judges verdict. The orgainic whole of the All Class Nite audience seemed to temporarily split into those favoring the Sophs and those screaming for the Juniors.

The decision was announced that this years trophy was to belong to the Sophomores. Instantly, the two factions roared together in unanimous approval.

But what everyone couldn't understand was why hadn't the accordian player been awarded Third Place?

"To Error Is To Win?"

Last Thursday the Indian baseball team faced Bucknell at home, and despite 15 field errors, managed to win their third game of the year. The Bisons of Bucknell came into the game with high hopes, having beaten Lehigh (who had just beaten awesome Penn State) days before, and anticipating an easy win over tiny Juniata. Juniata was not to be the patsy, and startled the opposition with two first inning runs. Tommy Stratif singled freshman Mike Morgan to scoring position, and then Dave Wickerowski singled him home.

In the third inning Bucknell turned three hits into three runs, (thanks to four fielding errors) and forced the ouster of starting pitcher Dennis Henriques.

With the score 3-2 in favor of Bucknell, freshman Dick Smith was inserted to shut down Bucknell's bats. Dick responded by allowing them no runs and a solo hit, for his first Varsity pitching appearance.

Juniata went on top again in the sixth inning with the aid of a single by Barry Hartley and Dan Rhodes' timely triple. Randy Fleck's line drive to center field scored Rhodes from third base and JC led 4-3.

The see-saw game kept its rhythm in the seventh inning as well. Don Wills replaced Dick Smith at the mound for the Indians, but poor fielding by his associates allowed two runs to score via four errors. Now it was Bucknell ahead:5-4.

In the eighth inning, Juniata let in another run; but sophomore fireballer Jim Kudell came in to relieve the disgruntled Wills, and salvage the inning. Juniata managed to knot the score at 6-6, in the bottom of the eighth, and Kudell retired Bucknell in the top of the ninth.

At this point, the game rested in the hands of Juniata's batters. With one out, Wickerowski singled, and then Gary Bickle flew out. Steve 'Harper singled with two outs, and Barry Hartley was walked in order to get to left-hander Dan Rhodes. But Bucknell's strategy back-fired and Rhodes hit a sharp ball that dehorned the first baseman. Dan beat out the play and allowed "Wick" to score.

Final score: Juniata-7, Bucknell-6.

On Saturday, Juniata dropped a close 2-1 decision to Scranton, which dipped the Indians' record to 3-4.

Track Team Is Off And..!

by John Paulshock

Last Wednesday shed a bit of sunlight on the already twice beaten track team as they whalloped Dickinson; and unveiled what may prove to be a fine crop of track and field standouts. Mike Slough, a veteran, and Cal Schoenberger, a hefty freshman, led the Indians with outstanding performances on the cinders and the field events. Slough is presently the leading scorer, and remains undefeated in four meets. Two other stars include the distance men! Paul Wilson, who clipped off an impressive mile run, and Jack McCullough, who won the two mile cruise. A tally of Juniata's afternoon accomplishments is set up like this.

100 yd. dash—
Altobelli earned a second.

220 yds.—
Slough won.

440 yds.—
Slough won.
Henson earned a second.

880 yds.—
Brommer won.

Mile—
Wilson won.

2 Miles—
McCullough won.

120 yds. high hurdles—
Yarnell won.

440 yd. int. hurdles—
Nedimyer won.

440 yd. relay—
Juniata won with the team of Randy and Rick Altobelli, Jim Hail, and Mike Slough.

Pole Vault—
Dan Bousher won—13 ft.

High Jump—
Bloser won.
Preshlock earned a second.

Long Jump—
no wins.

Shot Put—
Kistler earned a second.

Discus—
Schoenberger won. 135 ft. 2 in.

Javelin—
Robin Shaen won. 192 ft. 7 in.

Triple Jump—
no wins.

Last Saturday, they were victorious again, and much to the delight of coach Rossi, Slough performed with excellance, and Schoenberger rebroke the school record, with a 147 ft. 2 in. discus toss. The team's record presently stands at two wins and two losses but there is the prospect of a strong Indian finish in M.A.C. competition.

A Little From Moore

by Gary Wayne Moore

Alas! I have found a most grievous fault within myself. I've discovered . . . . No! I can't bring myself to admitting it. I imagine that I'll have to tell you sooner or later though. I make mistakes! Not just your ordinary everyday run in the mill type; but the ones that surpass the BIG MAC. That's what I did in last weeks paper, I made a BIG MAC! In my article I stated that there were only two varsity intercollegiate sports this spring, baseball and track. Well, there are four. The other two of which are: golf, and tennis. . How I placed myself in such a position I'll never know. But I do apologize for my error, as it can be considered more than just a major oversight on my part. Again, To the coaches and players of golf, tennis — — men and women, there is no male chauvinism here — I apologize.

Courtesy of the Office of Public Information Charles Pollock Tennis— Having captured three of four decisions on their exhibition trip to North Carolina, Ernie Post's netmen came within a game of duplicating that record in their first week of regulation play. After losing to Dickinson, 6-3, in their regular-season opener, the Indians took an easy pair from Susquehanna, 9-0, and Wilkes, 8-1, before edged by Lock Haven, 5-4, on a tie-breaker game in the final set of the final doubles match. In North Carolina, they turned back Guilford, 8-1, Pfeiffer, 5-4, and Campbell, 6-3, before dropping yet another 5-4 squeaker to UNC Charlotte.

Unbeaten on the exhibition tour, number one singles man Gavin Ford (Felicity, O.), has continued untouched. He has, in fact, dropped but 15 games in four regular-season matches, winning all four matches in straight sets.

Bertram Hell, an exchange student from Strasbourg, France, is also unbeaten at second singles and Gill Landis (Hanover) is 4-0 at numbers five and six. Andy Vonderheyde (Westport, Conn.) and Mont Rice (Camp Hill) are each 2-2 at third and fourth singles, respectively. Overall the Indians are 18-6 in singles competition and 6-6 in doubles play.

The Tennis roster includes: Rob Carryer, Dave Dietrich, John Guju, Dean Patterson, Tom Phillips, Mike Sencindiver, Robb Shoaf, Gary Van Hartogh, Dave Wallin, and John Wetmore.

Golf— After dropping their opener at Scranton, 428-388, the Indians took to the winning track at Lycoming, 411-437. The Tribe did not have a man below 80 at Scranton, as junior John Shuck (Huntingdon) paced the squad at that figure. Freshman Rusty Hoover (Roaring Spring) and sophomore Jim Ludwick (Pottstown) finally dipped to 78 and 79, respectively, against the Warriors. In the latter match, junior John Nohansson (Malvern) also contributed an 81.

The golf roster includes: Mike Busch, Guy Cooper, Karl DiPietro, Rick Fields, Doug Garner, Terry Kennan, Dave Miller, Dean Miller, Thad Montgomery, Jon Muir, Terry Pohland, and John Weidenbacher.

With our four varsity intercollegiate sports this spring, we should look for a downright exciting season of athletics. .

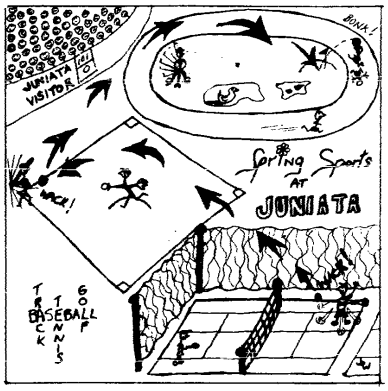
THE JUNIATIAN

Vol. XLVIII No. 19 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | May 1, 1975



A Little From Moore

by Gary Wayne Moore

It's funny how often we take people and groups for granted here at Juniata. We don't know, or care, when someone is getting the job done, but we do know, or seem to get upset, when they aren't getting the job done the way we expect or would like it to be done. This may indeed seem like a strange opening for a sports article, but believe me, it hit's "the hammer on the nail."

I talked with Andy Vonderheyde, Sunday afternoon, who is the senior captain of Juniata's Tennis Team. Andy related a few things which reafirmed my belief, in the above philosophical endeavour, and eliminated a bit of my ignorance on the dilemma of the Tennis Team.

Andy: "It bums us out when there aren't any fans here to watch us play. The only real persons who ever seem to come to the matches are the girlfriends of the guys playing. But what can we do about it? Of course we would enjoy having as large a crowd as some of the other schools we've played. I'm telling you, we've been on some away trips where there were enormous crowds watching the matches.

Of course the seating arrangement's for spectators aren't very good — I imagine that there as good as they can be though. I understand that it's difficult to keep an eye on all the matches from the position of the bleachers. It's funny, the best way to get a good view of what's happening on the court's, is to look out of the Ellis Hall Window, the side closet to the courts. It's like you were watching T.V.!

I'm not coming down on people, I'm just saying that it would be nice to see some more spectators at the matches."

Andy then spoke of the team attitude: "We've got a sort of Gung-HO! attitude this year. We have a good thing, and we're determined to make things turn out for the best for us. The lower half of the ladder is performing beautifully, this year, and looks to be able to carry the weight of next year."

Coach Ernest Post's Netters are now 5-2, after defeating Scranton on Saturday, 6-3.

Nunnie Takes Another Run!

by Greg Ransom

If anyone took the time Saturday afternoon to walk down to the track, they would have witnessed Track & Field competion at it's best. Juniata, trailing after 13 events to a very talented Marsfield State College track team, used what I term as the three D's (Determination, Dedication, and Desire) to defeat their opponets 75-68 in the closing three events.

With the Indians behind 63-68 Coach Mitchell's distance men (Paul Wilson, Jack McCullough, and Steve Hooper) proved their superiorith in the two-mile run by taking the first three positions in this event,thus, setting the stage for the Mile Relay, the last event of the day.

Clad in their sweat-suits, one could view eight men nervously

Potential But No Success

by Dave Judd

How can a team with so much potential, be having such a bad (make that rotten) season?

Well, to tell the truth its a combination of things that has been giving Bill Berrier's team an appearance surpassing even the METS of old.

When the pitching has been good, the defense has been poor. When the defense is good the tribe's offense lacks the punch needed to score runs.

A little bit earlier in the season the Indians lost 5 consecutive one run ball games. This occurence has had a definite effect on the players. When the season was fresh the team was loose. There was a lot of personal ribbing going on between the players and we seemed to be working well as a team.

Since the consecutive losses began accumulating (8) the spirit of the team has reached an all time low in my 4 years here. Many of the good hitters are faltering at the plate, then taking their depressed attitudes (caused by the depressed batting averages) out onto the field.

Even when the team has a sizeable lead, when the game progresses into the late innings the players are waiting for things to happen instead of taking command and making things happen. It is this wait and worry attitude which has the team pressing instead of playing naturally to the best of our abilities.

When people ask me, "What's wrong with the baseball team?" I usually hear myself answering — we're better than our record shows. Most of the players would agree with that statement, but I'm note sure it we really believe it any more.

We seem to have lost a chunk of our pride as a team. As soon as we regain this pride, we'll be back on the right track. When we realize that we can be winners — that we should be winners, we'll finally put it all together.

Spring Sports Clubs On The Run, With Strength

A. D. Wirt

With three different club sports operating at various levels of organization this Spring, there certainly deserves some space for a semi- up to date report on their activities.

Rugby, now in its "second season" of the school year is making great progress establishing itself as a campus activity under the leadership of the energetic and fun-loving Dr. Charles Lehrman. A new wrinkle has been added this season, however. Upholding the notion of equal opportunity for all. Charlie (as he is known by his players) initiated Juniata's first women's rugby team.

The women had their first and only game (so far) in the nation's capital city, against a team with the risqu'e name "Capital Hoopers." The "Hookers," mostly graduates and students of the University of Maryland subdued a fierce Juniata comeback try, and went on to win the game 10-8.

Both teams received nationwide exposure via an article appearing on the front page (with two pictures of Juniata ruggers) of the Washington Post Sports section of April 18th.

Suprisingly, women's rugby teams are so scarce, that the D.C. club (seven hours away) was the closest team that the lady ruggers could play. But as the Washington Post put it, "These were not ordinary ruggers. They were women, playing the sport that prides itself in being just a little less punishing than war."

It makes you wonder whether this sport is in the best interest of us males here at Juniata, doesn't it? Can we afford to bruise up what few girls we do have? Well, they're having fun, and in Rugby that's all that counts!

The Men's Rugby club has also made some changes since their fall season. As Coach Lehrman puts it:

"It became evident during our fall season that there was no field at the college that was large enough for a proper game of Rugby. In order to continue to be able to invite teams here to play, we had to find a larger area, and we turned to the borough of Huntingdon.

"With Bill Berrier's help, we were able to secure the sponsorship of the Huntingdon Community Center and, through it, permission to use the practice field at Blair Park near Stone Creek for our home games. Because of the association with the Community Center, our name was "officially" changed to the Huntingdon Rugby Club, and we invited members of the community at large to join. To date, however, no one outside the Juniata College student body has taken up the invitation, so our membership and playing roster remains composed 100% of students. Our opponents and our own members generally consider us still as the Juniata College Rugby Club.

"Since there are many rumors about the nature of our affiliation with the college and with the community, I hope this description will make everything clear and factual."

The shift of playing fields has not helped the rugger's record, as it has dipped to 2-3 overall. The A team losses came at the hands of Gaelic RFC, (based in Carlisle, Pa. and

Athletes Deserve Recognition For Outstanding Performance

by John Paulshock

Well folks, with only four weeks left in the nearly exhausted 1974-75 school year at Juniata, many people like to dream of the vacation spots they will journey to this summer, and of the pleasant three month vacation ahead. It is also a time for students to take a toll of their academic achievements over the past seasons, and prepare for their last round of final exams. However, it is that point of the year, too, when all those Juniata students who have participated in athletic competition become deserving of recognition for their accomplishments, and are to be commended for their intense devotion and sacrificed time; which helped to account for successful schedules for some of the teams. Since it is impossible to encompass each and every competitor and praise them individually, I have chosen a few stars from each sport, whom I feel have added greatly to the progress of their squads.

In the fall term, the two primary varsity men's sports included Football and Cross-Country. Rugby also was available, but as a club and student run organization. For its first year at Juniata, the turnout was impressive, and the club takes pride in its successful matches against various schools. As far as the football scene goes, I'm sure no one will argue the fact that seniors Carmen DeFrancesco and Pete Lentini, hometown buddies, served as the vital backbone on the Juniata Grid-iron. DeFrancesco played tailback, and perpetually bewildered and out-dashed opponents on the 100 yd. turf. Lentini played tight end and snagged aerial pigskins to earn all types of football honors from the national level on down; and is presently planning a try-out for the W. F.L., Phila. Bell this summer. Two freshmen, who saw a lot of varsity action this year include Q.B. Scott Magley, and Def. Back, Bob Devine.

On the cross country circuit, the Women On To MAC's

by Mardi Frye

The Juniata Women's tennis team in their second inter-collegiate, has played four of the sevenscheduled matches. They have split these first four matches with a two and two record. Both of the losses were to Frostburg State. Frostburg State defeated Juniata by the score of 4-3 and 5-2. Juniata successfully defeated Penn State-Altoona campus by the score of 7-1 and Shippensburg by the score 5-2. YES!

The team ladder is as follows: Alice Herritt, Carolyn Sutzer, Debbie Worrall, Tina Wesley, Lynne Grove, Lisa Frosell, Deb Smith, Cindy Hill, Sue Agnew, Mardi Frye, Judy Swartley, Wendy Jacabus, and Bess Gonglewski. The top six interchangeably play singles and the next four interchangeably play doubles.

The match scheduled with Susquehanna for last Thursday, which was rained out, has been rescheduled for May 12, 1975 at home. Tuesday, April 29th is the next scheduled match which is the Dickinson at home. The girls will meet

Letter to the Editor

Juniata students have long been wanting to have a big name group on campus and to have it in the gym so that a large audience could attend. Well, that came to pass last weekend and I believe that we lost our chance to ever have it happen again.

We are able to fill up Oller with people for such second rate groups as McKendrie Spring or Hall and Oats. But for Bonnie Raitt, who I believe is the biggest name we have had in a long time, a mere 200 tickets were sold here at Juniata. I can only say thank you to the Penn State audience who saved the show but didn't keep Center Board from losing more than $3000.

Bonnie Raitt definitely has to be the best show that we have had here at J.C. in my two years that I have been here. She and her band didn't have to play at ear splitting levels because they played well. You could sense it for the whole show that they really had it together and enjoyed playing to the audience.

For those who did not go because they had never heard of Bonnie Raitt, many remember that nobody had ever heard of Billy Joel But that show was a huge success. I believe that this is partially due to superior promotion of the show. I think that I can safely say, the people I knew who had never beard of Bonnie Raitt but went anyway,thoroughly enjoyed the concert.

by Henry Siedzikowski

I have spent all year writing this column dealing with such trivial subjects as the quality of the food service and the need for alterations in our thinking on academic matters. As I near the end of my career as a college journalist (no smirks, please), I would like to spend one column dealing with a very serious subject. I have now made my decision to give this week's issue that honor.

I intend to deal with a matter that is of grave concern to every Juniata student who intends to graduate. Although I am not sure of the exact cause, I am totally convinced that every Juniata senior is injected with a toxic amount of that well-known virus, "spring-fever".

For those who study such things, the senior class here would make an unbelievable case study. The level of motivation in this group has dropped to approximately zero. This may be because of the fact that most seniors are, by the springtime, secure in the knowledge that their future plans are settled. However, with the current job market and the pickiness of graduate schools, I doubt this is the case.

It has been suggested that these symptoms are merely the result of the anticipated release from the troublesome college years. This may be possible, but I must doubt the likelihood of any significant number of students enjoying the prospect of permanantly departing old Juniata.

Whatever the cause, the results are still here in front of us. Great masses of seniors can be seen all over, simply being bored to death. My great fear is that there will be permanant damage, and this syndrome might continue throughout life for these poor people.

It is my conviction that no self-respecting college can allow this to happen to its own. To control this, I suggest a "Be Nice to Seniors" week. During this time, every mem-

A Security On A Roll

by Dave Amidon

Psychologists speak to us of security in society, bankers see security in Money, investment agencies tell us there is security in securities. But when you get down to the bare facts, there is no security in all creation like that of having a big, fresh, lilac scented roll of toilet paper beside you as you respond to Mother Nature's call.

In high school, as you sit in the middle stall, trying to put off next period's test as long as possible by counting the seconds on your watch, you find security in the one friend who will not fail you: TP. Ever present, always gentle, it makes the day go smoother.

College is an experience great enough to render anyone's security insecure. But as soon as you walk into your first college dorm's facility, your fears are calmed. There, suspended on the silver bracket, is a fluffy white roll of comfort, and behind the oval seat is even a spare. In class, where BS flies here and BS flies there, you anxiously await the necessity of a trip down the hall so you can wipe the slate clean and start all over again.

The businessman's situation is even more binding. He is at his desk all say long, requisitions, referrals, references, resumes, and resignations piled on his desk. He is having trouble with gas, the pump leaks in his company car; and he is faced with the universal problem of how to brown nose the boss. With all this tension, it's no wonder the key to the executive washroom is so highly coveted. That's one bit of paperwork every desk man likes to do.

made up of townspeople and Dickinson College affiliates) by a score of 15-7, and the Frostburg State College 16-0. Juniata's B team also succumbed to Gaelic 18-0, but went on to defeat Frostburg's B team 7-0 On April 19th, the A team recorded its first victory of the Spring season, stopping Franklin and Marshall 8-3.

This past week-end Charlie Lehrman's charges were responding to a flattering invitation to play in the fourth annual Indiana University of Pennsylvania Rugby Tournament, and sent a crop of ruggers to compete in the four team event.

The tourney lasted all day Saturday and Sunday with six games to be played. Participants in addition to Juniata were Indiana Club, the Erie City Club, and Hiram College (of Ohio). Regrettably, due to a printer's deadline, we are unable to report the outcome of the contests in this issue.

The Spring team has encountered a few problems however. With so many activities on campus, practice space becomes a stumbling block, and because of individual's scheduling differences, it's often hard to have the same group of men at practice for two days straight. Many experienced players from the fall squad declined to compete, for various reasons, in the Spring season, which has forced Coach Lehrman to stick to the basics, which has obviously hampered the team somewhat.

However, the low pressure, casual approach taken towards the game keeps the "winning motive" in perspective, so these "problems" really don't turn out to be problems at all.

For a team as young as them, they have had a great deal of success, whether you look at the statistics or at the friendships generated through the game. There are few sports in which you socialize (to put it mildly) with your opponents in such a jovial manner after the contest. But then again, Rugby players pride themselves in being different.

Recently, the Hockey club held faculty dinner auctions to raise money for the club's treasury. However, few people know the outcome of their third year of competition. Herein lies the secret.

Under first year player—coach Dr. Mike Harrison, the club chalked up its first four wins in the team's history. The icemen went undefeated in the college circuit, but lost two games with "city" teams. The acquisition of many talented, young newcomers added an extra dimension to this year's club, and promises continued success in the years to come. One such rookie, is highly touted freshman goalie, Mark Casale, who with his superb performance in goal, helped his team reach their 4-2 record.

Next year things look even brighter, if the hockey league being formed becomes a reality. Possible members would be Susquehanna University, U.P.J., and Lock Haven State, t. al. A ten game schedule (at minimum) is also in the works, which would be to the delight of all involved in the sport.

Former Coach Paul Heberling will take the reins as head coach for next year, when Mike Harrison steps down for his official leave of absence.

Finances will still be a source of concern however, due to the high cost of ice rental. (80 dollars per game) Many fund raising projects have and will be energetically undertaken to help offset the club's costs. We urge you to try and support this worthy cause any way possible.

Unfortunately Dr. Fisher's young Volleyball club has been unable to schedule any more matches since their day long vigil with Bucknell's Club team, but they're still looking.

New Chair Established

by Charles R. Pollock

Dr. C. Samuel Calian, internationally known theologian and author, has been named the first J. Omar Good Visiting Distinguished Professor of Evangelical Christianity at Juniata College.

Establishment of the professorship and Dr. Calian's appointment were announced recently by Dr. John N. Stauffer, president of the college.

According to Dr. Stauffer, the new chair has been established with a bequest from the late J. Omar Good, a Juniata student in the mid-1890s. A Philadelphia printing executive, Mr. Good died in 1969 at the age of 92. His will provided $1-million for Juniata, the largest gift ever made to the college.

In addition, Mr. Good provided several smaller bequests, one of which now endows the chair. The trustees of the estate, Mr. and Mrs. Lester M. Rosenberger of Narberth, determined that a chair be established in keeping with a stipulation of the will, which required that Mr. Good's residual funds be used for "the perpetuation of the Historical Triune Faith of Protestant Christianity."

The trustees determined, further, that the chair should be established at Juniata College.

As the new position is a "visiting professorship," said Dr. Stauffer, appointments will be made from year to year with a limit of five years for any single incumbent. The occupants, he continued, will be "recognized authorities in the field of evangelical theology and its allied or related disciplines, distinguished scholars able to present and interpret systematically Biblical theology, the heritage of the Protestant trinitarian position, and the heritage of the Reformation."

The J. Omar Good Professor will teach a course each term, take part in seminars and panel discussions, and present lectures open to both the general public and college community. As far as his time permits, he will also be available for off-campus lectures.

In commenting on the establishment of the chair, Dr. Calian observed "it is a timely response to the identity crisis felt today by many Christians."

Dr. Calian is currently professor of theology at Dubuque Theological Seminary, where he has served on the faculty since 1963. Ordained by the United Presbyterian Church, he has authored six books and more than 100 articles and reviews.

Hunger Cause Share A Meal

by Jon Streich

This week begins a time in which several persons here at college are trying to develop a greater awareness among students and others for some world problems, one of which is hunger. This weekend an important event will be the fast which has been organized primarily by Andy Murray. The fast will last over 24 hours during which various "workshops", films and discussions will deal with topics related to hunger. It will be held at the Stone Church of the Brethern and a one dollar fee will cover the expenses of two simple meals that begin and end the fast. We encourage all of those who are interested to participate. Any money which is raised will go to a particular project in Kenya, Africa (CROP is the group that we are working through).

In two more weeks (May 15) there will be another important event in which more money will be raised for this project. It deals with giving up your evening meal at the cafeteria. Your meal then will be "sold" to people from the community and they will eat your meal. The price of your meal will cost two dollars, although donations of more than two dollars will be accepted. This money will be sent for the above mentioned project. Along with the meal will be a film or something similar that serves the purpose of conveying some of the problems of world food shortages, etc. If you are interested in doing this, sign up with those people around campus who are helping to organize this. If you do not know who they are, see me, Andy Murray, Hank Hallowell, Dr. Harry Klug, Beth Sollenberger, Phyllis Bradley or Glen Mitchell. Again, if you are concerned and able to get involved, great!

Student Survey Indicates Pro-Trimester Sentiment

by Bill Brooks

A somewhat controversial issue, and provocative for some, is sizzling on Juniata's hotplate. I'm making reference to the possible curriculum change reverting back to a semester system. This issue was brought into the limelight of things last week in Tom Kutz's article in the Juniatian, but one important ingredient was missing. What is the student's attitude toward this possible retrogression? In an attempt to answer this question, I've conducted a survey procuring viewpoints of various students selected randomly. In no way will I vouch for the scientific structure, procedure and application of this survey. The questions were not logically deduced, but were formulated directly from my own personal concerns. It is important to note that my presence in conducting this pool could have had an effect on the results. Hopefully, the survey is valid enough to draw some conclusions. It is my sincere hope that a faculty member whose position is hindered by the results of this survey will not attack it on its crudeness and inherent bias and ignore its implications. Each student was approached by first reading an introduction and then proceeding with the questions.

Intro: My name is Bill Brooks and I'm conducting a survey dealing with the possible curriculum change reverting back to a semester system. There is a rumor around campus that faculty sentiment favors such a change and that a semester system is inevitable in two years. The motive behind this survey is to obtain the consensus of a few students randomly picked. The semester system, as it existed in the past, consisted of two fifteen week terms with five courses each term. These courses met alternating days, three days a week. The results procured by this survey will be printed in the Juniatian. All results will remain anonymous.

Questions:

1. What is your academic status at Juniata? (Fr., So., etc..)
2. Have you personally experienced a curriculum under a semester system excluding high school?
3. Although advocates of the proposed semester system profess a work load (amount of work) comparable to the trimester curriculum, would you anticipate a/an ____work load under a semester system with five courses?
   a. lighter
   b. equivalent
   c. more burdensome
4. By convening alternating days for class, would this lapse of time between classes aid you in obtaining a more profound understanding of the material or do you feel a day to day succession of material is necessary for better comprehension?
5. Do you think it would be difficult to absorb subject matter from five classes and make some coherence out of it as compared to the present?
6. Would taking five finals at a given time be too much of a burden as compared to the present?
7. Which would be more compatible: intervening week vacations as experienced now or either a longer Christmas vacation or possibly getting out earlier in the spring?
8. Weighing all the pro's and con's would you favor the change back to a semester system?
9. Do you have any personal complaints or comments about this possible switch-over?

Results:

1. Those polled had the following class rank:

class	number	%
freshmen	17	34
sophomores	18	36
juniors	13	26
seniors	2	4

2. Experience with semester system number	%

yes	4	8

Social Economists Conduct Seminars During Visitation

by Brian Smith

Next week will bring two new faces to the Juniata campus, those of John and Alice Tepper Marlin. They will be visiting Juniata as a part of the Woodrow Wilson Visiting Fellows program of which we are a part. This is a program that helps about forty schools of Juniata's size obtain speakers and visitors that they would normally not have been able to afford. Earlier in the year we were visited by Margaret Chase Smith for a few dates and this time the Tepper Marlins will be staying from the fourth to the ninth.

John Tepper Marlin is a social economist who received his undergraduate degree from Harvard then received his M.A. and Ph.D. from Oxford and George Washington Universities. He has served in the past with the Federal Reserve Board, the Small Business Administration, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation along with several teaching experiences. Presently he teaches part time at Rutgers and is President and Executive Director of the Council on Municipal Performance. The council's job is to make comparative studies of different cities on things such as pollution and crime.

Mrs. Tepper Marlin, also a social economist, received her undergraduate degree from Wellesley College and received graduate degrees from the New York University Graduate School of Business and Finance and the Kennedy Institute at Harvard. In the past she has served as the editor of the Tax Journal for the Netherlands, a securities analyst and labor economist for Burnham and Company, a financial analyst for the Thomas O'Connell Research and Management Corporation and at that time she developed the concept of a "peace portfolio" consisting of securities of firms not heavily involved in the manufacture of military goods. Presently she is the Executive Director and founder of the Council on Economic Priorities. Other achievements of hers have included being named "Outstanding Women of the Year 1971" by Madamoiselle Magazine and being listed in Who's Who of American

Gary Wayne Moore

While sitting in my room the other day, the thought occured to me that I had never seen a literature — nor heard anyone speaking — objectively analyzing life in the slums. No. All I ever hear is gut-emotion and bleeding hearts. Therefore, to fill this gap I will attempt to weigh life in the slums against life in. . . say, middle-class suburb. I however, will be purely pragmatic. By the time you finish reading this, you may want to make a move to the slums yourself.

Our starting point will be language and education. How much money does it cost to go to college? Two, maybe three or four thousand dollars per year? And why do you go in the first place? Obviously you go to prepare yourself for the outside world. When you leave college you must think clearly, speak clearly, and show that you have some cultural background. Learning these things are of no importance to persons in the slums. They do not have to concern themselves with impressing a corporate executive for some desk job. All they need do is remain in the slums forever. By doing so, they end up saving themselves a few thousand dollers. Besides, who wants to be stuck in a concrete building from 9 to 5 each day? Get some variety; be a golf caddy, out in the fresh air and sunshine. "Everythang is everythang. And ain't nutin nutin." This language is part of everday slum life communication. Middle-class suburbia must speak properly, meeting everyone's standards for some lousy "monkey suit job. This language, suburbian, has no culture definitions whatsoever; it's borrowed from the British. Slum language on the other hand, is unique and different, coming from the pool halls, and bars with jazz filled music. Plenty of culture and originality there. By remaining in the slums, they never have to worry about meeting someone's standards.

There are some other matters directly related to the slum enviroment. Suburban people have large green lawns in the front of their homes, and beautiful flower-beds in their backyards. Slum people on the other hand have to walk as far as two or three blocks to a public park, just to see a blade of grass. But just think of all the exercise they get while walking there!

Middle-class suburbia has to worry about such things as: taking out the garbage, and installing an air conditioner for the summer. Garbage is of no problem to persons in the slums; they merely throw it out the window into the alley. In the suburbs, the garbage must be taken out at least twice a week. And the plastic bags which contain the garbage always breaks. In the slums, the windows in the homes are broken, so when summer time rolls around, they only have to take the cardboard out of the windows. Presto! Instant air conditioning! It sometimes takes as much as an hour to install an air conditioner, and something always seems to go wrong with them — more bills. Middle-class suburbia has more problems than you imagined, eh?

Now. If what I have already said has not convinced you of the advantages of slum life over the suburbs, I am sure this will. We all

Is A Mind Too Good To Waste On College Game

by Courtnaye Byron Rhone

Having always been an advocate for some type of educational reform in our country, I feel that one of the greatest faults may lie within the concept that we must give all our citizens a chance for the ultimate "college experience." In so doing, we find that the youth of this country are hurled through the educational time-machine, reaching senior year in high school with absolutely no other alternative other than spending four years in an institution of higher learning either because of parental prodding or due to the fact that a high-school degree carries absolutely no weight in so far as financially secure employment is concerned.

Indeed alternatives do exist such as vocational schools, apprenticeships, and the like, but our vocational institutions carry the stigma of maintaining society's "misfits," and our apprenticeship positions have quickly been immobilized due to our vast expansion of mechanization. Thus, we have left ourselves with what one educator has called, "college, the only game in town." Surely if this be the only game in town, I find it most time-consuming, expensive, and if frustrating for those who feel that they really would rather do something more appealing and conducive to their individual talents. Even after four years of college many find that they are not prepared for their profession due to a lack of practical experience, or they find that if they are to truly reap the benefits of a more advanced education, additional degrees must be attained. One can readily see that the efficacy of a college education today leaves many in the same predicament as having achieved a high school diploma.

Specifically, in light of our present economic situation with so many people out of work, opening up vocational technology and areas of apprenticeships would help the system in a very positive fashion. Surely mass producing intellectually-aware, book-fed college graduates, then having them dumped into the system with zero practical experience, and no more of a chance for that pie-in-the-sky security and financial stability, then when they initially entered those hallowed ivory towers, leaves not only students disenchanted, but that many more people entering the job market with absolutely zero or minimal job opportunities.

Bigger And Better BS From BR

by Brad Rudy

I was going to call this article, "My two years with the 'letter flicker' set," but, alas, I feared it would add an unnecessary note of conceit to an already self-centered article. So, I garnered all my creative resources, cogitated for an enormous span of time (about half a minute), and, ultimately, decided to let our layout artists make one up which has nothing to do with the article (as is their usual wont).

Well, now that I've wasted an entire paragraph deciding on a title, it might be in order to write an article. But, then again, I've never really explained those ridiculous clues from last week's contest. On the other hand, though, anyone who has passed Modes of Thought could probably figure them out. Of course, I don't know anyone who really passed Modes; do you?

By now, it should be plainly obvious that I'm putting off this article as long as possible. I'm a member of the school of Artsy Prevarication, whose motto, as you all well know, is "Never put in this paragraph what you can put off to the next." It's really a shame I can't put it off any more, isn't it?

What exactly has the film series accomplished in the two years I've been associated with it? Well, you upperclassmen will recall that two years ago, the film series was a combination of popular, classic, foreign, and "artsycraftsy" movies personally picked by the director of the series. Lo! It was decided, "This can not be!" We went through the normal procedures in cases such as this. We formed committees, subcommittees, and subsubcommittees. We argued, we debated, we dissented, we discussed. We consulted the Center Board by-laws; we consulted administrative advisors; we consulted the student body. We altered and reformed, until, finally, we came up with the present form: a combination of popular, classic, foreign, and "artsycraftsy" movies personally picked by the director of the series.

Okay, admittedly, we now have high-admission movies picked by the students in a twice released semibiquarterly questionairre, and we reach the student body in Juniatian articles and in termly handouts. (Termly? Why not?). So, now, you can pick some of the movies yourself which you don't want to go to, and you also can tell why you hate the movies you do see. It's what's known as progress.

Now, what have we learned this year? Well, you don't schedule ten-zillion-dollar movies like The Godfather opposite finals. You don't schedule six foreign films in a one-week span. You don't put Japanese movies on Parent's Day. Hm, what else? Oh, yes, by all means, you try to avoid throwing broken projectors and incompetent projectionists at the verbally disgrunted viewers.

Now, what little goodies are planned for next year? From the looks of things, next year's series will be run jointly by Deb Ziegler and Mike Trim, Juniata's answer to Fibber McGee and Molly, to Oscar and Felix, to Elaine May and Mike Nichols, to Paul Newman and Robert Redford. They have eight movies ordered from Warner Brothers. Unfortunately, they are all the same type of movie. Once again, we will get no variety in our movie fare. Some examples of coming attractions are Blazing Saddles, Deliverance, Hendrix, Day for Night, Mean Streets, and Fritz the Cat. It's really a shame we can't get an expanded type of schedule, isn't it? With any kind of luck, they will take up my suggestion to run the three series concurrently; that is, have a film from each series alternating week by week. This will prevent a Fellini-fiasco-type term as we experienced in the past.

In conclusion, then, I'd like to leave you with a thought—a quotation for you to ponder and cerebrate upon as you stare in befuddled amazement at the muddled and meaningless morass flickering illogically on the silver screen before you. It was uttered by that oft-quoted sage, entertainer, and all-around nice guy of old, Will Shakespeare to his friend and constant companion, the dark lady: "I don't know what they mean, either, but they sure as hell sell, don't they?" Right-O, Bill.

There is some doubt whether the fifty respones received accurately represent the whole student body. Keeping this in mind, only the most evident conclusions will be constructed. One significant feature is that very few students have experienced a semester curriculum excluding high school. Thus, these responses are mere anticipations and surmises. Question three tends to indicate that some students (52%) are apprehensive about the professor properly controlling the rate of material covered in conjunction with the extended time and the two additional courses. I was expecting stronger support for holding classes alternating days, this seems to be the greatest assest of the semester system. Then of course, there are the typical gripes about finals. The most emphatic and the most significant cry is the last. The majority of those students polled are definitely against the possible switch-over to the semester system. I received one response that was quite redundant. It seems the trimester curriculum is one of the most enticing feactures to prospective applicants of Juniata.

I hope Dr. Norris looks at these results with prudence. A significant number of people are against such a transition and a thorough investigation is warranted.

Among the books, the most recent is The Gospel According to the Wall Street Journal, published this year. Others include Grace, Guts and Goods: How to Stay Christain in an Affluent Society, Icon and Pulpit: The Protestant-Orthodox Encounter, and Berdyaev's Philosophy of Hope: A Contribution to Marxist-Christian Dialogue.

Dr. Calian's major fields of interest are reformed theology and ethics, ecumenical and contemporary religious thought, Eastern Orthodox cultures and historics, and Byzantine and Middle East studies.

A 1955 graduate of Occidental College, Dr. Calian also earned the B.D. degree from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1958. He received the doctor of theology degree magna cum laude from the University of Basel in 1962.

He has also studied at the Jung Institute of Analytical Research in Zurich, the Graduate Institute for International Studies in Geneva, the Institute for Applied Psychological Behavior in Bethel, Me., the Harvard Business School, and the Ecumenical Institute of the World Council of Churches in Bossey, Switzerland.

Dr. Calian is listed in numerous directories of American and international scholars and leaders, and has traveled and lectured extensively throughout the U.S., Europe and the Middle East. Among the many honors he has received is the Patriarchal Medal of Honor from the Patriarch Justinian of Rumania for his studies in Orthodoxy.

In doubles play, Hell and Vonderheyde and Ford and Dean Patterson are each 4-3 at first and second, respectively, while Landis and Mike Sencindiver are 4-0 at third.

It would seem to me that it would be in the best interest of our nation, and its people, if we were to spend some time looking further into alternative educational opportunities to direct, or should I say redirect, those who have potential in other areas, who see relatively little appeal and personal satisfaction in the present status of vocational training and its related training fields. We constantly hear of over-crowded professional fields and the limited job market, which seems to be a good indicator of our need to consider the long-range goals of our educational system, and its citizens of the future. Our resourses of human potential can be vastly utilized instead of stagnated by the present educational scheme. The statement, "a mind is too good to waste," carries weight that is truly beyond our human comprehansion. Let's use all of our varied human talents.

A Portrait Of America Offered In "Scarecrow"

by Zig

For those of you who are staring blankly at the person next to you, ready to ask the universal question, "What. . .a movie review NOT written by Brad Rudy??", I'd just like to ease your distressed minds. Brad is periodically spreading out some of his duties in preparation for the day in the not too distant future when Mile Trim and I will take over the helm as co-chairmen of the film series committee. So, movie-goers, never fear, for Brad will be back in his usual rare form next week.

Feeling as I do that Al Pacino is one of the finest versatile actors on the scene today, I was quite ecstatic to find three of his starring vehicles making their way to Juniata this year. We have already seen him steal the show from Brando as the corrupt Mafia chieftain in the Godfather and later as a tough cop fighting that corruption in Serpico. He returns to us with Gene Hackman at his side rather than the shaggy sheepdog that some of you liked from Serpico (right Don?), to star in Scarecrow, a highly underrated film directed by Jerry Schatzberg. Though far from a record-breaking box-office smash at the time of its release in 1973, Scarecrow remains an impressive character study that quite deservingly won top-notch honors at the Cannes Film Festival.

know the suburbs are just plain dull. (I have a good many sociologists who will support me here). There is no diversity whatsoever. Two cars in every garage, and a color television in all the homes depicts suburban life. The suburban child has no diversity in his life at all. Parents belong to the same clubs, friends live in the same neighborhood. The slum children on the other hand see something different each day. The wino's, pushers, and pimps are all out in the open street of the slums. Now wouldn't you want your child to get a chance to acquaint themselves with these interesting people? The slum child inevitably gets a more well rounded education, than the suburban child who was sent to an expensive private school.

Weigh these results rationally. Be pragmatic. I am sure you will agree, that there are many more advantages to living in the slums then in dull middle-class suburb.

Penn State-Altoona on May 8th at Altoona.

On May 2nd and 3rd the MAC'S are being held at Gettysburg College. Alice Herritt and Carolyn Sutzer are going to be competing in singles competition and Lisa Frosell along with Lynne Grove are competing in doubles. These girls will be competing against girls from seven other colleges. This is the first year for MAC'S and we all wish these four girls the best of luck.

Lion (Al Pacino) and Max (Gene Hackman) are two drifters of the open road, each going in the same but yet different directions. Lion is an ex-merchant marine who thought the sea could offer him refuge from the strangling responsibilities of a wife, kids and a 9-to-5 job. He is on his way back to Detroit to see his wife and the child she was pregnant with when he took to the sea. Max, on the other hand, has spent six years in the clink at San Quentin. Carrying with him dreams of a new business proposition (uniquely christened "Max's Car Wash"), he is trying to get to Dover to visit his sister. A barbed cynic, Max cannot take Lion on as traveling companion and prospective business partner without a few words of boastful warning —"I'm the meanest s.o.b. alive." They are hopeless opposites whose personalities somehow manage to mesh. Max is a crude, hardened man of the road who prefers a prostitute or a good brawl to Lion's simple life of casual but comedy. Pacino and Hackman manage to mesh also, bringing life and vibrance to the characters. It is their performances which shine much brighter than the film itself.

Scarecrow is a cinematic portrait of America. Using sometimes too simple metaphors (for instance, Lion freaking out in the open paw of a statue of a lion decorating a fountain in Detroit), Schatzberg's camera follows the pair of drifters around the country, recording the effects that the "just plain folks" of America have on them and more importantly, the effects that they have on each other. Scarecrow is characterization at its finest and just watching Pacino and Hackman together is well worth two hours of your time and the modest admission fee of 50¢. The film will be shown on Friday, May 2 at 8:15 in Alumni Hall.

warming-up for what would be the deciding factor in the meet's outcome. In both cases, the entries were athletes who had already given outstanding performances earlier during the day.

At the sound of the gun we saw Bob Henson, who gave an outstanding effort on the 440 yard run earlier, start the relay by taking the lead with a blistering pace and handing off to John Brommer with a sizable lead. John, who won the 880 yard run in his usual style which to the avid track fan resembles the style of the olympic Champion Dave Wottle. Rounding out the slate was Rick Nedimyer, who won the 440 yard intermediate hurdles and the anchor man, Mike Slough, Juniata's own Jim Thorpe. The Thinclads of Juniata went on to win the relay and the meet.

Monday the Indians of Juniata travel to Lewisburg, Pa. to face the always powerful Bisons of Bucknell in a Trianglar meet; Lycoming College will be the third entry. Later this week Coaches Rossi and Mitchell will take their squad to Dickinson College in Carlise, Pa.

THE JUNIATIAN

Vol. XLVIII No. 20 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | May 8, 1975

Saturday night Dick Gregory makes return visit to Juniata.

Dick Gregory To Speak On Plight of the Hungry

Famed black comedian Dick Gregory, more recently noted as "the world's foremost freelance humanitarian," will speak at Juniata College Saturday, May 10, at 8:15 P.M. in Alumni Hall.

Gregory will speak about world hunger, appearing as part of an ongoing program devoted to the issues of peace and world hunger and sponsored by the Peace and Conflict Studies program at the college. Gregory's appearance will also be sponsored by the Juniata student government and campus ministry.

According to Rev. Andy Murray, instructor in religion and campus minister, the hunger program recently entered two weeks of intensive activity. In addition to Gregory's appearance, a "meal day" is slated for May 15, when students will sell their rights to one meal to members of the Huntingdon community, with proceeds going to CROP.

CROP, says Murray, is an international non-profit organization providing emergency hunger relief and teaching agricultural and nutritional skills.

The two-week period, Murray adds, began Friday and Saturday at Huntingdon's Stone Church of the Brethren. Wes Albin, Pennsylvania CROP representative, and Jon Tomlinson, editor of The Reporter, a monthly publication of the National Inter-Religious Service Board for Conscientious Objectors, led discussions and workshops devoted to related topics during a two-day fast.

Gregory, a native of the black St. Louis ghetto, first gained fame as a night club performer and television comedian. He made his final night club appearance in 1973, having already entered "the struggle for human dignity." He is now considered a leading social satirist, recording artist, author, lecturer, actor, activist, critic, philosopher and political analyst.

The Evalution of a Juniata Student

by Steve Townsend

"I wanted peace and quiet, tranquility, but was too much aboil inside." — Ralph Ellison, Invisible Man.

It has been damn near three years since I first climbed my way up the stairs of Cloister. Those years now seem as if they were only long, very full days. But the changes, the many personnel restructurings that have built an unfinished and nebulous maturity seem like those of a century.

I have often thought to myself that if I ever had the misfortune of meeting that student of three years ago I would certainly find him obnoxious. He had little interest in his studies and worked only to save the credits for which he paid. He took great pride in holding much liquor and found collecting Marlboro butts in a large pickle jar to be admirably American. (bigger was ALWAYS better.) The social graces were merely rules to be shattered in a colorful flurry of youthful arrogance. And he even loved a girl from his home town with an innocence and impetuousness that would have done young Romeo proud. But that was three years ago.

Today I still love that same girl, but I find myself loving others too. Now, I'm no longer a walking affrontery. When I act defiantly at least I have a benign motive. I no longer embalm myself at every available opportunity and I look upon cigarettes as counter productive to every impluse that life has to offer. Even the bothersome texts become enjoyable at times.

The changes were profound. They come one after the other, continuously, never giving me a chance to cope with all that was new and all that was gone. And though they gave birth to a new, better equipped student, that birth was paid for by the death of the younger self.

Occasionally, the ghost of that younger self rises from his grave to haunt me. Some nights, just as I'm beginning to feel comfortable in my new skin, he rears up and rattles his chains leaving me cold and twisted like a wash cloth wrung damp.

Oh, I fight him alright. I grab at his hoary throat but my fingers find nothing to choke. I throw rationality at his face but he always manages to skillfully dodge it all. He refuses to be exorcised. But, with great effort, I am able to force him back into his darkness and buy time to cope. While he is gone I regroup, I think of that other me.

Why does he linger? Why must I fight a never ending battle with a deathly spectre from the past? Mostly, during these times, I make sense of little and understand even less, yet through it all, a poignant, nearly instinctive emotion crys out that all is not in vain. That behind the chaos of battle, past the meals and bile vomited up as casualties there lies a purpose and a meaning in the madness. I know that this purpose is not of my creation. Rather, it exists from without like a grand ideology which demands harsh sacrifices in a circus of personnal dialectics. And in the rare moments when I allow that wave of keen instinct to sweep me close to the Purpose, I begin to see it's shape and substance.

In the end, When my mind has soothed the scars of battle, I am to be a thinker, a master of myself. I grapple with the past today so that I may be free of its shackles tomorrow. So that my mind can leap forward free of any chains and yokes.

Maybe that end will come a year from now when I walk down the stairs of Cloister for the last time. Maybe I will walk down those stairs the thinking product of a Liberal Arts education: An education which assumes that the power within our minds must first be directed against ourselves in a personnal revolution that purges all the inner obstacles to its creative potential without.

"The Consul" Is Not An Opera

Please don't be confused with the term opera; opera sounds dull and boring; for most of us it is dull and boring. That is why the students, alumni and faculty involved in the music departments' production of Gian Carlo Menotti's The Consul are calling the production a "musical drama". Is it a cheap trick to lure students into Oller Hall on May 15th at 8:15 to pad the crowd for what may be a boring evening? No, it is not a cheap trick. The Consul is truly a musical drama, sung in the traditional operatic style.

Unlike most opera, or at least the opera we ignorant students know, The Consul is sung completely in English, hence we illiterates are able to understand it. The setting of the story is also quite understandable, perhaps even relevant; The Consul takes place in a semi-ghetto apartment and the tacky office of an unseen public official. Unlike traditional opera, The Consul is a gaudy spectacular of crooning voices immersed in gilt and gold. The Consul is a simple story about people, about the drama in their lives and the tragedy that plays havoc with their happiness. A story about people set to music — a musical drama.

by Henry Siedzikowski

The final fall of Saigon slipped quietly by last week, going virtually unnoticed on college campuses around the country. I would bet there is a large percentage of the Juniata campus community that is still not aware of that event. Still, despite this lack of recognition, I believe the event deserves some comment. It was the end of an age.

The Vietnam War provided a central focus for the student movement of the 1960's. Students had their conscience stung by the Civil Rights Movement, and they began to realize that they carried a debt to society for their education. Opposition to a useless war was the vehicle that united masses of students and stimulated their involvement in social issues.

It was not possible to sustain the fervor of that decade. The 1970's have seen a quieting on college campuses. Political comment is the exception rather than the rule now. But while this era has ended, we should not forget that it provided the background for our adolescent years, in many ways shaping our generation as it stands today.

We have probably seen the end of blind patriotism on the mass level. Our parents confirm the history books story of the flock of volunteers in World War II. I remember my freshmen year; the day the lottery numbers were drawn for the draft. There was no patriotic thrill, but rather a somber discussion on whether anyone would seriously try to avoid induction if their number was too low. It was not a loss of national pride, but a lack of indentification with what the country was doing. This identification may never be totally regained.

This period also taught us that authority is not unchallengable. Despite numerous frustrations, we have gained a certain confidence in our ability to create change. I do not buy the argument that today's college students are apathetic because of the lack of political interests. I believe that they have merely changed their focus to more personally oriented goals. They are demanding improvements in their colleges, and they are looking skeptically at a society that does not appear able to support them.

South Vietnam is just a small Asian country. With the current international nuclear capabilities, it has little strategic importance. But the United States made the mistake of fighting a war there. The entire country, but particularly our generation, was touched in some way by that mistake. As college students, the future leaders of our society, we have a responsibility to stop and consider the effects of this period, so that this lesson, paid for with countless lives, will not be lost. Now, in the aftermath of the fall of Saigon, may be the most appropriate time.

The Tepper Marlin's share an informal moment with J.C. students.

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the Editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatian. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name. It is also requested that all letters be double spaced with 70 spaces per line.

My students and I have been concerned to learn of the large numbers of glasses and other utensils which have been taken from the cafeteria this year, and we have set up a project which we hope will add to the quality of campus life and make meal time more interesting.

Several of us came up with the idea of making individually handcrafted cups for the cafeteria, from clay, each one unique and well-made. Students passing through the lines would then have a choice between drinking from a mass-produced glass or from a cup made by a fellow student. Evan Jones, Mark Vanleys, Jim Charonko, Gail Lynham, Holly Hennes, Mary Beth Campbell, Elaine Keithan, Janice Dunbar and I, along with several others, worked to produce one hundred and fifty-nine cups which would fit into the racks for the College dishwashers and would hold approximately eight ounces of fluid. It is very hard work, but the idea of sharing our work with others at mealtime seemed to make it worthwhile for us. Evan Jones made more cups than anyone else. It is my hope that this project can continue each year, so that eventually the percentage of hand-made cups to mass-produced ones will be about 50-50.

We are asking that all who choose to drink from our cups will participate in our good will by leaving them in the cafeteria so that others can use them in the future.

Sincerely,
Jack Troy

I'm writing to apologize for not getting an article in to you this week. Guess I just couldn't find a topic. Same story—nothing ever happens at old J.C.

I thought I'd try complaining about something here at school. That's always a popular thing to do. We would have had a lot of full page ads this past year if we hadn't had those gripe article to print. Sometimes I think that's how things stay together here. Even had an "all college bitch day" this winter. Things are always so bad, always something to fuss about. Here I am, complaining about the complaints.

I guess some good does come out of it though — all that bitching I mean. If students in the '60's hadn't said something about freedom in their education, there might not have been programs like Juniata's in the '70's. Of course now I'm told that they just changed the manes and duped us into the same old stuff (more complaining). But like I said, gripes can be effective. They can get things changed.

I think we should know what we are complaining about though. I mentioned that some people say we are getting the same old thing (educationwise, that is). But then they say we should do away with things like S/U grades and start honor rolls (honor rolls— sounds like high school). There's even talk about going back to those good old semesters. Now to me that does sound like the "same old thing". Maybe we'll even have freshmen declared majors before they start their first year, that would be a big change — a gig shame (that's my value judgement). Freshman beanies and majors— just like when grandpa went to school (if he went).

Well, I warned you, I didn't have a topic— that's why I wrote this letter. Hope you're not too bummed out. You can complain to me if you like— might move me to write an article.

The Consul

The students in the production feel they are trying to convey a message to the audience through their music. At a rehearsal last week Wendy Hackman, a Consul cast member, discussed the message she is trying to convey. Wendy feels that there is relevancy in The Consul, perhaps even urgency; a need to make people aware of life and our inability to combat fate. The other students in The Consul, Betsy Shuss, Bob Barth, Denise Sheppard, Dave Amidon, Tom James and Roy Donkin, are also conveying messages to the audience. To find those out you will have to see The Consul on May 15th at 8:15 in Oller Hall. It is an experience to be shared by is all.

Editorial

by Gary Gillen

The time finally has rolled around for me to write another editorial, one of the few written this year and as a matter of fact my last. I guess when one resigns his position it is proper or permissable to look back and compare the accomplishments with the things we failed to do. In all, I can say I am pleased with what we have done and would hope that the Juniatian can now grow and realize the potential it has, that of the communication link not only between students, but students and administration and hopefully alumni.

This year while few "editorials" were written I feel the paper served not only by reporting events and giving the news of the college but also was a means for students to present their dissatisfaction and feelings about the college community. While the opinions were not shared by all, the Juniatian served a useful function in that it allowed this inter tension to be brought to light and hopefully worked to a solution. While the paper failed in many respects to report all the news as it happened, it attempted to represent the students and be an expression of student opinion. Hopefully next year the paper will be able to function even more effectively as a forum for communication.

The year has been one of personal satisfaction to me and I must thank all those who worked throughout the year to make the Juniatian what we feel was a success. This year the staff was able to work together and develop a spirit of unity and purpose that grew from week to week. For this and the close relationships I was to develop I have to be thankful. I can only hope that next years editor and staff will be able to find this same close knit relationship and work as a team to serve the community.

In closing I would like to wish Ralph Whetstone, next years editor, much luck and success in the coming year and hope that he will find the same personal satisfaction that I was to find as editor.

A note to Brad Rudy:

Last week's headline "more BS from BR" was not meant as a commentary on the article. The headline was merely "compliments of the lay-out staff."

Cordova Trust Established To Manage Family Affairs

by Chip Lovett

Juniata junior Steve Cordova lost his mother and two sisters in a tragic fire last November, a fire which destroyed the Cordova home located in Altoona.

Ther was a Cordova Fund established for Steve and his family. This article gives information about the fund which people might not be aware of.

A Trust Fund known as the Cordova Fund has been established with the Union National Bank, Huntingdon, Pa., as the trustee of the Fund. As members of the Juniata community, our concern for Steve and his family is both immediate and long range. We have already responded to the immediate.

An advisary Committee to the trustee of the Cordova Fund has been appointed. Persons to serve in this capacity are Stephen Cordova, the President of Student Government, and the Director of Development of Juniata College.

The intent of the Fund is to: a) provide Steve Cordova and his family with a quarterly income from the fund to meet normally routine expenses of managing family affairs and b) provide Steve Cordova and his family with an emergency source of financial support should such a situation arise. The Cordova family, with the approval of the fund trustee and the advisory committee, may utilize all or part of the principle of the fund depending upon the extent of the need and the emergancy.

Now we have established the fund in the amount of $3,000 which will be placed in the trust. The fund's duration will be from the time of the establishment of the fund until the youngest member of the Cordova family reaches her eighteenth birthday at which time the principle will be distributed equally to all members of the immediate family or until such time as the fund is depleted for emergancy reasons.

The names of the Cordova children are:
W. Stephen Cordova — 21
Pamela J. Frazier — 18
Paula J. Frazier — 18
Gina L. Frazier — 17
Priscella J. Frazier — 16
Delores L. Frazier — 15
Amy J. Irby — 6

"What JC Students Don't Know"

by Perry Habecker

Remember the ecology quiz two weeks ago? Out of 800 plus copies in circulation I received a whole ONE response. Well, perhaps no one took it seriously because of the tongue-in-cheek approach. Believe me, there was a serious message. The humor was there to make you look for it. Serious intentions infortunately produce mediocre results around here all too often. This applies to me, too. I mean, it I were really serious, I'd be out rustling up some young trees and planting them (right?), instead of wasting time sitting on my duff writing banal articles which only my friends read. Apathy is certainly less fatiguing than involvement.

Here are the answers to the quiss, which wveryone has been eagerly awaiting: Sherwood Grove was never really a forest during the college's lifetime. The American elm (or white elm) is scientifically known as Ulmus americana. The host specific bacteria which gives the trees the rot is named Certocytis ulmi. Rottus stumpus is this author's contrived name for a group of degradative fungi and bacteria— too bad they work so slowly.

The number of elm trees that have been felled during the past 15 years is at least 92. (I did indeed count the stumps from Swigart to East Houses and checked the age of several.) The age of 40 recent stumps is between 3 months to 3 years old. There were two distinct age groups; thees planted 60-65 years ago, and another group planted about 40 years ago. To be sure, it'll be a long time before we'll see trees in that area of a comparable size. This assumes that the remaining trees are doomed, and I believe they are. Perhaps the only redeeming value of the whole situation is that the college can now cheaply panel Founders or make some quick profit on the sale of the wood.

Whether or not birds need trees in which to rest, this I do not know. Most automobile owners will tell you that birds do seem to be more relaxed when perched in the tree directly above their vehicle. The poem "Trees" is attributable to Joyce Kilmer. This man was killed during World War I, thus saving the world from more mawkish poetry.

Are there plans to relandscape the campus? I tried to find the answer once and was told to wait for an official announcement. Others have hinted at grandiose plans for the future. But as long as plans remain unannounced, the planners and the institution will have no compunction over scrapping any ideas. That there is no official decree intimates a lockadaisical attitude or dissolution of responsibility to correct an obvious defeat of this campus. Maybe we need to cancel classes for a day to devote our awareness to the tree problem.

A Hatful Of Rain

by Brad Rudy

Good Evening, Ladies and Gentlemen. Be prepared for a sickening semblance of spontaneous erudition. I have never seen A Hatful of Rain, and it has been so long since I've read the play on which it is based, that I forget anything about it which could prove of any value to this article. So, the following thesis will contain not an original idea, opinion, or thought, being nought but a plagiarized compilation of the wit and wisdom of Time, Newsweek, Commonweal, and The New Yorker.

What I can gather about the plot is this: Don Murray plays a shot-up Korean veteran. He was put on morphine in a medicinal capacity, a treatment which, to say the least, lingers. His pregnant wife (Eve Marie Saint) does not know about his habit, and, naturally, she interprets his nocturnal scoring excursions as extramarital social indiscretions. Our friendly junkie has an older brother (Anthony Franciosa), an easy-going being who is footing the bill for said habit, being bankrupt, somewhat disgruntled, and attracted to his sister-in-law in the process. Suddenly the father of Mssrs. Murray and Franciosa appears, causing all sorts of fun and excitement. (The father is, by the way, played by Lloyd Nolan.)

Okay, now, what inferences can we draw from the various critical articles profoundly writ on said flick? Well, Time says that it "scraps this breed of opiated logic (that found in two earlier drug-oriented films) in favor of cold-turkey realism." (Isn't that what they said about Best Years of Our Lives?) Commonweal says that it is "a forceful challenge to Italy's Neo-realism," a comment which is absolutely meaningless, unless, of course, you've been absorbing your Rossellini and De Sica (which, I'm sure, includes most of you). Newsweek says that it's important because of its "believable presentation of the secondary effects, on the man's total situation, on his family life." Now, what does all this mean? Are we in for a highly dramatic and effective nugget of cinematic force? Or are we going to have to sit through 107 minutes of stilted, dated hoke? Are we going to be blessed with a handful of vibrant, sensitive performances? Or are we going to see the same old hamminess evident in films of the fifties? Who knows? Who cares? What does all this mean? Is there life in Chicago? Buddy, can you spare us two bits admission? For the answers to these, (and various other inquiries of questionable import) come see Micheal V. Gazzo's A Hatful of Rain, directed by Fred Zinneman. We'll try to show it to you Friday night (that should be tomorrow) at 8:15 P.M. in Alumni Hall. Okay?

1974, Gregory fasted to protest hostilities in Indochina, consuming only liquids. A pacifist and vegetarian, he still maintains several fast-like diets, ranging from a fruits and raw vegetables version to an "air diet" of nothing at all, on which he lives for a week or two at a time.

During the civil rights movement of the 1960's, he participated in every major demonstration and twice served 45 days in jail. He also devoted much time to benefit performances for peace and civil rights groups. He is currently involved in extensive research concerning the assasination of John F. Kennedy.

Gregory's involvement, it is said, has cost him more than $1 million in cancelled bookings, travel expenses and legal fees. In 1967, he ran as a write-in candidate for mayor of Chicago, and the following year he ran as a write-in for president.

Appearing on numerous record albums, Gregory has also authored eight books, including his best-selling autobiography, "Nigger." He has received honorary doctoral degrees from Lincoln University and Malcolm X University in Chicago, and ranks as one of the most sought-after speakers on American college campuses.

The Big Storage Rip-Off It Can Happen To You

by Suzi Baker

As another year draws to a close, thoughts turn to summer and going home. I suppose one of the biggest panics is trying to decide what to do with the mountain of junk you've accumulated over the year. One of the most obvious solutions outside of burning, bombing or bartering it is to store it somewhere. If, however, your junk includes refrigerators and furniture, you won't be able to store it on campus because of fire regulations. Maybe, if all else fails, you would consider a professional storage company. Think twice! I think it is my duty to inform and warn you about the pitfalls of storage. It is very easy to get ripped off. I know, because I was.

—Do not make arrangements by phone. Go to the office and be sure to get estimates in writing.

—Find out what the "nominal fee" for pick-up is beforehand. We were charged $33.00 just to have the stuff picked up.

—If you only have a few items —specify that it is a one-man job.

—We were sent and charged for three men to pick up three items.

—Never sign anything that you have not read carefully. What you may think is verification of picking up the items could be a blank bill.

—Never sign a bill that isn't fully itemized and totalled and be sure to keep your copy.

—Find out ahead of time if there will be a charge for getting your things out of storage.

—When your goods are returned check for damages not noted on your copy of the bill. If there are damages, file a claim! You have a right to be compensated for it.

—If you are ripped off don't rely on the Better Business Bureau. This organization tends to be "hand in glove" with business. Take your claim either to the State Attorney General's branch of Consumer Affairs or better yet, to Small Claims Court. This is a unique institution that very few people know anything about. There are no lawyers or complicated procedures. You simply file your complaint at the Courthouse. When your case is called you appear before a judge and simply tell him what happened. If you have a valid case the company will be required to compensate for the amount you were ripped off.

Some time in your life you will probably need to use a professional storage and moving company. You may feel you're too sharp to get ripped off. Don't kid yourself. Keep these points in mind. It can happen to anyone.

Study of Historic Peace Churches

"Friends and Brothers," a unit of studies in historic Peace Churches, will be added next year to the Peace and Conflict Studies program at Juniata College.

According to George T. Dolnikowski, associate professor of Russian and German and coordinator of the "Friends and Brothers" unit, the course will deal primarily with the history, beliefs and practices of the Church of the Brethren and the Mennonite and Quaker Churches, with emphasis placed on pacifism, Pietism, Nonconformism and other distinctive characteristics.

In addition, says Dolnikowski, the history of Juniata will be studied in the light of the college's Brethren heritage, giving the unit "a more specific character." Juniata, which celebrates its centennial anniversary next year, was founded in 1876 by several members of the Church of the Brethren.

The course will be offered for the spring term and the class will meet two evenings per week. In addition to traditional lectures, reading, discussions and reports, however, the unit will feature experiential learning, including involvement in social work, visitation teams, Sunday School teaching, and individual ministry.

Field trips and interviews will also be featured, taking students to Germantown, Ephrata and Windsor. Including Dolnikowski, four members of the Juniata faculty will team-teach the course: Dr. Earl C. Kaylor, Charles A. Dana, Professor of Religion and History; Dr. Robert E. Wagoner, professor of philosophy and assistant academic dean; and Rev. M. Andrew Murray, instructor in religion and campus minister.

"Friends and Brothers" will be the sixth course offered in the Peace and Conflict Studies program, which also includes periodic seminars, panel discussions and special lectures. According to Dr. Klaus Kipphan, associate professor of history and director of the program, the program explores the causes and consequences of human conflict as well as methods of conflict resolutions.

Don't jump yet, it's almost graduation.

Ice Hockey Underrated

by John Paulshock

Stanley Cup playoff time is rapidly nearing and all ice fans' eyes will be focused on the tubes around campus as they eagerly await their favorite teams to win honors. At Juniata though, the young future champs have shined their blades and packed skates, gloves, sticks, and other necessary garb; and have the memories of the 1974-75 competitions tucked away in their minds.

This past season was an enlightening one, and a winning attitude quickly surfaced after the team played their first game together and proceeded to glide by Susquehanna with a most impressive 11-3 victory. This gave Juniata it's first hockey win in the organizations three year history. Other victories included the defeat of Lock Haven 8-7, and repeat victories over these same two schools. The young pucksters managed to uphold this winning trend while dropping only two disheartening losses to Johnstown and Penn State hockey clubs.

On the ice, the Indians were led by a potent sharpshooter, freshman Vince Sarni, who ripped 12 goals into the oppositions' nets, and was present for 6 assists. Coach Mike Harrison shared second honors with 6 goals and 9 assists; Backed by freshman Don Plummer's 7 goals and 4 assists, Mard Casale filled the spot in the J.C. net, and allowed only 37 goals to tickle the twine behine him in six games. This is misleading, because fourteen of these goals were scored by Johnstown during a game in which Mark was a victim of the flu.

Seasonal statistics of scoring:

Name	Goals	Assists	Points
Sarni	12	6	18
Harrison	6	9	15
Plummer	7	4	11
Hager	4	4	8
Baucher	4	3	7
Nathan	3	3	6
Bloss	0	6	6
Rodgers	1	2	3
Crane	1	1	2
Saltzer	0	2	2
"Battleship"	0	1	1
Buckwalter	1	1	2
Overly	1	1	3

The future of this club is most promising (Champagne corks could be a-poppin') as three of the top four scorers are freshmen, and only two seniors will be leaving. Right now, however, the team's funds are almost non-existent, and they must appropriate sufficient cash to assure another season. Hopefully there will also be a much more diversified schedule allowing the squad to play all winter. Whatever the outcome, congratulations are in order for these devoted athletes.

Athletes Deserve Recognition For Outstanding Performance

In the gymnasium this winter, the Indians sported tribes of basketball players, wrestlers, and squaw "B-ball." On the courts, Juniata was led by none other than the infamous Donnie Williams, who earned school honors, and M.A.C. recognitio; but is no longer a part of the Juniata community. Another cager who performed with superiority is the "Tyrone terror", Bill Bickle, whose style of play was superb as well as entertaining.

On the mats, the leading musclemen included Steve Denison, a 126 lb. freshman (also a deserter of J.C.(, Mark Brown, the lone senior of the squad, and hvywt., Chick Simmons, who will return as a junior. The team's victories were few, however, there is an entirely veteran tribe returning next year. The girls' basketball squad compiled a seasonal tally of seven wins and three losses and was powered by sophomore sharp-shooter Mardi Frye and Freshman ball nabber Beth Woodworth.

Springtime sports are still being carried on, but there are already a few athletes entering the spotlights in the fields of track, tennis, baseball and golf. Spring is perhaps the most pleasant seaso at J.C., and four varsity sports allow for the student body to enjoy it as they choose.

On the "diamond" the Indians have a roster stacked with veterans and talented new-comers. After a 7-6 win over Bucknell, the sluggers have the prospect of a fine finish behind the bats and arms of Barry Hartley, Dan Rhodes, Dave Wickerowski, and Dick Smith.

On the cinders, cross-country runners Wilson and McCullough set the pace for distance runs, and Mike Slough takes complete control over the 220 and 440; as well as serving as anchor-man on the 440 relay team. Freshman Cal Schoenberger was J.C.'s sole representative in the Penn Relays last Saturday, and presently holds the school record in the discus.

On the courts, the leading racketmen include underfeated Gaven Ford, playing the number one slot, and Bertram Hell slamming serves at numero two on the ladder. Finally on the 18 hole contests, we are represented by such drivers as junior John Shuck, freshman Rusty Hoover, and sophomore Jim Ludwick.

Special thanks should also be extended to the cheerleaders for their unceasing loyalty; and also to the coaches of these sports who aim to make Juniata a big name in M.A.C. athletic competition.

This is a continuation of an article from last week.

Bill Bickel, an athlete most worthy of recognition.

Dick Gregory - What Is Believable?

by Rob Lopresti

On Saturday night we were privileged to have Dick Gregory speak in Alumni Hall. Since many students were not able to attend his lecture I have tried to list some of the most interesting subjects covered in his informative speech. I have tried to stick to things he presented as facts and avoid matters he identified clearly as opinions or jokes. Here is my partial summary:

—The gasoline and sugar crisises were both frauds. Also, the generally high prices of food are artificially controlled.

—India produces enough food to feed itself, but 60% is destroyed by rodents.

—The Arab countries do what the oil countries tell them to. King Faisal didn't and was killed for that reason.

—John F. Kennedy was having an affair with Marilyn Monroe and had her killed because she was talking.

—All the Presidents involved have made money off Viet Nam. Ford asked for a billion dollars in aid a week before Saigon fell because this was his last chance to make a buck off it.

—Howard Hunt, Frank Sturgis, and Jack Rudy were all involved in gun-running to Castro while he was still in the hills.

—James McCord, a Watergate bugger, was a CIA agent.

—The pictures of Arthur Bremer at Wallace rallies usually show G. Gordon Liddy next to him.

—Lee Oswald was on the FBI and CIA payrolls, but was not the assassin of President Kennedy.

—The police call to arrest Oswald went out before Kennedy was shot.

—The CIA is responsible for the deaths of John and Robert Kennedy, Malcom X, Martin Luther King, Lyndon Baines Johnson, Hale Boggs, Mrs. Howard Hunt, and J. Edgar Hoover.

—The first time the CIA spied on Dick Gregory in a hotel room they put the one-way mirror in backwards.

—On his run from Chicago to Washington, D.C. there were two attempts on Gregory's life.

—The Symbionese Liberation Army had all been in a prison that specialized in behavior modification.

—Donald DeFreeze (of the SLA) was an undercover policeman for five years.

—The FBI has Patty Hearst.

—Aura photography and machines attached to growing plants are more accurate than traditional lie detector methods.

—The Nicaraguan earthquake was man-made.

—Color televisions take pictures of those watching them.

—There are creatures from outer space living on earth.

If I may make one brief comment: The problem with a comedian turn-en to lecturing is much like that of the shepherd who cried wolf; its hard to know how much one can believe.

Dialogue On Dick Gregory — The Students' Point of View

by Jon Streich and Mile Busch

Saturday night, May 10, we attended Dick Gregory's speech on the politics of world hunger among other things. His speech was quite informative, interesting and certainly controversial. We'd like to discuss some of his ideas in the following dialogue.

MIKE: "You said that Gregory talked more about politics than he did about hunger.

JON: "No I didn't. What I meant is that although he did try to get us to comprehend how much hunger is related to politics, I feel that he spent much time talking about issues no necessarily related.

MIKE: "He was trying to impress upon us how politics controles so much of our lives.

JON: "Yes. Some of the things he said, though, appear to be doubtful; for example, how can you believe that the National Guard is training for food riots, in some places? Do you buy what he said?

MIKE: "He pointed out that 67% of the food in the U.S. is controlled by the top four food conglomerate industries. I believe what he says but even if it isn't true it's something to think about. If the National Guard is anticipating food riots, wouldn't it seem logical that these industries have something to do with it?

JON: "Seems feasible. What about the news clipping he read concerning the real problem of food shortage in India, that the rodents and birds, etc. are consuming the grain, and that our politics overlooks this problem and blames it(hunger) on population?

MIKE: "I was not aware of that situation, as I was always under the impression that we were giving them food aid because they didn't produce enough. Maybe the reason for my lack of awareness is due to the possibility that the news media has not released all the information.

JON: "Well the classic example of our not knowing was the bombing of Cambodia for two years without knowing about it. Gregory implies that the news media did cover it, but did not release it. This brings up the question, is the news responsible to the people, or more responsible to the few who own it? Sort of reminds me of the Pravda! (Soviet paper. . .)

MIKE: "It seems ironic that President Ford would want to send so much aid to Cambodia when we knew that the situation for victory was hopeless. In a time when so many of us are having trouble paying for our education, Gregory suggested that we move Juniata College to Cambodia so that we may receive foreign aid. Another thing that Gregory mentioned that bothered me concerned Ford's recent speech in Boston, Massachusetts—

JON: "Yes. . .a bicentennial speech where he didn't mention one thing about the American Indian, but talked about Viet Nam three times. no less! What perhaps highlighted the things Gregory said, in my mind, is the issue of raising our society's level of conscience. Although what he said can perhaps be questioned on certain grounds, the importance to me is that we ought to check out these things, and do something about them, like, for example, fasting or whatever.

MIKE: "We can use our moral force, as he put it, to raise this level of conscience. For example, the fast he organized in Washington, D.C., that apparently had some affect upon the Government to send additional foreign relief aid.

JON: "I wish more people had come to hear Gregory. . .so many things to think about. What are we going to do now? Sit around. . .?

MIKE: "All I want to say is that I hope that Gregory is around long enough to make more people awarw of what's going on.

Reflections Of A Senior- A Guinea Pig Graduate

by Courtnaye Byron Rhone

This is my last article to be published in the Juniatian and I've appreciated having my works in the paper. Indeed to access four years of undergraduate education at Juniata College in a nutshell is virtually impossible, at least for me. I could quickly list columns of adjectives modifying my college experience as exciting, arduous, fun. . .from A-Z eliminating the words expensive and difficult, and coming up with an explicit analysis of the life and times of a college student's experience in the 70's.

As I look back over the past four years and evaluate the new curriculum (of which my class had the pleasure of being the guinea pigs) and constructively evaluating the goals of Juniata College, I feel the school has lived up to its characterization of being a liberal arts institution. Indeed the opportunities are here to expand and appreciate all facets of educational disciplines. Having participated in all three divisions, the only thing I would change if I had it to do again would be more time; time to dabble into the various and sundry areas that intrigue me such as literature and the arts. Of course time will always pose somewhat of a lingering problem, since it does not seem to want to wait for any man. Hopefully it'll never be a major stumbling block.

The infamous program review that most seniors fretted and complained about is now suddenly in the past, and we have breathed a final sigh of relief. Many of us have waited impatiently to hear from graduate schools, professional schools or a particular career opportunity to see what's awaiting us in the near future. Senior year tends to be somewhat of a frustrating time for many, but before it's all over things begin to unfold and you can "see it all now".

For fear of sounding the least bit melodramatic I only wish to say that it has been great here at Juniata, and I wouldn't have given up this experience for anything in the world. I'll miss a lot of people, and good friends that have shared thoughts and dreams with me as we anticipated our futures, and contemplated our existence. As I leave for graduate school in Fort Wayne, Indiana, in September, I will probably look in retrospect at all the good times during undergraduate school. If these four years have not been the best years of my life, they will certainly rank extremely high

The Trauma: Social Problems Of The Aliens, The Ebony Effigy With Roots

I could hear my own heart; pulsating as loudly and beating as frantically as the hunter's drums in Africa, signaling the kill of that mighty beast who would give him a warrior's pride. My skin was taut; clinging so tenaciously to my bones and organs that I could swear I would die from suffication or claustrophobia. My brain was all too nonexistent; a black void made up that part in my skull which that nonexistent matter had at one time inhabited. My cold blood, stinging my veins, seemed to rush as wildly as Niagra Falls. The voices in the room, hundreds of millions, buzzed ceaselessly all about me and I soon found myself dripping with a lukewarm sweat from desperately trying to swat the voices with my hand-as if they were only extremely annoying flies. Each fiber in my body ached from its hypersensitivity. The voices in the room, buzzing on, made me begin to acknowledge that I was some kind of alien who would never be able to interpret these person's discourse into thoughts — or them mine. I thought I would cry. But paradoxically. . . . No! ironically, I began to laugh. (The persons believed me to be laughing at their jokes). Because I knew that I would face this trauma, or circumstance again, as I always have.

The trauma? Some call it a social problem, or one of pigmentation. Others might see it as self-fulfilling prophecy — it happens because you believe that it will. Why is it, at times, when I might be in a room filled with whites, that I can feel each strand of hair on my body, tugging at my skin? Or how is it that your speech, at times, never reaches or registers in my brain?

I am alien. I am an ebony effigy from a galaxy too distant, supposedly, and much too unearthly for you to accept and comprehend. We have difficulty communicating, save on the most simplistic level, not out of want, but fear. And because I am an. . .effigy, an alien, you cannot hope but to acknowledge my presence. You talk at me, or to me, but not with me. My intellect appears as being so unlike yours that you refuse to reveal the passions and desires which motivate you. You fear that my heart and mind could only see these passions and desires, in a sphere that could do nothing but misinterpret them.

Do not fear this . . . effigy, nor see me as one. Perhaps I am the weed in a garden of dandelions. But we grow from the same soil. Yes! I too have roots; roots which are wilting because you refuse to quench the thirst of the ground which I am part of; roots desperately trying to show that the shackles which I've born, or now bare, can only allow me a more deeper understanding of you, but certainly not less. Do not alienate me from you much longer. The sun shines on me, and I may yet evolve into. . .?

I am not an alien! I was brought here on a ship of your own making; and transplanted in the very ground which now gives both of us life. But I am alienated! Talk with me and find that my roots are not unlike yours but a part of nature, as yours. Look at this ebony figure and understand.

Yes, understand! That the sun shines it's rays on me, ever so often. That the trauma's I experience are a result of small, uncompromising

Letter to the Editor

Last Saturday Juniata was visited by Dick Gregory, one of the finest speakers I have ever heard. Whether you agree with Mr. Gregory's theories or political views is irrelevent. The point is that he is an influential and controversial social activist and anyone who missed his appearance missed an intellectually stimulating experience of high degree.

The conciousness raising aspect of Mr. Gregory's speech is an example of the advantages of a liberal arts education we are constantly being told about. Alumni Hall was packe for the speech and I am sure that nobody there regretted giving up two hours of their Saturday night to attend. Significantly absent however were the so-called leaders of our so-called liberal arts college community, the college president and the provost for example. Faculty attendance was also sparse, largely limited to those with specialized "un-liberal arts" interest in the subject, i.e., members of the Sociology and Political Science departments.

Of course the missing members of the administration and faculty must have valid reasons for not being able to attend (who ever heard of leadership apathy, only students are apathetic), however until these reasons are aired many students may be forced to think that they are paying good money for an education from an apathetic and/or hypocritical leadership.

Jon Southard

P.S. I apologize in advance to Dr. Stauffer and Dr. Norris if they did attend and I failed to see them.

That's Ambivalence- We Feel It Too!

by Steve Townsend

Lance takes a deep drag on his reefer and thinks how good it feels to be this way on a Tuesday night. With four years of College behind him he deserved it. Graduation was only two weeks away and there wasn't NO way he could blow it now. Laughing inwardly, Lance pops three perfect smoke rings from his throat.

Intrigued by their flight, Lance falls under a hypnotic cloud of fascination. He notices how beautiful the rings were as they grew even larger yet he felt a note of sadness. He knew that the very motion that gave them their beauty also doomed them into nothingness. The seeds of beauty are the seed of death.

As the third ring drifted out toward it's inevitable end, Lance thought that he would make it stay. He would not let its pretty fascination whisp away. Lance closed his eyes and made the ring float, but he would not let it disappear. The ring floated through Lance's mind for what seemed like hours. Slowly, however, he became aware that he could no longer invision it's boundries. It had grown too large. "Larger than all my mind", Lance thought. "I've made my ring surround me."

With that he became aware of other persons within his great ring. Thousands of other persons. In fact, there was a great crowd Oooing and swaying with the notions of a speaker at the very center of the ring. Soon, Lance too, was hanging on every word the speaker uttered.

"Ambivalence. Do I hear two-bits for ambivalence? You bet I hear two-bits, and four-bits and six-bits and a dollar all for ambivalence stand up and holler and suddenly all of America rises up and screams 'We are as a shell split down the middle. One side filled good and one side filled bad, one side sweet and the other sour!'

"Ambivalence. It's our bi-polar American character I tell you. It's like throwing up every time we eat our favorite food. Black or White, we're all raised on the rack of American ambivalence. And don't think for one instant that we don't feel the pain. The only reason we ain't doubled over is cause we've long since gone numb!

"You don't believe me? White brothers, I want you all to go home tonight and stare at yourself in the mirror. Get real close, so close your breath can be seen, and LOOK at how white that skin really is. Think how hard you had to fight to keep it that way.

"It wasn't easy keeping the black man in his place, especially since we built our nation from the sweat of his brow. Yes, he grew our cotton. He was the grunt labor of our mighty industries. Why, he even lived in our slum housing for us. And that brings us back to Ambivalenve, my brothers. We can't live with the Black man, but we sure as hell can't live without him! Thats Ambivalence. Thats America's fundamental contradiction, because everytime we try to preserve our whiteness we grow a little bit blacker!

"Now it's a Brown man staring back at us from that mirror. And what adds insult to injury is the fact that that man is singing the blues. Those dirty black blues, god damnit. And you want that music to stop but it won't because it's YOU thats singing it ! Thats ambivbalence. Thats pain, man. We feel it too!"

Lance bolts up from his chair as if the man's loud voice had actually awoke him from a deep trance. He felt shaken, sobered and thirsty. In the bathroom he fills his glass and watches a classmate struggle with the drain stopper in the sink next to his.

"Who's the nigger that busted the drain?"

Lance clenched his teeth so hard he thought they might shatter from the pressure. He wanted to lash out in the direction of that voice. It had no right. . .

"Don't ever call me a nigger again! Do you hear me? Don't EVER call me a nigger!"

This Week At Juniata

by Rosemary Tai
Nancy Nordberg

This weekend Juniata will celebrate May Day with many kinds of festivities. On Friday morning the traditional May Day breakfast will be served from 6:45-8:30 A.M. for the women of the campus. The film, Savages will be shown at 8:15 in Oller Hall. Also, the Spring carnival will be held in the gym parking lot with various campus organizations sponsering booths.

The ingenious Juniata students and their contraptions will race down the Juniata River on Saturday afternoon for the annual Raft Race. The carnival will continue through Saturday.

On Sunday afternoon the students of Juniata will present "Midsummer Nights Dream" on the steps of Oller at 3:00 P.M.

Other events for the week include:

Tonight—"The Consul" 8:15 P.M.—Oller
Sunday May 18—Men's Rugby at Susquehanna
Wednesday May 21—Gone with the Wind—7:00 P.M.—Oller

Editorial

by Lowry Whetstone

Basically I feel that a college newspaper has a dual role in that it serves to inform the students of the aspects of campus life, but apart from this idea I feel that it has to function as a communicator of news outside our college community.

I would like to accomplish these two goals by continuing with the various articles submitted by our campuses many talented writers, and secondly by printing more news releases that I feel increase the awareness of the "Outside World". To bring about an addition of what I will term Juniatian policies my staff and I will elaborate on many more topics throughout the year to enable students to become more broadly informed of the news.

Since I first decided that I would consent to becoming editor the remainder of this year and the next, I began preparing a staff of people who I feel are reliable and also very capable. My staff will consist of people who have an interest in the function of the Juniatian and the majority of my staff has had previous experience. At this point im my article I would like to list my selections for next years editorial staff. The staff is as follows; Julie Persing as Layout Editor; Bob Meacham as News Editor; Alan Wirt as Sports Editor; Cheryl Dettmar as Copy Editor; Rosemary Tai as Circulation Manager; Nan Weber as Business Manager and I am glad to announce Professor Gerald Croce as Faculty Advisor.

In conclusion I would like to thank those that have chosen me as the Juniatian's new editor and special thanks to Gary Gillen and Professor Croce for their valuable assistance and support.

(Along Muddy Run)

by Henry Siedzikowski

Whenever there is a financial crisis, such as the one being experienced by Juniata College, rumors always abound concerning the area of the next cutback. The hottest rumor on this campus concerns the elimination of intramural sports. While there may have to be some changes in format, the tales of elimination are unfounded.

But more importantly, in dispelling this rumor, I have a chance to congratulate the college on one of their most successful programs. When I came here four years ago, the intramural program was not half as extensive as it is now. Professors Rossi and Riley are to be commended for the time they have put into the development of this program.

The intramural program serves several very important functions on campus. At a school where gym courses are not mandatory, it provides the primary method of maintaining physical fitness on campus. The large number of student participants speaks well of our students awareness of the importance of keeping in shape.

Secondly, intramurals provide a consistent amount of activities on a campus where there is relatively little to do. I cannot even imagine what would result from the proliferation of boredom that would occur if there were no intramurals. Juniata might see its first riot.

A third advantage is that intramurals provides an outlet for all the sports enthusiasts on campus who are not talented enough to make the varsity teams. In this sense, intramurals may serve a larger percentage of the college community than any other program except the academic one.

Finally, intramurals provide an excellent opportunity to extend your circle of friends on campus. For freshmen, this is a most important aspect. However, it is also important for upperclassmen to keep touch with the rest of the campus.

Confusing Social Comedy Is Commentary On Civilization

by Brad Rudy

Look! Up in the sky! It's a bird! It's a plane! No, it's. . .a croquet ball?? And on that cryptic note, let's start talking about Savages. (This should not be confused with the made-for- television movie of the same name, which starred Andy Griffith.)

A group of mud-clad, savage "mud-people" are going through their daily routines of fertility rites, human sacrificial offerings, and decisions of whether to wear rocks or bones in their noses. All of a sudden, a croquet ball zooms by! Now, as self-propelled croquet balls seem somewhat unorthodox, you could probably assume this isn't your standard, run-of-the-mill blah movie. Up until said ball makes said appearance, the movie has been in black-and-white; now, it slowly adopts a sepia-ish hue, finally developing to full color. The soundtrack had been a stream of untranslated German (allegedly quotes from Schiller and Heine) with dialogue presented through silent-esque art-decor title cards. Now, we can hear the full glorious spectacle of sound!

Picking up our ball-worshipping muddies where we left them, we find them following said object. (What would you do if you suddenly saw a croquet ball whizz by? Think about it, Dr. Seuss.) It (the ball) leads them to a Gatsby-esque chateau, into which our little muddies move. Well, to make a short story long, they abandon their mud for the more rewarding savageries of sophistication. (Some of us call this process "civilization".) Their one God is, of course, the aforementioned croquet ball (Aren't you getting sick of seeing that ball?). Finally, towards evening, while they are shooting their own balls into the woods, they discover a new God—a new security, a new icon, a new crutch, a new altar—it's called "mud." As you've all had Modes of Thought, you can probably deduce all the rest.

Not only is this one of the wierdest movies we've had in a long time, it also boasts one of the weirdest combinations of performers in its weird cast. Distinguished stage actress Anne Francine takes on the role of "The hostess." Sam Waterston, who provided probably the finest performance in last year's The Great Gatsby, plays "A decent young man." Andy Warhol star Ultra Violet plays "An indecent young woman." Thayer David plays "A capitalist." Paulita Sedgwick plays "A sensitive girl." Finally, Kathleen Widdoes dons a top hat and some tails and does a number called "Stoming on a Spaniel."

Laying all humorous pretensions aside for at least a paragraph, Savages is not only a fast-moving social comedy, it is also a startling allegory on the rise and fall of civilization. We see in the space of a single day, the evolution of man through the successive stages mud (savage)—ball (savage)—civilization (savage)—savagery (civilized)—ball (civilized)—mud (civilized).

Now, if you accepted the previous paragraph as literary (albeit esoteric) verity, you probably died before you started reading the article. In any case, why not have a friend bring your corpse to Alumni Hall tomorrow night at 8:15? We'll take your quarters at the door, but after that, you're on your own (at least with this one).

Don't Miss Gone With The Wind!

by Zig

Before getting down to the business at hand, I'd like to thank everyone, on gehalf of Mike and myself, for the over-whelming response to the film surveys that we submitted to you last week. It was your chance to have a say as to what movies make their humble appearance on Juniata campus. I must say that I'm very pleased with at least some of your choices. So, for those of you who haven't caught the lists posted in Ellis (Could I have the envelope please?), . . . the winners are:

1. The Sting
2. Pappillon
3. Chinatown
4. 2001
5. Last Tango in Paris
6. Sleeper
7. Easy Rider
8. The French Connection
9. Midnight Cowboy
10. The Way We Were

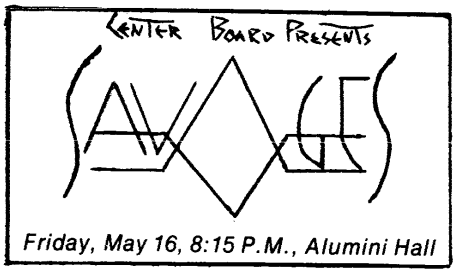
Along with Mom, apple pie and the boy next door, Gone With the Wind (starring Vivien Leigh, as the Southern belle Scarlett O'Hara, and Clark Gable, as the romantic rascal Rhett Butler) is one of the classic American traditions. Released in 1939, the film is still relevant to modern audiences, for almost forty years later, it's able to draw crowds at theaters all over the country. Although there are sections of the film that could be called overly melodramatic by today's standards, it still holds together with technical triumphs like the "burning of Atlanta". Within its three hours and forty-five minutes, the film depicts the romantic Southern way of life before the Civil War brought it tumbling down. Today it speaks to us with an added dimension, for it represents the star-studded era of the Hollywood extravaganza that is also "gone with the wind."

The film is a cross-section of American myth and legend, a grand nostalgia-filled illusion brought beautifully to life. With the first title of the film — "There was a Land fo Cavaliers and Cottonfields in the Old South" — the stage is set for the myth of the Old South that in reality, may or may not have existed.

Gone With the Wind is a coloration of the American Civil War and how it brought an abrupt change to the life of one self-centered girl in particular. The film shows Scarlett O'Hara, the pampered daughter of a Southern plantation owner, in her selfish attempt to pick herself out of the smoldering ashes of the Civil War and survive in a man's world of blood and corruption. The depth of her determination is dramatically shown in the famous scene where she falls to her knees in a barren field, shakes her fist at the sky and cries, "As God is my witness, I'm going to live through this, and when it's over, I'll never be hungry again!"

In its adaptation of the Civil War era, there are no bloody battle sequences, for that would only detract from Scarlett and those whose lives she effects. Not even the bloodiest of battle scenes could depict the horrors of war more effectively than the panorama view of Scarlett standing amidst the thousands of wounded soldiers lining the railroad tracks. Nor could anything be more horrifying than the scenes where Scarlett, volunteering her services in a military hospital, is asked to assist in the amputation of a young soldier's gangrenous leg with a meat cleaver and no anesthetic.

Gone With the Wind remains a classic, untouched by time, even in 1975. Can you believe that such a film will have reached Oller Hall as of Wednesday, May 21 (preceeded by Laurel and Hardy in The Music Box) for a mere price of $1.50??? Well, frankly, my dear, it has.



"A Midsummer Night's Dream"

by June Cramer

On Sunday, May 18th at 3:00 and Monday the 19th at 6:00, the Masque Club will present a comedy by a well known playwright, William Shakespeare. They will perform on the steps of Oller Hall. The play will be done entirely by students. There will be five seniors in roles; Mark Conti as Oberon, Fran Vitabile as Hippolyta, Diane Shaw as Puck, Brad Rudy as. .um. .Bottom, Carl Maryott as Quince and John Krouse as Egeus. There will be an assorted "host of underclassmen and fairies" also taking part in the play.

The play will be directed by Sam Sirianni and Nathan Wagner. For those who know nothing about "A Midsummer Night's Dream," it is a sort of "love story with a twist." The music will be done by Dr. Norris and group on recorders. Everyone is welcome, and might be well advised to bring blankets to sit on.

This is a play that lends itself well to Springtime in front of Oller. Come to think of it, Juniata does seem to remind one of an Athenian wood. If you long to escape, and get away from it all, at least temporarily, come to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

A Little From Moore

by Gary Wayne Moore

Sunshine! That's just what the doctor ordered last Saturday, as the Juniata College Athletic Department sponsored the All College "Picnic Invitational" Track Meet. Barbacued chicken, potato salad, and watermelon, all helped to relieve the heavy appetites that the participants and spectators were to work up. It could not have been a more finer day than this one which gave the entire Juniata Community an opportunity to get together and just have a ball! Women in halters, and men in tanktops were the main attire for the day, as students and faculty tried to roast themselves in sun, while some of the participants in the meet were getting "burned" without really trying.

The individual top scorers were: Kim Sypula, with 18 points; George Kourakin, with 17; and Jacque Prentiss, with 15. The top three scorers are as follows: Kick, 56; Instant Replay, 47; and Club Feet, with 33 points.

Juniata's Baseball Season, Ends Under A Dark Cloud

by John Paushock

The end of the enjoyable Spring term calls for a resume of America's popular springtime sandlot sport, baseball. In Huntingdon, the tribal sluggers from Juniata were only capable of managing a 6 win- 14 loss schedule, which was primarily reflected in the intense depth of youngsters of the squad, and the disheartening one-run loss defects that the Indians sacrificed.

In the hitting department, senior and captain, Tommy Streightlift, led the team by bopping a dynamic 24 hits out of 56 attempts at the plate. He was proceeded by sophomore slugger Steve Harper and freshman rookie, Mike Morgan, who pulled an impressive .361 batting average. In the tossing clique, another sophomore, Jim "Big-Boy" Kudel fired the leather with excellence, and was respectively followed by class-mate, Todd Wise, who led the Indians in a supberb late season 6-4 victory over U.P.J. A cursory checklist of the most prominent Juniata starters is:

1B—Rhodes
2B—Judd
SS.—Wickeroski
⅓B—Flett
Cat—Hartley
LF.—Harper
CF.—Streightlift
RF.—Morgan
Pit—Kudel, Wise, Wachter, or Levengood
Rel. Pit.—Smith, Synouski, Knouse, Balch

The two most exciting wins for J.C. occured against Indiana State and Bucknell. In the I.S. game, Streightlift scored Morgan from second with his single, to tally a 7-6 score. With Bucknell, Rhodes whipped a triple and accounted for a single to lead the team, to a 5-4 win despite 15 errors counted against them. The advantage of a designated hiter also proved beneficial at times, and Corky Jacobs, Gary Bickel, and Don Olsen usually saw the action at that slot of the line-up. Behind the home-plate marker, freshman Barry Hartley utilized his reflexes and exhibited many fine defensive stunts.

Overall, this year's diamond kids, led by Coach Berrier, were yet young, and faced many older and over powering competitors. They spent a while in skid row, by dropping 7 straight frustrating one run losses. The only three seniors leaving will be Streightlift, Judd, and Sysnouski; which should prove interesting for the 1976 season, when all but three starting veterans return.

THE JUNIATIAN

VOL. XLVIII NO. 22 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | May, 22, 1975

This Week At Juniata

by Nancy Nordberg and Rosemary Tai

For our last article of the year, we thought it might be fitting to evaluate this year's activities and by doing so, try to come up with some idea of what should or should not be repeated again next year.

Starting with the complaints on a general basis, it seems that one of the most disappointing features of the year's activity schedule was poor timing. Not only did the calendar of events appear to be following a general rule of "all or nothing", but the "all" side seemed to fall on those weeks when work loads were the heaviest. A recent example being the Spring Carnival and Raft Race (if it was scheduled as planned) right before finals. And not to mention the scheduling of "The Godfather" was shown at the same time as finals. Another complaint closely related to poor timing, has to do with last minute decisions. Occasional cancellations and location changes cannot be avoided, but let's make sure that the changes are well-publicized so we don't all get tired of playing hide-and seek (as we did several times this year while trying to find where and when films were being shown). Speaking of films, what ever happened to the all-term series ticket?

AWorkshop In The Arts!

by Ralph Church

The construction and use of puppets will be the focus of the second annual summer workshop in the arts at Juniata College. The workshop runs from June 9 to June 27 as part of the regular three-week summer session.

Other units for credit during the workshop are: Creative Writing (Prof. Ralph Church); The Nature of Clay (Prof. Jack Troy; Special Studies in Art: Photography (Prof. Alexander McBride). The workshop in puppetry will be directed by Prof. Doris Goehring and two young nationally-known graduates of the Rhode Island School of Design. Again this year, the student will register for one designated unit, but there will be interaction with the students in the other units.

Cathy Anastasion, one of the visiting instructors, described the puppet workshop this way: "We will consider a variety of puppetry forms including costume puppets and the use and non-use of the stage. Periodic workshops will be conducted in creative dramatics, mime and puppets for the classroom. Materials include latex (rubber), celastic (plastic), fabric and waste products. The class will culminate in a puppet show." The class will learn to construct and use hand puppets as well as human-size puppets, according to Prof. Goehring. She is enthusiastic about the workshop, feeling that this is the first time Juniata students have been offered an opportunity to work in this kind of creative endeavor.

Last year's Artist/Writer's Institute was built on the concept of "Time Contained" and culminated in the construction and burial of a time capsule in front of Ellis Hall. This year's workshop should offer even more opportunity for the various student groups to work together, according to Prof. Church. He sees the creative writing group producing scripts, the photographers providing backgrounds and documentation, and the ceramic students

Humanizing Atmosphere Via Clay

by Wendy Jacobus

Although most of the constituency at Juniata would agree the college is a comfortable place to live and learn, there still exists a pervading atmosphere of an "institution" and not a home. It's a quality that is almost synonymous with colleges and yet it can cause significant attitudinal problems on any campus. Professor Troy and some of the students from the Pot Shop have undertaken a project which could be just the beginning of sweeping away a little of the institution aura and adding a little individualism to J.C. Those who eat at the dining hall perhaps have seen the results of their efforts. Now at dinner, the students have the choice of using a pottery cup made by fellow J.C. students, or one of the glasses provided by Food Service.

Jack Troy illustrating the skill, time, and effort which has gone into each of the clay glasses made for the cafeteria.

The Pot Shop has a great deal of pride in the 159 cups they've issued to the cafeteria thus far. Not only is each one individualistic but each has evolved through a great deal of work on the part of the artists. The whole process begins with the mixing of clay in specified proportions and follows through seven other steps including the forming of the cups on the pottery wheel, drying, firing, glazing and decorating them. Each cup also has to be specially measured throughout the process so the finished product will be useful (capable of containing 8 ounces of liquid) and will fit in the dishwasher racks. All in all over two weeks time passes before the artist has the finished product.

But the students not only have a lot of their time invested in the project, they also have invested a lot of themself. The artists are proud to see their cups being used and appreciated by other students because the cups are an expression of and by the artist.

Yet by the same token, the Pot Shop students are not so unrealistic as to believe some of their cups won't be "ripped off". They are simply hoping the project and the idea behind it, to add a little more individualism to J.C., will not be sacrificed. In a great sense then, the responsibility for the success or failure of the project rests with the students. As Professor Troy pointed out, this could become a type of tradition at Juniata, and ultimately, if successful, it could pave the way for more "humanizing projects in the future."

Duke University's Marine Lab Offering Five Week Program

by Alice Boomhower

A few months ago, Susie Baker wrote an article concerning the advantages and disadvantages of a big university. In this article she delt with the American University semester calling it the "best of both worlds." I would like to add another co-op program to that list; the Duke University Marine Laboratory. This is a cooperative program in the "Marine Environment" with Duke University. Students from several private and public institutions all over the East come to Duke for five weeks of fairly intensive marine studies.

Beside being in a beautiful enviro-vironment during a superb time of the year, the program allows students to dabble in studies in a particular field. For those of us considering graduate school, it's superb way to find out if specialization and research are our inclination. The pressure here is minimal. There's little competition for grades between individuals, most of the competition is within individuals themselves.

Classes are extremely informal. The course is considered to be a field course, and so for the most part, lecture time is limited. Field and lab studies comprise the major of the course. For example, this weekend I'll be doing a project mapping zonation of sessile organisms on pilings as related to current speed, food and oxygen availability, and salinity. What all this means is that I'll be diving off the end of the dock all afternoon — not a bad way to spend a Saturday afternoon. Other students will be on the beaches, dunes and in boats all day with a few instruments attempting to get a handle on why organisms grow the way they do in the sea. As you see, education can be fun.

Besides a different educational environment, the advantage of meeting new people with entirely different perspectives on life is extremely enjoyable. There are nineteen of us in the co-op program. We are an extremely homogenous group with varying backgrounds and interests. Amazingly, we get along perfectly, even though we're together almost twenty-four hours a day. One of the most rewarding things is being able to discuss common problems from botanist's, a zoologist's, an ecologist's a chemist's and a geologist's point of view.

There are disadvantages of course; like your clothes never completely drying, getting used to roaches, sand in your bed constantly, and being knee-deep in mud for whole afternoons; but these become minimal and the adjustment is slight. For people who are interested in the "Marine Environment," this is a wonderful opportunity with great potential. Or the total scale. I feel that Juniata's educational goals are greatly increased by programs of this sort, and that more students should take advantage of them. Including the Duke term into the curriculum adds another dimension to Juniata's resources.

To Cram Or Not To Cram

by Suzi Baker

"These are the times that try men's souls." We are fast approaching that deadly and dangerous time in the academic term, those three days of sheer, unadulterated agony, that period of prolonged torture—exams. It will soon be that "fun" time of year when one busts one's you know what in valiant efforts to make up ten weeks work in three days. I've already seen traces of "exam syndrome"—that rare disease that makes students bug-eyed and hypertensive. (In some cases this is a normal condition but that's another problem.) At any rate, I find it my privilege, no, my duty to offer some alternatives to the inevitable "cram."

A number of my friends from lower Bongo Bongo U. have resolved the problem of "cramitis" by employing a witch doctor, of the basic general practitioner variety. A few incantations and a couple of shakes of the ugly stick and the victim of this vile torture feels much better. Of course, this does little to help the outcome of the exam but, then again it's hard to find good witch doctors these days.

Another technique presently being experimented with is sleep-teaching (I'm sure you've seen this one in the Walt Disney movies.) In fact, I've been under the impression that some students at Juniata use this technique regularly—unsuccessfully but regularly. There is a most unfortunate side effect in this method, however, that is students have been known to Z-off right in the middle of the exam.

Finally, we arrive at that old tried and sometimes true method—study. This is the last resort when all else fails. I personally do not recommend "cramming" even as a last resort. A little coffee and some casual study spaced-out (and I don't mean that figuratively!) over a few days is usually easier on the soon-to-be victim and just as productive.

Most academics agree that the best thing about an exam is when it's over. It is at this point in time that one slumps into a drunken stupor for a number of days emerging only to head for home and an overdue vacation. Keep the faith! This time next week the plague will be arrested, the tempest in submission, and it'll all be over.

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the Editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatian. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name. It is also requested that all letters be double spaced with 70 spaces per line.

An open letter to readers of the Juniatian

I am pleased to respond to five questions which were presented to me in writing by Mr. Bruce Erb, a member of the Juniatian staff. The questions are quated exactly as Bruce presented them to me. It is a pleasure to give the answers which appear seriatim as follows:

1. Q. At what date do you now anticipate leaving office?

A. In my letter of resignation which I presented, on March 8, to the Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees, I stated that I wished to be relieved of my duties as of September 1, 1975, and in any event not later than January 1, 1976.

2. Q. After that date, exactly what will be your position and duties at Juniata?

A. The exact nature of my responsibilities, following my stepping down from the presidency, has not been specifically defined as yet. However, it is generally agreed that I will devote a major portion of my time to off-campus fund raising. Special attention will be given to older friends and alumni of Juniata — chiefly those of age 55 and older. Emphasis will be placed on cultivation of bequests, annuities, and forms of deferred giving, but more immediate forms of giving, e.g., annual support and funds for building projects, will also be pursued.

My effort will place particular emphasis upon assurance of Juniata's future with primary attention to the further development of endowment funds. This is the most substantial way to enrich the educational program, to assure the College's financial stability, and to help keep the fee structure under control.

3. Q. What do you feel to be your greatest achievement as president of Juniata?

A. No one person achieves the advances made by a college. Advances are made by the joint efforts of many persons and such advances must be made on a number of fronts simultaneously. The following points suggest briefly some of Juniata's more important developments since 1968:

a. It is acknowledged by many that the present faculty is, on the whole, the best that Juniata has ever had.

b. Six years after planning was begun and four years after initial implementation, we can say with confidence that faculty and students have made the new academic program one of significance and promise.

c. The $344,000 grant awarded by the National Endowment for the Humanities in recognition of the new program was especially important because it supported the crucial areas of program development, faculty development and library development.

d. The major capital gifts campaign — Margin of Difference — begun in 1968 and aimed at raising $10.1-million by 1976, the Centennial Year, has now passed the $8.2-million mark in gifts and pledges. One important result is that the College's endowment and annuity funds have more than doubled since 1968 when the amount of such funds was $2.8-million.

e. Following a serious budgetary problem in 1968-69, current fund operations have been stabilized so that the College has operated in the black during the past five years. One important factor contributing to this performance was the initiation in 1969-70 of the Annual Support Fund which since that time has produced each year an average of $129,000 for the educational budget. This means that over the past six years Juniata constituents have given $776,000 over and above the Margin of Difference gifts mentioned under d. above. The Annual Support Fund has contributed an average of $117.00 annually toward meeting the cost of each student's education.

f. Another important development has been the wider involvement of faculty and students in Juniata affairs especially as exemplified by their participation in meetings of the Board of Trustees and of the committees of the Board.

4. Q. What do you feel will be the greatest problem facing your successor as he takes office?

A. To answer this question one needs only to look at American higher education on a nation-wide basis. Across the country private colleges in particular are facing the most monumental financial problems they have ever encountered. It has been commonplace to compare these years of financial crisis in higher education to the 1930's. But in complexity and severity the 1970's are more difficult and defiant of solution. Juniata cannot now nor will it in the future escape exposure to these problems which severely affect all colleges, whether small or large, private or public, rich or poor, strong or mediocre. My own confidence in Juniata and in the Presidential Search Committee of the Board of Trustees (plus the Advisory Committee composed of faculty, students, and alumni) leads me to say that Juniata has a much better chance of significant survival than most colleges. Furthermore, I am confident that we will have a new president who will cope with the present effectively and who will meet the future successfully.

5. Q. Who do you think will be your successor? Could you give us the names of some of those prominently being considered for the job? How is the selection process coming along?

A. The selection process is coming along very well! I say this on the basis of my high confidence in the two key committees mentioned under #4 above and in my unfailing conviction that Juniata will attract good leadership.

I don't know who my successor will be; for me to know his or her name would be to deny the integrity of the selection process now in progress. I do know that no one has yet been selected and, if things proceed as they should, I should not know the new president's name until the public announcement is made. As the incumbent president, I should facilitate the work of the Selection Committee but should not under any condition play a part in the choice of my successor.

Sincerely yours,
John N. Stauffer

(Along Muddy Run)

by Henry Siedzikowski

I was searching for inspiration for my final article when fate mysteriously intervened. The inspiration came from that very stream of water that this column is named after. One afternoon last week I saw a group of approximately twenty East House residents crowding the banks of the mighty Muddy Run. A thunderstorm had swelled the waters and this strange group stood in a steady drizzle to watch bottles race downstream from bridge to bridge.

At this point, you are probably saying, "What the hell is he talking about." Well, in that strange event last week, I saw a summation of my four years at Juniata. Yes, there were academics, I learned a great deal of academic material. And then, there were all those activities. But what I learned here is much more important than any of that. At Juniata, I came to realize that life is really short, and the best you can get out of it is to enjoy the little things with good friends.

I've been lucky. All four years here, I have been fortunate to have a number of great friends. The guys I live with now, I'll probably never forget. Nor will I forget a number of others, male and female, who helped me enjoy my last four years.

All year, I have tried to talk about the Juniata community. Now, I remind you that communities are made up of people. It is the people who make the community good or bad. There may be a lot of things wrong with Juniata College, but we do have some of the friendliest people in the world here.

Artificial distinctions do not really exist here. The football players do not feel obligated to form their own clique. My present roommates contain a football team captain, and no other football players. And this mixture is typical. It also contains members from every class except freshmen, and we have a number of freshmen friends.

And so, that group cheering a bottle race in the rain has a message for us. Take the time to enjoy little things with your friends. You can study, and get your degree, and be in every activity on campus. All these may help you at one time or another. But in the end, it will be the crazy moments with your friends that dominate your memory.

To those of you who took the time to read what I had to write, I say thanks, I hope I have not wasted your time. And to all those who will return to good old Juniata, I wish the best of luck. You'll probably need it. And finally, I hope that all of us that make up the Juniata community, no matter how much we may complain about its faults, can leave with fond memories of many good times spent here.

A Workshop

learning another dimension in sculpture.

Prof. Goehring said that students who are interested in teacher education, as well as present public school teachers, should be interested in the puppetry construction and use. She pointed out that this is a rare opportunity that will probably not be repeated in the near future.

There is a class-size limit in each section of the workshop, so those students who are interested should siign up soon. Further information about the workshop can be had from the professors involved or from Dr. Donald T. Hartman, Director of Summer Sessions, Juniata College.

Finishing up on the brighter side of things, some credit should be given to the extra films shown during the year, and also for the fact that a number of them, such as "American Grafitti" and "Paper Moon", were fairly recent films. Quality and frequency of departmental guest speakers is another aspect to be commended. The only problem here is being poor attendance, which might have been greatly improved if publicity hadn't been confined within each department. Believe it or not, student interests do often go so far as to include those subjects not within their "field of concentration"!

Two new ideas brought about this year that might not exactly be included under the title of "activities", but that deserve to be mentioned favorably are the minicourses (where students acquired such skills as playing the guitar and basic river cruising) and START, which helped to expand the student-faculty relations.

Last, but definitely not least, the Artist Series deserve some praise for the quality and variety of its performances. These are only some of the conclusions that we have drawn and that we hope the centennial year will be an active one. Have a relaxing summer!

The Emigrants: Lyricized Cliches

by Brad Rudy

In our post-Watergate era of political distrust and national pessimism, we all have a tendency to fall back on our one source of communal pride—our humble and lowly origins as a people and a society. With this in mind, you would expect an American-made settler-era movie to be loaded with all the exploiting cliches and stereotypes of nostalgia, patriotism, and adventure combined. (Could you picture it —The Mayflower Adventure, The Towering Mayflower, The Taking of Mayflower 1 2 3, Mayflower 1975, Deep Mayflower, Last Tango in Jamestown, The Devil and Miss Priscilla? The possibilities are endless!)

Fortunately, The Emigrants was made "back there." It traces the movement of the Swedish emigration of the 1800's from its causal roots to its conclusion under a Minnesota tree. A sequel released last year, The New Land, completes the story, more or less showing that "over here" was not all it was cracked up to be.

Max Von Sydow and Liv Ullman play Karl Oscar and Kristina, a young Swedish couple who find early married life difficult: babies come with clockwork regularity; their farm is too rocky to yield anything except weeds and a broken plow; lightning destroys their barn, one of their major sources of livelihood; finally, one of their children dies from eating too much rice porridge. Eddie Axberg plays Karl Oscar's adolescent brother, Robert, who has been indentured at a too early age to slave for a cruel and tyrannical farmer. Robert, though, is a carefree lad, who searches for (and finds) every conceivable excuse for getting out of work. Another member of the family is Danjel, a reformist preacher persecuted for harboring "heretics." Each of them has a dream that could possibly be an escape—flight to the central forests of America.

The trip over takes its toll, of course. Hundreds of emigrants are crammed into the stomach of an already overcrowded ship. Over the long months at sea, they fray each others' nerves raw, they pick each others' lice, they get sick in each others' beds, they die in each others' arms. But the ordeal finally ends. They land at last, and the survivors trek together across the continent, until, finally, Karl Oscar can stake his claim in the rich, fertile Minnesota forest.

Without seeing The New Land, and hearing this cursory summary, you probably guess that the plot of The Emigrants is drenched with the typically Americanese nationalistic fervor. Admittedly, too, it does show how much better it is to be "here" rather than "back there." But the people, the style, the mood all transcend the plot. Director Jan Troell's style is so lyrical, so seemingly casual, yet so purposeful, that we feel all 150 minutes, but would be willing to sit through 150, 300, a thousand minutes more. It is such a beautiful motion picture, that you could just sit and stare at it for hours. One example out of many of Troell's lyrical moments is this: Robert is lying lazily by a small brook. A shoe falls in and floats downstream. Instead of doing the logical thing (chasing it) Robert makes a boat out of his other shoe and sends it down after the first.

I sincerely hope you will enjoy The Emigrants. It shows an epic vision and beauty totally alien to the American film industry, but does it in such a way as to make it more engaging, not trite or boring. It is made from the Swedish point-of-view by Swedish filmakers and, probably for Swedish audiences. (It is, after all, called The Emmigrants, not The Immigrants.) Don't let this scare you away, though. Its characters are more universal and more believable than probably anything we've seen this term. This multi-Academy-Award nominee will be available for your consumption tomorrow night (Friday) at 8:15 P.M. in Oller Hall. Admission is 50¢, but I seriously doubt if anyone will feel cheated.

One final note, since this is my last article: I hope I have somehow, through my articles, aided you in enjoying our movies this year. I've tried to make some sense for you of many difficult films and tried to give you something new to look for in old favorites. Movies are not only your best form of entertainment, but also the most publicly accessible art form. Directors, writers, and actors can reach the public by concealing their innermost thoughts and feelings within the framework of a two-hour entertainment. To sound another optimistic note, not only is Hollywood opening up to the sort of talent and vision found previously in only foreign imports (most notably such young directors as Coppola, Altman, Scorcese, and Kubrick), but they are also being enjoyed by more people. It seems almost a dawn where you can do what you want—express your self through picture and sound, entertain the masses, or, most preferably, both at the same time. And, ours is the generation which will reap the most benefit from it all.

JC Rookie Gives Tips To Writers

by Perry Habecker

What started out as a favor to the news editor turned into a semi-pleasurable pastime. referring to writing articles for this newspaper.

I never wrote for a newspaper before last fall, but since last fall, this neophyte journalist has gotten much helpful, unsolicited advice from his readers. I'D LIKE TO PASS ON THIS ADVICE TO MY FELLOW WRITERS. For those of you who are not writers, you may stop reading hight here. I wouldn't want you to waste time or exhaust cognitive processes on unnecessary reading. Well anyway, here are seven tips:

(1) Don't take a journalism course (if you could). It might cramp your style. Or worse yet, you may no longer have the time or desire to write for the Juniatian.

(2) Don't report on any issue of any importance. It is probably too hot to be presented as a Juniatian article. (Truth hurts, but we can't have hurt feelings now, can we?)

(3) Don't use big words. If you are idealistic enough to think that you can motivate people to pick up a dictionary, You're crazy. Sharing your vocabuiary with the benighted masses is a passe' goal.

(4) Don't be funny, allegorical, satirical, sarcastic, or cynical. Some people just don't understand these things unless you spell them out perfectly clear. Warning—once you clarify your intentions you'll no longer have an article that is funny, allegorical, satirical, et al.

(5) Don't be afraid to disclose your opinion. No sense hiding it under the guise of an "objective" report. On the other hand, don't be too opinionated. Readers don't like writers' opinions that much.

(6) Don't be gimmickly by burdening your reader with surveys, quizzes, or anything that may cause the reader any more work than just reading the article. The Juniatian is strictly last resort reading material. Therefore, anything that will upset or discourage your reader is to be avoided.

(7) Accept only reporting-type assignments. If you are objective enough, no one will bother to argue with you. But now that I think about it, no one will bother to argue with you regardless of what you write.

What is the result of the application of these principles? Why a perfectly bland, unimposing work of trivia. And that's what you get. Ayahh!

How Apathy And Insecurity Trapped The Lost Ata In And Eternal Search

by Tom Kutz

Once there was a great ship named the Ata. It was a magnificant vessel, built strong to last through all the brutalities of the sea. The origanization of its crew was unlike any other ship of its time. There was no captain with absolute power. Rather, everyone on board was to have some say on how the ship was to be sailed. From the beginning of the journey this crew, while made up of individuals with diverse interests and talents, had agreed to sail to a "promised land" of enlightened people. Here they felt they could be rid of the ignorance of their home country. There was but one problem with the Ata; its navigation chamber. Here things had gone wrong, the instruments and methods used were chartered course to the land of enlightenment.

The Ata and its crew became lost, sailing from port to port in search of their original destination. This disasterous state of affairs continued for many years. Some on board became disillisioned, feeling that their promised land never existed. Others, especially those who worked in the navigation chamber, became obstinate in their opinion that they were using the correct procedures and tools to find their way. These sailors said that it was the bungling of "someone else" that had caused the ship to go astray. There were a few however that did not accept either opinion. These sailors did not give up in dispair nor did they hold the view of their obstinate crewmates. For these people the answer was to change what was happening in the navigation chamber. They wanted to make the methods and instruments more in tune with the people that used them. They advocated a switch in the number of work shifts from two fifteen-hour periods to three ten-hour ones. Believing there could be a reduction in competition between crew members, they called for the abolishment of the list of excellent workers. Finally this progressive group felt it would be better to let the sailors pick their own work rather than be assigned a certain job. With these modification they claimed that the Ata could be put back on her course.

These progressive sailors managed to put their plans through the ship's unique bureacracy. The changes they advocated were begun (to the chagrin of the reactionary members). There was a spread of new hope in the crew. Some of the disillusioned came around and even several of the sailors who had defended the origional ways accepted the new ideas. But the Ata had already wandered into violent waters. When it did find land, the inhabitants were even more hostile than those the crew had met before.

The progressive crew members clung to the feeling that they were on their way back to the Ata's planned course. They felt that they could survive the turbulent waters and hostile encounters and find the land of enlightened individuals. But the reactionaries soon became more and more restless claiming that the inovations were not realistic. These sailors became vehement in their demand that the ship be returned to the old ways. They said that they were being led to their doom. The remaining members fell into a state of apathy and no longer listened to the arguments of the other two groups. Even some of the advocates of the new ideas began to have second thoughts about what they had done.

Within a short time the opposition was pecking away at the inovations. First it was little things like reinstituting the list of excellent workers. In the end however, the whole system was reversed. Helped by apathy and insecurity, the reactionary group managed to return the navigation chamber to the way it had been at the start of the voyage.

After that there were only a few attempts by the progressive sailors to again change the workings of the chamber. They claimed that there had not been enough time to know if the modifications would have worked. But none of their latter attempts to again reverse the system were successful. The reactionary crew members put the progressives down saying that they tried the changes and found them to be failures.

Finally, it became the general consensus that the return to the old ways was the best and most realistic thing to have done. Yet the Ata continued to sail into wild seas and Juniata's golf team was not what you'd call the highlight of the Spring sports scene.

Under coach Bill Germann, the squad was able to muster only three wins in thirteen contests this year. The victories were over Lycoming, Lock Haven, and U.P.J. The Indians were hurt before the season began by two things. First, the schedule makers devised a ridiculous card which forced us to play ten away matches and only three at home. Juniata dropped nine out of ten of the away contests, and won two out of three of the home matches (which were played at the par 70 Huntingdon Country Club course.) The second thing that hampered the Indians chances of a winning 1975 campaign was the early season loss of John Johanson, the team's best golfer. John suffered a hand injury, in a freak cafeteria accident, which kept him out of action for the season.

The team consisted of John Shuck (Jr), John Muir (Sr), Jay Enders (Sr), Dean Miller (Fr), Al Weyant (Fr), Rusty Hoover (Fr), Doug Garner (Fr), Karl DiPetro (So), and Terry Keenan (So).

The Indians were young and inexperienced this year, and gives us reason to expect a better season in '76, with only two members of the team graduating. Four out of the top seven players are Huntingdon boys, so they'll have plenty of time to practice during the summer.

Bill Germann's men are used to playing in front of no one but their opponents (at home and away), however their efforts should not go without recognition. Better luck next year!

A Little From Moore

by Gary Wayne Moore

It's been a long and interesting year of sports here, at Juniata. I do hope that myself and my staff were able to not only cover most of the sports events and lay them before you, but rather present them in an interesting and innovative manner which met your appeal. At times, very few I hope, the sports page was only a rerun of what it was in he past few years. I apologize for this, and can only say it was inevitable table that my writers and I would sometimes get caught in a rut. But I believe that we were able to dig ourselves out and get to thinking and writing again.

I will not be with the paper next year, at least not in title. Though I do hope to do some writing for them; wether it's in sport's, or just a human interest article. I thank all the student's who offered comments on this page, and say to them now, "You are what gave us incentive to dig ourselves out of that rut.

I would like to thank my staff for all the writing they've done for me this year. I hope that they will all continue to write for the paper, as they wrote stimulating, and at times, controversial articles. John Paulshock, who knows better than anyone else on how to write "between the lines," offered a very helpful hand, more than once. Sal Vito and Jim Hayes, should both be thanked for their imagination and creativity in drawing cartoons for my sports page. Alan D. Wirt, who has a talent for making coaches roar over his "Editorialized" articles, is due a lot of thanks for spurring some controversy. By the way, Alan will be the new Sports Editor of the Juniatian next year. Finally, I would like to thank Jacque Prentiss and Kim Norris, for adding that "somethin extra" to the sports page — not a bit of male chauvinism intended.

All in all, I hope that my column, A Little From Moore, has been more than just a "little" of something. It certainly has meant a hell of a lot to me.

Seniors: Get tickets for Annual Senior Party at the Pitcher House

Appreciate Spring Weather

by John Paulshock

There is a lot more to athletic competition other than those sports which fall under the inter-scholastic, inter-collegiate, and intra-mural brackets; and Juniata College is a place where many of these so-called "free-lance" games and activities ear be witnessed as well as experienced.

A great deal of people who are a part of the Juniata community enjoy taking a spare twenty or thirty minutes and turning them into a pleasant and stretching frisbee toss with a few friends, a mellow baseball catch, or even a quick tennis volley or two. In the afternoons, provided the weather is sunny, the campus greens are scattered with soccer-ball booters, football heavers, and various other people enjoying the spring air. The lawns sometimes resemble the New Jersey beaches as they become littered with sunbathers attempting to get themselves "primed" for the summer months ahead. When it rains, everyone can be entertained by the undaunted "mud-sliders", as they trot to pick up speed and then hurl themselves, stomach-down, into a slick swamp of muck.

For the hikers and bike-riders, the cliffs and Raystown can provide quiet trails and roads for trucking around; and there is always cliff-diving, too, are refreshing exercises which cool off even the most frustrated students. Raystown and the surrounding mountains are swelled with game and their lakes stocked with multitudes of fish, so that the outdoorsman is capable of satisfying his hunting and fishing tastes. So whatever your fancy for the outdoors is concerned with, it is always a pleasure to bag the books and get into it when things around here begin to get you down and out.

Apathy and Insecurity

came in contact with even more violent peoples. Slowly, the crew came to accept an unmentioned hopelessness in their situation. Trapped by their apathy and insecurity, they were never able to find the land they sought.

VOL. XLIX No. 1 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | September 25, 1975

New President - Dr. Binder

Dr. Frederick M. Binder, currently president of Whittier College in Whittier, Calf., has been selected as the eighth president of Juniata College.

Announcement of Dr. Binder's selection was made today by Dr. John C. Baker, of New York, chairman of Juniata's Board of Trustees and president emeritus of Ohio University.

Dr. Binder, who will assume his new post September 1 after five years as president of Whittier, will succeed Dr. John N. Stauffer, who announced in March his plans to step down. Upon the advice of his cardiologist, Dr. Stauffer resigned from the Juniata presidency in order to assume a less demanding administrative role.

Dr. Stauffer has been president of Juniata since 1968, and will serve in that capacity until September 1.

In announcing "with great pleasure" Dr. Binder's unanimous election, Dr. Baker said "He knows well our traditions and historical background and will effectively promote the sound educational policies so ably developed over the last 35 years by Dr. Calvert N. Ellis, Dr. Stauffer and the faculty. His experienced leadership promises a bright future for our college."

Dr. Stauffer concurred, adding "I am deeply pleased with the trustees' decision concerning my successor. Their selection assures the college of continued strength under progressive leadership. I have known Dr. Binder and his fine work for two decades and feel the Juniata community and its constituencies can anticipate enhancement of the fund academic program to which we are committed.

"Dr. Binder believes as we do in the independent liberal arts college and is also fortunately familiar with colleges like Juniata which have their roots in the Christian tradition and concern for human welfare."

Prior to assuming his current position in 1970, Dr. Binder had served as president of Hartwick College, Oneonta, N.Y., from 1959-69 and Associate Commissioner for Higher Education, New York State Education Department, in 1969-70.

While on leave from Hartwick in 1967-68, he was the first Fulbright Lecturer in American History assigned to Yugoslavia.

A native of New Jersey, Dr. Binder received his bachelor's degree from Ursinus College, Collegeville, Pa., in 1942. He received both his master's degree in American History and Ph.D. in American economic history from the University of Pennsylvania, and his dissertation for the latter received the Newcomen prize.

He also holds honorary doctoral degrees from Ursinus, Wagner College , Rider College and Susquehanna University.

After officer's service in the Naval Reserve, 1942-45, and teaching briefly in Somerville (N.J.) High School, Dr. Binder spent a year as assistant registrar and eight years in the history department at Temple University. He then served as academic dean, vice president and professor of history at Thiel College, Greenville, Pa., from 1955-59, and as Thiel's acting president for the spring semester of 1959.

During his tenure at Hartwick, then a Lutheran institution, the college enrollment increased from 550 to 1600 students, while the number of full-time faculty members grew from 30 to 105. In the 19 years, 12 new buildings were constructed.

In his five years at Whittier, an independent liberal arts college with a Quaker heritage, the faculty has grown from 72 to 85, with 65 percent holding earned doctoral degrees. The endowment has grown some 25 percent during the period, and funds raised from private sources have totalled $4.6 million, excluding pledges.

In addition, whittier has recently established a cooperative medical technology program with the City of Hope National Medical Center and has recently acquired a Los Angeles law school with 400 students.

At both Whittier and Hartwick, Dr. Binder was instrumental in the development of major curricular and calendar changes, one of which resulted in a Ford Foundation grant.

Listed in Who's Who in America, Who's Who in Education, and the Directory of American Scholars, Dr. Binder is a member of numerous professional and civic organizations and has served on the boards of Russel Sage College, the Fox (N.T.) Hospital, the Oneonta City Planning Commission and the Southwest Indian Museum in Los Anleles.

In 1966-67, he was chairman of the Independent College Funds of ssassination— It's Becoming New American Pastime?

by Mark Wiener

assassination becoming as erican as hotdogs, apple pie, and onest government? It's beginto look that way, with the r week's attempt on President i's life adding to the growing list arried out assassination plots, e of which have been successful. ough it is not the rage in this try as it is in some Latin Ameriations, there must be scores of aved psychopaths in the U.S. entertain the idea of knocking he President or some famous on. For the past decade there s to have been and "open seaon political candidates and rs, that has lead to death, ling, and fear.

nette "Squeaky" Fromme, a er of the infamous "Manson ", (once lead by Charles Manow doing a life sentence for Sharon Tate, LaBianca mur- was the first woman to at- to kill the President, and she have done so if not for the at in her gun, a Colt .45, al- h loaded, there was no a bullet in the chamber when she pulled the trigger. The Secret Service agents gave her little time to do anything about it, in seconds she was handcuffed and the President was surrounded.

This is not the only topic dealing with assassination in the news. The old Kennedy slaying still haunt us. Evidence now points to the fact that there might have been more than one gun used in the killing of Robert Kennedy, and many people still think that Oswald wasn't the only one involved at Dallas. There is a constant shadow over Edward Kennedy, for there must be quite a few nuts who would love to be the one to get the last one left.

It is an age old problem, and will probably always be one as long as a public leader appears before the public, which is inevitable. There will always be that deranged person or persons who want to kill someone famous, whether for a political reason or just for the publicity. Ford will not make any changes in his political tramping because of it, except he now has heavier security and wears a bulletproof vest.

Pre-Medism Strikes Again At JC

by Perry Habecker

Another class of aspiring health professionals has hit Juniata. The high-schoolish zeal and elevated self-concept makes college appear to be a perfunctory interlude between high school and medical college. The intellectual and/or emotional hurdles are underestimated. The reality of the whole educational and post-graduate experience is fogged by illusions of competency, immense self-satisfaction, and prestige. What is readiily overlooked is the drudgery of the process. Unless one's personality is resilient, he or she will buckle under the pressure of the competition and tedium. (And should one eventually obtain the MD degree, would the pressure then be any less than the pressure during the formal schooling?)

This summer I had the most unfortunate tour guide experience that I ever had. A high school (Studentus prospectii) pre-med and his mother (who came here only because Juniata offered to lodge them for the night) were absolutely convinced that there was nothing more to gaining entrance to medical school than going to the "Right" college. "My God, you idiot, can't you see this boy is professional material," the mother seemed to say to me the entire four hours I wasted on them. What a team they were—it was as though they had read books on how to tear a tourguide to shreds.

This kid felt that he was so professionally and intellectually oriented towards the medical field that he had all the arrogance and pomposity of a soap opera MD. There was simply no way these people could be convinced that so much also depends upon the individual character of the person. The adolescent hot-dog and his teammate had no concept of reality. The kid had to be sent to the "Best" college, yet Momma moaned about the expense of a sound education. They even complained about the cost of medical school! No doubt about it, the kid would just have to get into a heavily subsidized state supported medical school. Also, these people were not Pennsylvania residents, and at least once every ten minutes I was reminded about how much out-of-state students are discriminated against when it comes to getting into professional school.

For three weeks following this encounter, I thought I never wanted to see a pre-med again. I mean, pre-meds really had to be sick—they had a plague of sorts, and I wanted to stay as far away as possible.

I finally resolved my hostile feelings. After all, if a lot of premeds don't try for the career, how are the most competent of those selected to study the demanding field of human medicine. Respect and financial reward are valued by most academically oriented students. Even altruism may serve as a sincere motive. There is nothing wrong with these motives as long as one is committed to practice good, ethical medicine.

What I abhor vociferously are pre-med phonies and sycophants. (Although it has been said that only phonies can see other phonies, I'd argue that I can still maintain a mininal level of objectivity in judging character.) The behavior is understandable when one considers that the pressure to meet career goals forces them into hypocritical behavior.

Equally upsetting are those students who have had enough feedback to tell them they can not successfully meet their original goals, yet so strong is their desire for the professional degree that they are blind to non-professional allied health fields. They only set themselves up for frustration and disappointment as they prepare umteen applications to med school, dental school, podiatry school, and optometry school—none of which will be successfully tendered. They then leave Juniata embittered, believing the Juniata was responsible for their failure.

College should be a time of re-evaluation of career interests. Too often pre-professional courses are considered to be a mere fulfillment of graduate school requirements. Also, whereas the required courses are completed with good grades, evidence of scholarly attainment in a particular undergraduate discipline is often lacking.

Forgive my generalities. This topic is too comprehensive for me alone to discuss in all fairness. However, it is my opinion, that those serious pre-meds who escape the stereotype stigma, who are active in some sort of non-academic vein, and who are continually questioning their sincerety, are those who probably will succeed. High school counseling must be more cautious in suggesting the traditional people-service professions, e.g., fireman, policeman, nurse, and doctor. We must broaden our concept of health services. Not everyone is cut out to be an MD.

by Ralph Whetstone

Once again I find myself back into the swing of college life here at Juniata and I must reassure myself that this is going to be as good a year as last. Although the opening weeks of school are usually hectic, there are always the good times with friends that seem to make the burden of academics more bearable.

After the novelty of college wears off for the freshman the part of Juniata that still has held my fascination and I am sure will hold their's, are the people of our campus. Needless to say the friendships that a student makes here will continue on for not only your duration on campus, but when we all eventually graduate and leave Juniata.

At times I find myself looking around my apartment and wondering what the group I lived with last year are doing and when they will walk through the door and restore the disorder which was so frequently the case in our apartment.

Upon doing this I must turn my attention to the many new faces on our campus and wonder if they will come to feel this way about their forthcoming college career as I do. The Saturday afternoon football games, the intramurals, Homecoming, the various clubs and groups on campus, and even some of the Professors, believe it or not, will tend to make you a victim of the infectious disease called sentimentality.

Many of us will be surprised at the variety of irregular activities we will be a part of throughout the year and be amazed at the enjoyment we will derive from their participation. I seriously doubt if any student here at J.C. will attempt to enter the Guiness Book of World Records by seeing how many goldfish they can eat, but occurances similar to and not far removed, will more than likely be a probability.

We have a new college president and a new Student Government at Juniata College in this our Centennial year, let us hope that both not only meet our expectations but far surpass them. There are many important upcoming events at J.C. this year and no doubt the Freshman class is in store for a great experience.

KELLER'S STATIONERY

Interview With Dr. Binder— No "Skeleton In The Closet"

by Mike McElhinney

I recently talked with Dr. Binder, Juniata's new president, about some of his views regarding various aspects of the College. He indicated that there are many things which he hopes to change but there is no imminent problem, no "skeleton in the closet", that needs immediate attention. Dr. Binder remarked that ex-President Stauffer had done an excellent job managing the school and the soundness and stability of the College was one of the main reasons Dr. Binder decided to become Juniata's President.

One of the College's greatest assets, according to the new president, is its interested, dedicated, loyal alumni. 48% of the alumni contributed to the College; a figure equalled by less than 5% of all colleges and universities in the nation. Dr. Binder said he was very pleased with the work the Alumni Council is doing in the ares of admissions and stressed that he hopes both alumni and students will assume a greater, more active role in publicizing Juniata and bringing new students here.

Soon after accepting the job of president, Dr. Binder remarked that he was going to concentrate on admissions during the upcoming school year. I asked him what plans he had in addition to those mentioned earlier. He said that "Admissions should and will receive top priority this year. . .I want to increase the amount of money going to admissions." He also hopes they will expand their area of recruiting, working more extensively in New England, Virginia and the near South, and westward toward the Chicago area.

In addition to granting more money to the admission's program, the President expressed the desire to increase funds for maintenance and do something to improve the career counseling and placement program. He indicated that an additional person might be needed in this area.

This fall one of the biggest concerns on campus among students is the future of the alcohol policy drafted by Dr. Hartman and committee last spring. I questioned Dr. Binder about the future of this more liberal policy. He stated that as far as he is concerned the policy is quite acceptible, remarking that "It is very similar to ones I've seen at other colleges." He is currently discussing the policy with trustees, alumni, and others affiliated with Juniata. Dr. Binder stressed that this is a very cautious process, particularly since he has been president for less than one month. One of the biggest stumbling blocks is Pennsylvania's drinking law. But while president at two other colleges Dr. Binder successfully implemented more liberal drinking policies. He said the key to the entire campaign will be student behavior under the current policy and their cooperation under any new policy that is adopted.

I asked the president if it would be possible for him or any college president to be as successful as Dr. Stauffer in taking care of the school's financial matters and still be as accessible as people expected. He replied, "No president is as accessible as his constituents think he should be. I will try to be as accessible as possible to all groups."

Looking For A Place "Far From The Madding Crowd"?

by Rob Lopresti

Where can you go around here for a little peace and quiet? Most people don't think of JC as being so full of life and excitement that one needs to escape. However, last year this question was raised more than once, especially by freshmen.

There comes a time in almost everyone's college career when one finds oneself cramming when the whole world seems to be partying. Also, there are times when one has to get away from the room (or the roommate) or else go crazy. Where can you go around here to escape, especially when some of the more obvious places close.

I've done some looking and asking around in the past weeks tring to discover some peaceful places at JC. Whether any of these are right for you depends, of course, mainly on your tastes and needs. However, here are a few ideas.

The Libraries— A logical first choice. The favorite spots in Beeghley are the basement and the much-in-demand study rooms on the second floor. The science library is said to be quieter, and this year desks are more available there.

Ellis Hall— The study rooms behind the pinball rooms exist, all right; but the noise from pinball machines and the radio is too disturbing for many people's taste. Also, Tote and pinball serve as powerful distractions for those who don't really want to be studing in the first place.

Founders— The halls and conference rooms of Founders are sometimes open during the weekend when the library is closed. In Good Hall an empty classroom often serves the same purpose.

The Lounges— When its two in the morning and a paper must be typed, the Considerate Roommate takes typewriter, books, papers, and, in exptre cases, munchies and a stereo and heads for the dorm lounge. Tussey-Terrace, with its tables, couches and several seperate areas is a lounge that has attracted early-morning studiers from as far as Sherwood and Cloister. I'm not familiar with some of the other lounges, but recommend any port in a storm.

The Cliffs— For those seeking quite for purposes of study, sleep, meditation (transcendental or otherwise), or anything else; the cliffs provide a marvelous view and a spot far rom the madding crowd. It's also far from shelter, so watch for rainclouds, especially if you brought books to study.

Last but no least, for those who want a change, there's always a walk through Huntingdon. Pick a direction you aren't familiar with and start walking. Huntingdon at say, two in the morning especially is a sure place to be alone, and a rather unusual kind of a study break.

"The Parable of The Buffalo"

This artucle is reprinted with permission from the Continental Oil Co. from their July 11, 1975 Ponocoan Bulletin.

The Parable of the Buffalo

Many years ago, there was a western-type town called Whizzbang, Oklahoma. It was a very prosperous town, and everyone had all they needed.

A tribe of Indians lived on the outskirts of town who were buffalo hunters, and they kept the town supplied with meat. The townspeople always had plenty of meat to eat although they didn't have much in storage. They also were getting buffalo meat from other hunters who brought in the buffalo from faraway lands. This made it very hard on the local tribe — as they only received $2 per buffalo; and with imported meat, there wasn't much demand for local hunts. The townspeople didn't care too much for the Indians, anyway, and didn't want them coming into their town.

Whizzbang also has a government agency that was supposed to help the townspeople and the Indians alike. But it seemed the agency was always against the Indians — although some leaders in the agency were good to the Indians (like "Buffalo Bellmon"), there were others like "Trader Jackson" who sought to destroy the local tribe.

THEN it happened! The faraway buffalo hunters got mad at the townspeople and would not deliver any more buffalo meat. Panic hit the town as there was very little meat in storage, and everyone would have to be rationed. The local tribe was at a loss as they had no way to meet the sudden demand for buffalo meat — they were also rationed and had to wait in long lines with the townspeople for portions of meat. Sometimes, after hours of waiting, the people were turned away because the supply of buffalo meat was exhausted.

Most townspeople were not informed on what was really going on and they blamed the local Indian tribe for the shortage. (Some were so stupid that they said the local tribe had purposely made unsuccessful hunts and had stampeded the buffalo over cliffs to create the shortage!)

The Agency then came to the Indians and said, "We must have more Buffalo Per Day." (This came to be known as BPD.) "We must make our town independent so we will not have to rely on faraway buffalo hunters anymore."

The Indians agreed (this is what they had tried to do all along) — but they had many problems. Their bows and arrows were old and had been stacked in a teepee for years. They would have to be repaired, but this couldd be done only if arrowheads and twine were available. New equipment was ordered; but the bow and arrow makers were two years behind in their orders. Inexperienced braves would have to be recruited because many of the old braves had left when the buffalo hunts were slow and restrictions virtually made hunting prohibitive. The buffalo were not as plentiful, either, and it meant traveling further to find them — and then face expensive transportation charges to get the meat home. Bows and arrows would cost more, too, so the cost of BPD would have to be raised to $10 just to meet expenses.

Some of the townspeople cried, "Excessive Profits!" Others said, "Let's find an alternative source of buffalo meat," but this would take time. So the buffalo hunts were stepped up to a fast pace and the Indians worked very hard.

Many moons before this crisis, the Agency had set up a system for the tribe to give them part of their buffalo earnings each year. But the tribe only got one out of every nine buffalo they went after; and their earnings were meager. So, the Agency would return a small amount to the Indians which they could invest in other buffalo hunts. This came to be called a "depletion allowance" — but since most of it had been taken away from the tribe, investments in future hunts were drastically reduced.

"Pink Panther" and "Bonnie And Clyde" This Weekend!

by Zig

For all of my fellow movie freaks existing somewhere out there on our humble campus, this weekend should prove to be very fulfilling (so to speak). We are daring this weekend to break the deeply-instilled Juniata tradition of every Friday night being movie night. In fact, we are (you can supply your own drum roll) gallantly attempting to show a different movie on Friday AND Saturday night. So, as a plea to the droves of people who flock into Oller Hall to see Klute and Fritz the Cat, please don't forsake us now. On Friday night at 8:oo (for the mere price of 50¢) there will be a Pink Panther film festival, beginning with several Pink Panther cartoons and featuring the full-length film of the same name. In The Pink Panther, (did you catch its Return of. . . sequel this summer?) you will be charmed by Peter Sellers at his comic best as the bumbling but loveable Inspector Clouseau.

Then on Saturday night at 8:00 (again for the mere price of 50¢), we are proud to bring to Juniata a film that will go down in the annals of film history as one of the all-time classics, a true work of cinematic art — Bonnie and Clyde staring Warren Beatty and Faye Dunaway! ! ! ! (For those of you who aren't as quick as others, it just happens to be my all-time favorite movie.) For this film, the classic excuse of, "Well, uh, I saw that movie on TV a million times." simply can not be accepted. I, too, have seen it on TV "a million times", but it's been butchered so unmercifully for TV that every time I do, I'm reduced to a quivering mass of tears. Now you'll have a chance to see it untouched as it was meant to be shown.

Bonnie and Clyde, directed by Arthur Penn, was met by a deafening uproar at the time of its release in 1967. The film's criticism as well as its success is due in part to its creative use of violence. With a perfect blend of both humor and horror, the film depicts the legend surrounding Clyde Barrow and his blonde moll, Bonnie Parker. They were bad kids in a bloody era, both aspiring to be "somebody" in a time when no one had a job let alone their self-respect.

We first see Bonnie trapped in her airless room, searching desperately for something — but what, when, with whom? Her answer comes in the form of Clyde Barrow, a thief and drifter, who offers her a gun and an escape from the "bad times" of the Depression. We smile at their crazy antics and laugh at the case scenes with the police where bullets are flying wildly but never hitting anyone. Then a bullet hits point-blank in the face of a bank clerk, blood spurts onto the screen and their excitement turns to horror. From this point on, they are trapped in a life more horrible than the one they had tried so desperately to escape. The horror of their frustration and their constant flight from the police mounts, climaxing at one of the greatest sequences ever made by anyone, anywhere. With a quick cut of each of their faces staring longingly at the other, their dance of death begins in graceful slow motion. The gun shots keep their bodies in twitching, jerking motion for what seems like an eternity, heightened brilliantly by a shot of Bonnie's blonde hair cascading toward the ground and Clyde's body rolling gently to a stop. I guarantee that the audience filing out of Oller Hall will be in a hushed silence.

Student Government Strives For Efficient Representation

by Jeanie Ahearn

Student Government is trying to join with other student organizations and the student body to better facilitate communication needs. Student Government serves as a link between the student body, student organization, and the administration. Working under this theme, student leaders met September 3-5 to develop and coordinate activities for the centenniel year. This year, with an emphasis on efficient representation, a new constitution has been approved to replace the non-exisistant dorm government of last year. This new Residence Hall Association has been designed to provide equal representation to all dorms in order ot plan all activities and improve dorm life in general. The constitution allows for one person to represent the dorm at regular council meetings which are open to the student body. These representatives will be responsible to and advised by a representative from each hallway.

To also provide for stronger student cohesion, a Clearing House is being instituted this year. It is headed by a joint committee of Center Board and the Student Senate with Meg Meyers and Charlie Kerekes. It is designed for total communication between the students and campus organizations, focusing on coordinating scheduled events. Until the Clearing House is developed Student Government is offering office hours for student questions and complaints. They are from 4:30 until 6:30 Monday through Friday.

To better student communications with the administration and faculty, Student Government is represented on the following committees and boards: Executive Committee, Academic Standards Committee, Admission Committee, Judicial Board and the Board of Trustees. These positions are open to any student and application is through an interview process with Student Senate members. Any interested students may sign up at the Student Government office.

No matter how hard the Indians worked, the townspeople still complained. They said the hunters' horses poluted their lands and stunk up the air (even though most of the accusers had never been to the hunting grounds). They said the wagons used to haul the buffalo meat and hunting gear shouldn't be allowed on the main roads, even though the tribe paid for wagon licenses and permits. So, some of the Indians started hunting from the water in canoes. This cost more, but the tribe felt it was worth it if it got results. The townspeople screamed that this would contaminate the streams — despite the fact that only rarely did a buffalo fall into the water.

So, the Indian who shot the buffalo cleaned up the mess all by himself at his own expense while the townspeople stood on the bank and complained. The Indian was required to take his canoe and leave town. All the buffalo that were taken from water hunting were forgotten, but the great "Buffalo Splash Story" is still a topic of discussion by the townspeople.

Finally, the Agency formed a committee and met with the Indians. The committee said they would make laws that would allow for safer hunting. They put safety tips on arrows and demanded hard-toed mocassins on the feet of all braves — all at the expense of the tribe. The Indians protested that this would reduce chances of a successful hunt and said that the tribe had always followed their own safety regulations. But this plea fell on deaf ears, and the newly formed committee stayed in command (though they had never shot a buffalo themselves).

Although the hunts became more expensive, it looked like the tribe might be able to supply enough buffalo for everyone, and even have a bit left over to store for winter. Then, an evil spirit came on the scene. It was a leader from the Agency — good old "Trader Jackson." He cried that the depletion allowance should be taken away from the tribe and that the price be rolled back to $2 PB. The townspeople agreed with the Agency; and the action was taken.

So the beaten tribe put away their bows and arrows and returned to the reservation — never to hunt buffalo again. The following winter was bad, and all the townspeople starved to death. The little town of Whizzbang perished.

A Recession Summer

by Steve Townsend

If there had been space above I should have liked to title this confession "What I Did On My Summer Vacation Or, How I Became A Fugitive For Tearing The Entrails From A Used Car Salesman".

Understand that violence was never something that I felt particularly capable of, but in the dark recesses of our minds, there lurks potentials unbeknown even to ourselves. My only crime was to be so unfortunate as to think myself pure. Of my victimization you may judge for yourself.

I was somewhere between unemployment and ennui when I stumbled upon the realization that the only way to deal with this recession animal was to take it by the tail; really grapple with the bugger. I would pick up a waiter's spot at some chintzy tourist bar and generate enough tips to spend the last weeks of summer betting the ponies at Liberty Bell. With any kind of luck and a few good tip-offs I would go back to Juniata all set to weather the mountain winter in aristocratic confort. But first, I needed some wheels.

I was looking over a fine, 1957, powder blue convertable when I first encountered that ill fated evil geek of a car salesman.

"Sleek, huh? But it's not for you. I could tell right off that you were a man of Plans, of Potential, an entrepreneur in search of enterprise. What you want is something that will keep your overhead low. What you want is an import! Yes? No? Hot dog?"

This man was obvously an irrelevant loony, but his babble wasn't without a germ of truth. There was no room in my plan for extravagance, at least not until after I'd cracked a nut or two at the races.

The only import on the lot was a British Austin which, he assured me, was so dependable that, as a favor, he would stake his "reputation" and "life" upon it. That, at least, was a consolation. With his reputation not worth a goddamn he couldn't promise me much more.

I bought the car. The price was much steeper than I had anticipated, but things were tough all over and I never expected this savage scheme to be easy. I would have to edit my timetable to razor edge thinness: Hope for a couple of fast tracks over Labor day weekend and parlay my summer's wad into Big Bucks with a couple of keenly calculated Exacta wagers.

By the end of August I had amassed 450 green ones. Enough, given two 40 dollar pay offs, to see $80,000 before the sun set on Labor day! As I sped down the Interstate on my way to the track, I was confident in the notion that recession was merely an exercise in mass hypnosis, something ordered by Nixon in the last hours of his Presidency in order to have revenge. How could it be anythink else? IN 48 hours I would have enough cash to thumb my nose at undergrad degrees, grad degrees, professional training or any other kind of long term enslavement. I became wild with the notion of being a modern styled Horatio Alger. Yes, the cream would rise.

It was then that my motor mounts wrenched loose causing my entire powerplant to spill onto the concrete of the freeway exit lane. As I lurched back into traffic and started ricochetting off Cadilacs, I decided I would collect on the promise given me by that gin soaked sponge of a salesman only eight weeks before.

That is my story. Today, I live amoung you incognito, playing out my myth in hopes of avoiding detection. If there is justice I should be exonerated. However, I no longer have the power of spirit to believe. Even my dreams of teaming up with Patty Hurst have been cruelly wrecked. Oh, what summer can do to a Young American.

Campus Guide For Students Places To Go, People To See

BY John S. Porter

Where to go and who to see when you get there, is a concern for many Freshmen at Juniata College. (Although the following article will be of primary interest to Freshmen and Transfer students, Upper Classmen may be refreshed by glancing at it, too.)

When I arrived on Saturday, September 6, I was confused about where to go. The college had mailed literature that said, "all keys will be available at the Tussey Terrace," but they failed to mail any map to show where the building is located. I, and I'm sure a lot of other students (and parents), ran all around, asking different people about the location of Tussey T. Six different location were given to me. Needless to say, I finally found it, and got my key. Located at the North-Center of the campus (see map*), Tussey T. is still useful to many people (besides getting the right key). If you are having trouble with your roommate; neighbors; Resident Assistant; the heating; the lighting; etc. — Tussey Terrace is the place to visit.

The person to see, will probably be Mr. Berrier. If he can't help you (a very rare case), then he will be able to point out where to go — and who to see for help. All things considered, Mr. Berrier (in my opinion), is a very nice guy, one you ought to see — before you get into any trouble.

Moving on, one of the many things each of us does every day, is to eat. The place (on campus), to do this, is in Ellis Hall. Built in 1969, this beautiful building was planned — and still is — to be the center of our college campus. In this building are the: Bank and Post Office (side-by-side); the Book Store (south side of post office); Student Government (same side); and, the newspaper office of the Juniatian (north side of the post office). Just in Front of the post office, is the Lounge. Important for the colored television located there, the Lounge is also frequented by those offering rides, and by those looking for a way to get home. All of this is on the bottom floor of Ellis Hall.

On the second (or ground) floor of Ellis Hall, are the Kitchen and the Cafeteria. Also, there are two telephone booths, which every floor has. On the top floor, one can buy his own food (for a modest price), and eat in comfort. Adjecent to the top-floor cafeteria, is the information desk, and another lounge. Northerly are the Billard Room (pool and pinball); the Blueroom (where a lot of clubs meet); and on the south side — the Ballroom. Remember where you had your picture taken! It was in the Ballroom, on the top floor of Ellis Hall.

If you ever need anyone to talk to, or you want to meet someone really nice, talk to the Reverend Andrew Murray. His office is on the top floor

Access to Living

by Bob Meacham

The flow of energy through a system acts to organize that system. We, as both users and creators of that energy, should respond to our role in ways which serve to maximize the potential inherent in the system in which we live. The Whole Earth Catalog has in the past functioned as an evaluation and access device aimed at educating the individual of his power to conduct his own education, find his own inspiration, shape his own environment and share his adventure with whoever is interested. The last edition of the Catalog was its final. In closing, they encouraged others to initiate similiar services to help fill the informational vacumn left behind. This column will attempt to help fill that vacumn.

Helping to fill that vacumn is not an easy job. Energy flows in a number of vastly different forms. Interest is one such form of energy, for interest can quickly be transformed into motivation and motivation has been known to encourage behavior. Behavior sometimes brings results, hence the purpose is filled. This information is offered in the hope that it will bring facilitative results. If it doesn't seem revelant, tuck it away in the back of your mind. You might need it some day. All that is being asked is that interest becomes an expandable and productive energy source. Hopefully facilitative behavior will result.

The plant explosion is upon us. It is not an uncommon site to see people crusing down the turnpile surrounded by plants as if lost in the Amazon jungle. The plants are dry, but the luggage sitting on top of the roof doesn't seem to be surviving the rainstorm. So much for priorities. With traveling comes damage, wilting and the need for transplant. Often transplanting conditions are not ideal. You can't just transport half your backyard with you for the sake of usage of original soil. Transplanting becomes a drag and decisions made sometimes border on euthanasia.

Rest at peace. There is an answer. To avoid transplant shock, keep roots covered with moist towelpaper until you arrive at your destination. The next step is to "puddle" the plants. Place the roots in a thin mixture of natural clay and water for a day or two, then replant them giving them indirect light for the first fourty-eight hours. Your fatility rate should reduce substantially.

The above information and more can be obtained for a mere fourty cents from:

of Ellis Hall. Don't be frightened by his title, its traditional, even though he's not. Often, he is hard to distinguish from the crowds of students — he fits right in with them. He's not 'hung up' on ties and such, like other clergy are. Did you know that he has a street named after him? (He probably doesn't even know about Murray Avenue, located just to the North-East off the campus.

A few other people you should know: Mr. Shunk, Director of Financial Aid. Here is THE man for talking to you about receiving financial aid from the college, or about getting a job on campus. Also, he knows quite a few off-campus jobs. His office is located in Founders Hall — just ask for him, or his secretary, at the main desk, when you enter Founder Hall.

Mr. Nolan — Registrar — is the man to see about changing classes, or later on, about your grades. Just ask for him at the main desk in Founders.

Dr. Donald Hartman — Dean of Students — is a good person to talk to about any, general college problems. Known by most students as 'Terry' — he has an office also, in Founders Founders Hall.

Well, that's about all the space my editor will allow me to have. Next article: WJC radio station; the Lebrary; Brumbaugh Science Center; Good Hall; and Oller Auditorium. Hope you can find your way around a little better now, after reading this article.

Center Board Committee Encourages Suggestions

by David Corman

"Although we have been on campus three weeks and our campus activities program is underway, Center Board would like to take this opportunity to welcome to Juniata the Class of 1979 and to welcome back upperclasspeople."

I suppose you can consider the above an "official" welcome — though we on the College Center Board hope you really didn't need one to recognize that we have been (and are) working on things for you to do and see and hear and, importantly, to enjoy.

Now that may sound wishy-washy, but if you've read the Pathfinder or come to the Activities Fair last week in Ellis Hall you would have seen that campus social activities are our business, and that the Board's membership is primarily representative of you, the student body. Which is why we are interested in what you think of the events and activities sponsored by Center Board and what kinds of activities you like and want us to organize for you. We need ideas; we need your support in planning and directing activities; and we invite your criticism. As the Pathfinder reads, our standing committees are open with unlimited membership and their chairpersons need and appreciate your help and suggestions.

Center Board meetings are usually held every other week in Ellis Hall, and they are open to anyone who would like to attend. If you get tired of listening and have something to say, we will (gladly) do the listening for a while! (In fact, Center Board will be meeting this Thursday evening at 7 p.m. in the Green Room.) So come to Ellis Hall and talk with us; soon we hope to be located in our own office on the ground floor, but in the meantime come to our meetings!

By the way, there are a few things happening that Center Board wants you to know about (which I "better write, or else"):

1) ON Saturday evening (that's the 27th) at 10 p.m. in the Ballroom, there will be a Disco Dance. It's free.

2) Homecoming Weekend (October 10-12) is only two weeks away — we have some good things planned, but we need your invoivement to make them happen. There's going to be a parade; get your friends together and enter — let's give Huntingdon it own "Tournament of Roses Parade!" I am relativeiy sure that after Juniata's 9 to 7 win last Saturday over a good Denison team, the students and all others concerned have a good feeling about the rest of the up-coming season.

Before I start the meat of the article I want to mention that this opinion is not pointed at the players that take the field and play the game at present. In my opinion they are a good team and I wish them all the luck in this years football campaign. What does concern me are the multitude of ex-football players that are no longer in the game that are sitting in the stands, some even having left school.

A very quick and probable count reveals that six starters that played on the 1973 team, which was second in the nation among division three schools, are no longer participating in the gridiron contests. One of these players, who is not even in school anymore, holds a NCAA record, and several other ex-players earned Player of week honors at their respective positions. It should also be mentioned that all of thesee explayers referred to are, or would be, still eligible. There are many other people who are no longer playing that are not as much of standouts as these six ex-players, but who also experienced some difficulty in their Juniata football career.

One way to rationalize the situation I ahve described is to blame the people who no longer playing and call it a bad attitude. However, I feel there are too many good students here that fall into the category of ex-football players to warrant such an explanation.

An alternate opinion that I offer is that the coaching staff tries to run Juniata college's football program like a business. this is fine for a school larger than ours where college football is a money-making proposition. It doesn't seem possible to me that Juniata makes all that much revenue at football games to justify this attitude.

There also have been players that have been given the axe for personal problems that were not deemed an acceptable image of a football player. It is my belief and hope that the college experience should be a positive one, in as much as it is possible, and that problems and people are dealt with, not disposed of. This college advertises itself as a friendly, family like community to prospective students, and many activities uphold this image. The football program, unfortunately, in my opinion, does not fulfill this to the extent that it could.

America and consultant to the Ford Foundation's Fund for Advancement of Education. For the past year, he has also served as consultant to the Ford Venture Fund.

In addition, he has served as chairman of several accrediting committees for the Middle States and Western Associations of Colleges and Secondary Schools, as president of the Empire State Foundation of Independent Liberal Arts Colleges, and as a member of several other independent college commissions.

Dr. Binder has published two books, "Coal Age Empire" and a novel entitled "The Serbian Assignment," and numerous articles and reviews.

A member of the Episcopal Church, he is married to the former Grace I. Brandt, also an Ursinus graduate, and they have two children.

In accepting his new assignment, Dr. Binder said "My decision was not made lightly. My commitment to Whittier is strong, but I believe I have accomplished my goal here.

"Juniata's location in Pennsylvania, an area familiar to me over the years, its outstanding academic reputation in the sciences and in all the pre-professional areas of liberal arts education, and the strength of both its faculty and its board of trustees were major factors in making the decision.

"It is an honor to be invited by the trustees and by the advisory committee of faculty, students and alumni to serve as president of this distinguished college. As Juniata enters its second century, I shall do my best to justify the confidence these groups have placed in me. It will be good, finally, to be home again."

The Trustee Selection Committee, which began its presidential search in early April, was composed of seven members, including Dr. Baker and Lester M. Rosenberger of Narberth, vice-chairman of the board, as ex-officio members.

Joseph R. Good of Hollidaysburg, a Juniata trustee and former president of the Hollidaysburg Trust Co., coordinated the final committee efforts.

In addition, a 14-member advisory committee aided the trustee selection panel in reaching its decision. Composed of four students, three alumni and seven members of the faculty, the group prepared a statement of selection criteria which included desired professional qualifications, appropriate experience and "commitment to Juniata's ideals and purposes."

Juniata, a private, independent liberal arts college of approximately 1150 students, was founded in 1876 by several members of the Church of the Brethren and will celebrate its Centennial Anniversary next year.

New Flute Instructor

Diane Gold, graduate of the Eastman School of Music and Columbia University, has joined the Juniata music staff as flute instructor. She is interested in finding Juniata students, beginners or experienced, who would like private lessons and flute ensemble. Classical and jazz approaches can be used.

Ms. Gold is first flutist of the State College Symphony Orchestra and on the faculty of the Music Academy in State College. Her phone is 1-238-7492 and she comes to Juniata every Wednesday.

Mr. Ibrook Tower of the Music Department can also be contacted on other days for scheduling.

JC Edges By Denison in Opener

Juniata opened its 1975 football season by giving Denison University a defensive clinic enroute to a thrilling 9-7 victory at College Field.

Little did Indian kicker Stan Nosal know, as he teed up the opening kick-off, that some two hours later he would kick a school record 43 yard field goal to win the game for his teammates. The sophomore from Conemaugh Twp. High School became an instant hero when his long distance boot drifted through the uprights with 8:35 remaining in the game, and lifted Juniata from a 7-6 deficit. The kick seemed to go in slow motion, adding to the suspense, as it tumbled end-over-end, and finally managed to crawl over the cross bar. The spirited crowd of 2,500 went berserk as the Indians took the lead for the first time in the ball-game.

Denison scored first in the hard hitting fray, by taking the opening kick-off and marching methodically for 70 yards and a 7-0 lead.

The ensuing kick-off was returned by Freshman HB DeWayne Rideout to the 42 yard line, which gave the Blue and Gold excellent field position. The first play from scrimmage, a trick play that half the fans (and the officials I might add) didn't see, resulted in a 30 yard gain. But the drive ended as a Stan Nosal field goal attempt from 42 yards out went wide to the right.

While the Juniata offense spent three quarters getting untracked, the defense spent little time establishing itself as an immovable force. Captains Barry Hartley and Steve Lehman played havoc with Denison's offense, and were supported by a host of defensive stalwarts such as Mike Hars, Stu Jackson, and Don Page. Outstanding efforts were also turned in by Denis Burke, Bob Devine, Dave Cortazzo, Dave Nichols, Joe Kirshishnik, and Joe Weimer who as a unit represent possibly the most awesome defense the Indians have fielded in years.

After Denison's first quarter touchdown, the "Big Red" offense got no closer than the 38 yard line of Juniata. Freshman Tim Reed assisted the defensive unit indirectly by punting six times for an incredible 40 yard average.

The defense is also to be commended for silencing Denison's big gun on the ground, HB Jim Barret. Barret, who had run for 142 yards the week before in his teams, 14-6 victory over Marietta, appeared to be on the way to another 100 yard effort by grinding our 67 yards of college Fields turf at the half time break. But after intermission Mr. Barret could only muster 18 yards, as his team's huge horses were humbled down to size.

In the meantime, Juniata's Kris DeJeet exploded for 101 yards on 22 carries, and a 4.6 yard per carry average. Backfield-mates Daryl Long, DeWayne Rideout, and Al Lipstein accumulated 77 additional yards on the ground, and tight end Ed Flynn made a convincing impression in his first varsity start, while providing the offense with some sparkle. Ed ended up with 74 of Quarterback Scott Magley's 89 yards passing.

Juniata staggered into the fourth period, still losing 7-0, but in the middle of an offensive drive that started back at Denison's 40 yard line. Magley directed an assault on the Big Red defense, that saw the Indian offensive line open numerous gaping holes in the now exausted defensive front. Kris DeJeet lugged the ball to the 4 yard line and a first down, before Daryl Long bulled his way across the goal line for six points. With JC trailing 7-6, a two point conversion was attempted, but failed.

Denison could gain but one yard on their next series of downs, and were forced to punt. The punt was caught at the Denison 46, but a personal foul against the visitors vaulted the ball to the 31 yard line. The offensive charges pushed the ball 5 yards closer, to the 26, and then Stan Nosal was summoned to make history. Three points later, Juniata went into the lead to stay, and ultimately, on to their first victory of Coach Nadzak's newest campaign.

JC Trounces Frostburg U

by Al Kulp

Last Saturday, the Juniata Rugby Club traveled to Frostburg, Md. to play the Frostburg state Rugby Club. In the past, these two teams have met twice, with Frostburg soundly beating the J.C. ruggers both times. However, this time J.C. came out on top by a score of 32-22.

It was a good game for J.C. with both offense and defense showing considerable improvement over last year. Juniata's wing along with it's scrum were particularly impressive. The majority of the scrums were won by J.C. As soon as the scrum gained control of the ball, the wing would consistently gain good yardage on each run. This consistent yard gaining by the wing, coupled with the ability of the scrum to gain control of the ball, enabled the Juniata team to rack up a total of 6 tries. Skip Hartman, Tom Morris, Todd Price, Kent Price, Brian Ashworth, and Tom Terndrup each scored a try (worth four pts. each) for J.C. Four of the 6 conversions (worth two pts. each) were made by Al Kulp.

It's true that the team is off to a great start this year, but new members are always welcome. All you have to do is show up for practice which is held on the Intramural field in front of East Houses every Tuesday and Thursday at 3:30 p.m. See you there!

WJC Radio Station Brings News To Juniata Students

by John S. Porter

Have you ever wondered about what goes on inside the studio of W.J.C. (the college radio station)? I spent more than three hours learning about some of the operations of the radio station, from one of their 'disc jockeys' Steve Bekoff. He has his own shoe — The Becoff Show — which comes on every Mon., Tues., Thurs., and Fri., from 7 to 8 a.m. On Wednesdays, he performs from 7 to 9 a.m. Also, at times you will hear him filling in for other people who don't show up.

In the WJC news-room, there stands an U.P.I. news machine, spewing out news on paper, which reminds one of a ticker-tape machine at work. All of the latest news is sent over this machine. Steve says that he really needs the valuble news this machine gives him. But, sadly to say the people at WJC are planning to get rid of the UPI news machine. In its place, they are preparing to have an ABC Contemporary Entertainment Machine. While this will cost the station less, it will mean that every hour-on the half hour, ABC will cut in on the radio shoe, to make their news and entertainment announcements. WJC will have no say in this, once they install this machine. (At present, the disc jockeys can ignore the news that comes in from UPI.)

When you first walk (or stumble) down the stairs which lead you to the radio station (in the basement of Founders Hall), you notice a clean, pleasant, newly painted room. It has a couch to sit on, and bulletin boards to read while you sit. Behind a door is the news machine. Behind another door is a PEPSI machine. And looking through a window (adjecent to the tiny hall), sits the "radio freak" doin' his thing.

As you enter the hall, there is a sign which reads "on the air." When it is lit up, it means that the person at the microphone is talking "live" to all who are listing on that radio program. In the radio-broadcasting room, you see a soft, beautiful blue-red-and-greenrug. Neat, clean, white-painted walls, and many, many tapes and records can also be seen in this room. There are two light bulbs on the wall. One is red— which lights up when the broad-

Storming Fad It's Ridiculous

by Dave MacVeigh

9:50 p.m., Wed, Sept. 10, 1975. Once again the infamous Storming of the Arch has taken place. The Victors are already gloating about their Glorious Performance, in which hundreds of otherwise fairly intelligent students took part in an absolutely senseless orgy of flesh-and-bones destruction.

No one can say how many were hurt; it's sure thing, though, that every Fool who joined in on this Test of Masculine Prowess woke up sore the next morning.

Since we don't seem to be able to learn from our past experiences, are we necessarily damned to relive them? In the past, that is, at the three Storming to which I have been a witness, the basically powerless school officials have done little or nothing to prevent the Stormings. During the '75 Storming Mr. Berrier did what he could to try to keep injuries to a minimum: he asked the Valiant Warriors to keep it Cool. That wasn't enough.

A possible solution would be to have the RA's, in particular those living in Cloister, to call the Huntingdon police to the campus, who would then be empowered to arrest those taking part in the Storming on charges of disturbing the peace or some other admittedly trumped-up charge. It is doubtful that freshmen would fall prey ti the catcalls of the upperclassmen and accept the Challenge to Storm the Arch knowing that a possible consequence, in addition to numerous cuts and bruises (and worse)f would be spending the night downtown. And if the freshmen would not attack, there would be no Storming, and hence no injuries, no violence. Any better ideas on how to put an End to this Stupid Tradition?

Annual JC Homecoming To Be Held October 11

by David Corman

One more week until Homecoming 1975! We at the College Center want this year's celebration to be a special one— and we hope you will help us to make sure it is by getting yourself together and getting yourself involved.

The Homecoming Parade will be one of the highlights of the weekend, and also one of the events in which the entire college community can actively and creatively participate — if for no other reason than the sheer fun of it. Invitations have been extended to Huntingdon businesses and civic organizations, area high school marching bands, and campus clubs and organizations; and now we invite you, the students and faculty, as individuals to join us. Mini-floats, clowns, miscellaneous marching units. . . get your ideas and friends together and make something happen!

The parade will form at 10:00 on Saturday morning, October 11th in three divisions on 13th, 14th, and 15th Street between Moore and Mifflin Streets. At 10:30 the parade will begin, and proceed up Moore Street. It will turn right onto 18th Street, march to Ellis Hall and turn right on Scott Street. the parade will end at College Field. Entries will be accepted until the 10:00 formation time, and all entrants are asked to enter division formation lines from Washington Street. Contact Nancy Molnar, Box 321 if you have any questions — she will be glad to help.

Special features of the parade will include class floats in competition for a Juniata centennial trophy, the 1975 Homecoming Queen and her Court, past Juniata Homecoming Queens, the Juniata College Concert Band, four high school marching bands (to date), and a parade grand marshal (unannounced as yet).

This year's parade theme is "One Hundred Years at Juniata," and all classes (that means everyone, not only officers! !) are urged to "get into" preparing their floats. Class floats will be judged according to their aesthetic appeal, adherence to the parade theme, and originality in construction. The winning class will be announced at half-time during the Homecoming football game. (Coronation of the 1975 Homecoming Queen will take place also at half-time — court elections will be held on October 7th.)

So let's get with it, JC! ! It's everyone's chance to be "front and center" — to have a great time doing it! !

Be Responsible—It Pays

by Rob Lopresti

Responsibility frightens most people. Its much nicer to think about our rights then the duties that go with them. Yet they are the price we pay for living in society.

College policies are based on the idea of responsibilities. Students are supposedly mature enough to accept them, and therefore shouldn't be watched over like children. I've been wondering whether this assumption is valid. We seem to behave like children much of the time, then we react with whines and tantrums when we recieve our just reward.

There's nothing mature, or even rational about vandalism, but last year this campus was rampant with it. "Malicious mischief" is the police term for it, and that fits perfectly: it gives the impression of something done by a spoiled, impossible brat.

There's nothing the matter with having a drink (and one could say that the college's alcohol policy is maturing with time), but when its used to escape one's responsibilities, then its childish. A person who drives when he's had too much, or uses drunkenness as an excuse to annoy people is not an adult, whatever his age.

WJC's record collection may not be open to the disc jockey's this year, except on a very limited basis. This is due to the large amount of record thefts that occurred in the past. Too many people involved hadn't reached the stage of growth where one realizes that one doesn't have the right to take another's possession simply because one wants it. Now everyone who listens to WJC

'Saga' Of Patricia Hearst— Captured Female Terrorist

by Mark Wiener

The saga of Patty Hearst, the young, attractive heiress turned revolutionary and fugitive, has finally ended, or has it? Captured and in jail, she has pleaded innocent ot multiple charges, including assault with a deadly weapon, robbery, and kidnapping. With legal processes that could last for years, we may never hear the end of the naughty little rich girl.

What could account for the case's immense popularity? Well, to begin with, kidnappings of rich girls rank high among "favorite crimes", (there must be dozens of novels about it), and when a victim joins the kidnappers in a life of crime and running from the law, people are fasinated. Add to the plot over two million dollers worth of food for ransom, a bank robbing, a fiery shoot out and the death of six criminals, a nation wide search and a frustrated FBI, you have a book that would be a best seller.

After all of this, one doesn't know whether or not to feel sorry for Patty and/or Tania. Of course she could have been brainwashed into all of those things, and then on the other hand, she might have done them on her own free will. She is as controversial as her late grandfather, William Randolph Hearst, (after whom the movie classic Citizen Kane was based on). If you feel that she has been unjustly accused of the crimes she has been indicated for, you can console yourself with the fact that she will have the best defense money can buy. Then again, if you feel she has it coming to her, remember she was filmed robbing a bank and originally stated that she was doing everything with her own free will.

For now she seems relaxed and happy finally captured. Maybe that's what she always wanted.

by L. Whetstone

Once again I find myself at an impass in trying to determine if all the stories people convey to me are possible, let alone true. I am referring to some of the students on our campus that run over fire hydrants into signs and whatever else seems to be in their path of reckless abandon.

In fact some of these students on campus actually incurr quite sizable bills in the form of damage (actually restitution) or even the cost of hiring attorneys and paying fines. Can you imagine that?

At this point in my article I feel reasonably sure that you are trying to decipher what the hell I am talking about and just in case you haven't the topic is drinking and behavior.

As I'm sure most of the student body is aware, we at Juniata have faced a high degree of static on our desires to drink at our discretion and I feel sure that we all further know that the state of Pennsylvania is constantly attempting to lower the age so all persons 19 years of age and older can legally purchase alcoholic beverages.

This latter statement in itself really presents problems. So many of the students have presented such a poor track record in regard to their behavior while drinking that the administration in my opinion was forced to take the only viable alternatives that they had, which leaves us with our present drinking policy. I also believe that they would like nothing better than to allow us to conform to any lifestyle we desire, but how can you justify a loose or nonexistent drinking policy when a student under the influence wrecks into seven other students cars; a student under the influence tries to cyphon gas out of cars and ruins your paint job; when students steal furniture from the dormitory lounges for their rooms; and when students under the influence get into fights. I could continue to list more illustrations but I find the idea less than desirable.

We at Juniata actually map out the course we take in this matter, it can either be one of ease or one of problems. I personally like to have a beer as much as the next guy only I want to be sure that I am not going to be reprimanded in the process.

"I knew we would get flooded out!"

(Along Muddy Run)

by M. Saltzer

With the second recent attempt on the President's life, I imagine that the gun control advocates are up on their hind legs screaming for legislation to make guns more difficult to get. In fact there are many bills up before congress regarding gun legislation, spurned by the crimes that have been committed with guns.

A quick glance at the many deaths and crimes that guns, particularly handguns, have contributed to is enough for some people to be convinced that these items should be made illegal. I am not one of these people, although the two recent attempts on the President's life as well as other misuse of firearms does convince me that there is a sickness here in the American Society.

The public in this country, in general, worships violence, probably to a greater degree than christianity. People get enjoyment out of watching a quarterback get creamed in a football game, or Dave Schultz beating the life out of another Hockey player, or people thrown over the rails into the crowd during a roller derby game. We build these people that excel among these sports into stars, and probably unconciously worship them as heroes. The medal of honor is another aspect of our culture that rewards men for bravery above the call of duty, which translated means killing more of the enemy than believed possible, thus excelling at their job.

The point that I am trying to make by citing the above illustrations is that our society deems performance and violence a valuable asset to our way of life.

In my opinion firearms represent the underlying problems mentioned above, but do not cause the things such as assasinations that upset us. By legislating against guns, no matter what category one wants to talk about, we will only be eliminating the means, and not the problems underlying their misuse.

The above mentioned being the case legislating against firearms would do nothing more than welfare has to elevate the poor in this country to a respectable level of living. Such legislation would be like Federal subsidizing to an inefficient railroad to keep it running instead of working with them to balance things out and solve the problem more permanently. Half-assed legislation is something that we need no more of. If we want to stop criminal action with guns, lets go to the heart of the matter and work on changing the attitudes involved, instead of trying to deal with the manifestation of the behavior problem.

Access to Living

by Bob Meacham

For years we have thought of the sun as being strictly a fair weather friend, good only about five months out of the year and then only on cloudy days. Necessity is quickly changing this philosophy. After the Arab embargo of a year ago and the subsequent quadrupling of oil prices, advocates of solar energy years ago pushed off as quacks were suddenly being awarded credibility to their thoughts. Alternatives to oil as the answer to worldwide heating demands were needed and solar energy was awarded long deserved, but rarely awarded, attention. the catalytic agent spurring on this new found interest was the ability to translate the sense of solar energy to the cents of profits. Dollars and cents once again became the attracting agent when solar advocates, recognizing the opportunity for capital profit, changed their laboratory coats for business suits and started ventures to develop and market sunpower.

Bernard Sterler, the founder of Energetics Nine Inc., originally developed a system to harness the energy of the sun to power neon signs during the energy crisis. Realizing the economic gain in the future of solar energy, he has since sold several small solar water heating units as part of a combined sun-wind system for use in homes and small business establishments. He is quickly becoming rich.

The technology for harnessing the energy of the sun is simple, although the hardware can sometimes be very sophisticated. For heating, the rays of the sun are absorbed by large collector plates, usually covered by glass and made of aluminium. The heat is transmitted to the house by air or water circulated underneath the plates. Heat not used immediately is stored for later use.

For cooling, the process is much the same as that utilized in conventional systems, where a heat source is turned into a cold source by a generator, condensor, evaporator and an absorber.

The method has always been with us, but the ability to sell the method, until recently, has been lacking. Thomason Solar Homes of Washington, D.C. has recently built and sold several homes in that area that are completly cooled and heated by solar energy. The secret to his success, which currently provides him with an annual income of over $25,000, is in his selling pitch. Citing the initial cost effect as detrimental to selling, he goes on to explain how the initial coat does seem high enough to discourage buying, but seems less costly when viewed with the idea that that first cost covers heating and cooling expenses for the next twenty years. Compare that to the calculated cost (figuring in inflation necessitated by increasingly limited oil supplies) of heating and cooling a conventional home for the next twenty years and suddenly a Thomason Solar Home very reasonable.

A do it yourself home solar heating system would be very easy to construct, providing you have a dump truck and the availibility of a back up system for cloudy days. Water can be run over black, sun baked aluminum and glass roof panels. The water must then be drained into a large collector tank located in the basement of the will suffer because of some people's lack of maturity.

Now, granted that no one is completely mature (if I was I wouldn't have put this article off till three hours before the deadline) but life around here might be a little easier if we all tried to be a bit more considerate. And also remember, if you value the gains in freedom we have made on this campus: when children don't face their responsibilities Mommy and Daddy take away the rights that go with them. Lets not force the college to act in loco parentis.

One-eyed Gort Will Provide Entertainment This Weekend

by Michael Trim

First of all, I would like to apologize for the showing of "The Pink Panther". The lenses needed for the projectors to unsqueeze the picture were nowhere to be found, and neither was Mr. Stoner, the person who would have been able to tell us where they were. The Film Committee is sorry and hopefully it won't happen again. Secondly, the Film Committee would like to thank everyone for their support and turnout at the films. We hope that the Friday night films will be enjoyable enough to establish a filmgoing tradition on this campus once again, as it was three years ago.

This Friday night in Oller Hall at 8:15 the film "The Day The Earth Stood Still" will be shown. It is a fine example of the Science Fiction fad that produced hundreds of these films in the 50's. (C'mon science majors, this one's for you) It is the story of a spaceship landing right in the middle of Washington, D.C. As seems to be the custom in that town lately, nobody wants to pay any attention to what the space man says, so he is forced to find other ways to deal with the earth people to make them listen. Michael Rennie is the space man, Patricia Neal is the suspicious mother and Sam Jaffe is the trusting scientist. There isone other major character whose name is Gort. He is the one eyed robot in charge of guarding the ship. The movie was made in 1951 and should be a real lot of fun. We also have some cartoons with this one and all for only a quarter. (The films would be for nothing if we didn't have to make money to program more films.) Come and Enjoy.

caster is on the air. The other is yellow — this one lights up when someone is calling the station, by use of the telephone.

The number to call, to request a record or tape — or to complement or complain about the program, is: 643-5031.

"Every hour — on the half hour, the broadcaster will give the news and weather," according to Steve Bekoff. (Sometimes they don't always make it.) "Every hour — on the quarter hour, the person doing the show is supposed to do a PSA — public service announcement, "Sometimes, it is on cancer, drugs, alcohol, or just plain college announcements — where the next dance will be or when to get your picture taken," reports Steve.

All in all, WJC is a great station to listen to. You can hear it on 620AM or on 108 FM. Did you know that it is one of the two radio stations in Huntingdon? (WHUN is the other station.) So, if you have a clock-radio, set your dial to WJC. Steve Bekoff will be glad to wake you up, with his cheerful show, on WJC Radio, Huntingdon — Pennsylvania.

An obviously primitive fair weather heating system such as the one above will not provide heat for the masses, but it does serve to provide an example for alternative uses to natural energy. Alternatives such as this need to be investigated if rapidly expanding demands for energy persist to strain our planets ability to meet those demands.

Rugby Team Wins Again!

by Alan D. Wirt

The Juniata Rugby team charged to its second triumph of the season, by disposing of the Gaelic Rugby Club in Carlisle, 10-4. The Gaelic Club, made up of Mechanicsburg, Carlisle, and Dickinson College athletes defeated Juniat in their initial encounter of last year, but Sunday the Indians got revenge and kept their undefeated record intact.

While most of the Carlisle area was inundated with flood waters, the respective Rugby teams managed to find some high ground on which to play. Dry land was at a premium last week-end, but the field conditions were good, and one might have expected a high scoring affair. However, the Juniata offense, which scored six tries in last week's victory at Frostburg, was held to only two tries. The two tries (worth 4 points each) and a conversion (worth 2 points) proved to be enough to overcome the home team. Tom Morris scored Juniata's first four-pointer after some classy running by John Dalesandro. Al kulp added the conversion. Mark Dooley was responsible for the second scoring drive, which featured some great play by the forwards, as they pushed Mark across the goal line from a lineout play.

The Club's "B" teams also had a scrimmage, with the Juniata "B's" coming out on top 22-3. Jim Kistler has two tries, and Skip Hartman added a try of his own after a breakaway by George Kourakin. Brian Ashworth had a brilliant breakaway which set up another Indian score.

Coach Charlie Lerman didn't think his men played as good this week as they did in their earlier contest, but he did single out the forwards as playing especially well.

The Ruggers will have to put together a super effort next week if they are to chalk up their third win. They will travel to Lewisburg and take on the Bucknell Ruggers. Bucknell ranks as their toughest contest of the season according to Coach Lerman. Charlie commented, "The backs played good against Frostburg, and our forwards played good against Gaelic. If we put it all together next week, we'll have a shot at them."

Monsoon Season 'Stagnates' Juniata Indians' Bid For Win

Perpetual rains pelted the Juniata area for four days prior to the Indians' confrontation with the Albright Lions, and their practice sessions could not be carried out with full efficiency. However, kick-off time arrived in Reading last Saturday, both teams appeared ready, and the conditions were perfect for an evening college pigskin bout.

The entire first half proved scoreless for both J.C. and Albright, in what can be described best as a strickly defense-oriented struggle. Runners trudged onward under the lights, but no score for either squad could be registered.

The third quarter, however, opened up and the Indians and Lions began to explode up and down the turf, attempting desperately to tally some points on the score-board. The Lions took the honors first and commanded with a 7-0 lead when their defense snagged a Scott Magley pass on the J.C. 34 yd. line. They roared 34 yards in eight plays to score a touchdown, and add the point after. The Indians could not move the ball, but did exhibit their fine, goal-line defense when they later held the Lions on the fourth and goal situation on the J.C. one yard line. Juniata took over the ball, but Magley was sacked deep in his own endzone to give Albright a safety and a 9-0 lead.

The kickoff which followed put Albright back at their own 32 yd. line following a clipping call. Jim Gehret nabbed a Lion fumble, and the Indian offense returned to work its way to the Lion endzone.

With only 39 seconds gone off the final period, Magley hopped in the endzone on a 4th and 1 situation and Stan Nosal booted the extra point to make it a 9-7 ballgame. The next score came when Steve Jackson recovered a loose Albright pigskin setting up the Indians 22 yds. away from the endzone. Kris DeJeet ripped off some yards and was aided by a penalty which opened the way for fullback Darryl Long's 8 yard TOUCHDOWN blast. The 2-point conversion attempt failed; so with 5 minutes-54 seconds left to play, Juniata was leading by a shakey 13-9 tally. Albright, however charged back by picking apart the now "well burnt" J.C. defense and added another 7 pts. with just two minutes to go. Score:16-13.

The Juniata Indians were set back again, at the kick-off with a clipping penalty, and then an interception was run back 21 yards for a third Albright TOUCHDOWN. The score now stood at 22-13, Albright Lions in the lead. That seemed to be icing on the cake, until Magley was intercepted again, on the repeat of the previous score; as the Lions added dandies to the pastry, and 7 more points. Final score: Albright 29 — Juniata 13.

I think that after this, we at Juniata should give our football team a big vacation. That way, we wouldn't lose any more games, like the devastating defeat we just suffered, at the hands of Albright. Good luck, J.C. Indians, on your next game. Before you play anyone else, you'd better eat some WHEATIES.

Highlights of 1975 Homecoming

by David Corman

HOMECOMING 1975

This weekend will be one of the highlights of the centennial celebration for the Juniata College community. Center Board has planned what we hope will be an exciting and memorable homecoming program of events. Come out and join us.

The Dance

To begin the weekend, a Homecoming dance will be held in Ellis Ballroom on Friday night, October 10th. There will be live entertainment provided by "Stigwood James," reputed to be the "best band in State College " The music begins at 10:30 p.m. and will rock through the night until 1:30 a.m. Admission is free.

The Parade

Saturday morning, October 11th, the annual Homecoming parade will begin at 10:00 a.m. The parade route and time have been revised! Formation time will be 9:30 a.m. in the block area of Church Street, Mifflin Street, and 5th Street. No floats will be accepted after 9:30 a.m. The procession will start from that area at 10:00 a.m. and follow Mifflin street, turning right onto 14th Street and then left onto Moore Street. The parade will thenmarch up Moore Street, turning right onto 18th Street;and to Ellis Hall on Scott Street, where it will turn left and finally end at College Field. (The best views along the route are reported to be on Mifflin and Moore Streets.)

Grand Marshal for the parade will be H. Glenn Cunningham, member of the class of 1923 and member of Juniata's first football team. Also in the parade will be Juniata's past Homecoming queens, the 1975 Homecoming Queen and Court, floats, and various marching units. In addition to the Juniata College Concert Band, four area high school bands will march in the parade: Huntingdon Area, Central, Kishacoquillas, and Southern Huntingdon. (A word of appreciation to klare Sunderland ('56) for the vehicles carrying the homecoming entourage.)

"The bigger the better;" so if you want to enter and march in the parade, you still have time! And even if you're not in the parade, come and watch — it promises to be an event worth seeing!!

The Concert

For the end of a great Homecoming celebration, Center Board is proud to present, in concert, Steve Goodman: song writer, guitarist, and singer. The concert will begin at 8:00 p.m. on Saturday, October 11th, in Oller Hall. Advance tickets are available at the College Center Information Desk in Ellis Hall: students, $3.50; non-students, $4.00. All tickets will be $4.50 at the door. We hope you enjoy your evening!

The busy Admissions Staff takes time out for a pose.

Steve Goodman Appears In Concert Homecoming Week

Born in Chicago on July 25, 1948, Steve Goodman describes his background as that of "a Midwestern, middle-class Jewish family, as normal as you're going to get." Part of that context, from his earliest years, was music: "I started with pop radio, with rock 'n' roll and early '60's pop," he recalls. But the spark for performing really began with the onset of folk music as a pop force in the early and mid-'60's, prompting Steve to begin playing guitar at 13. "I found the performers that are generally labeled folk, Bob Gibson, Josh White, the musicians of those generations. And then I found out who they'd listened to." That process led Goodman to roots artists like Big Bill Broonzy and Woody Guthrie.

During high school and college, Goodman continued to absorb a wider range of influences, including country and blues, the latter a staple of Chicago's urban culture. From listening to playing, and from playing to composing, Steve's growth continued. "I was at the University of Illinois in '65," he would later remember when asked to pinpoint his earliest songwriting influences. "I listened to a lot of Hank Williams and Jimmie Rodgers, those guys that everyone lists as stock references. Well, guess what: those are the guys that wrote the book on it."

As performing, practicing and composing demanded more and more of Goodman's time, "I got to the point where it was the only thing I liked to do." By the late '60's, Steve began performing at folk festivals and clubs, both in the U.S. and overseas. In Chicago, he emerged as a prime mover in Chicago's healthy club scene. At the same time, he kept his bills paid in some more anonymous projects: "I did a lot of commercial jingles in Chicago," he remarks. "Maybelline Blushing Eye Shadow paid the rent for awhile when nothing else was happening."

Steve recorded his first album, SteveGoodman, in 1971. Critical praise greeted the album's release, and was generated as well by Goodman's growing reputation as a live performer. During 1972, Steve's "City of New Orleans" was recorded by Arlo Guthrie. The song was a national hit, earning Guthrie his broadest acceptance to date and helping to further establish Goodman as a writeh. That year, Steve's second album, Somebody Else's Troubles, was released.

Goodman's dissatisfaction with his recording situation led him to focus increasingly on live performing; since '72, he has toured steadily. His virtuosity as a guitarist and singer, and the prevailing warmth and humor of his writing have enabled him to fill clubs and concert halls consistently.

During 1974, Steve began preparing for his return to the studio, assembling his own songs, as well as classic folk and rag tunes, collaborative works (with Jimmy Buffett, Bill Swofford and David Amram) and songs by john Prine and Mike Smith. Signed to Elektra/Asylum Records, Goodman produced his third album, Jessie's Jig & Other Favorites, for release on the Asylum label. Recorded at Chicago's Paragon Studio, the album has been recorded with an array of musicians that reflects Goodman's own diversity: In addition to contemporary studio veterans like Hugh McDonald, Shelly Plotkin, Jeff Gutcheon and Steve Burgh, Steve's collaborators include fiddler Vassar Clements and Steve Burgh, Steve's Collaborators include fiddler Vassar Cements, harmonica player Saul Broudy, mandolinist Jethro Burns (of Homer & Jethro) and string band players Carl Martin, Ted Bogan and Howard Armstrong.

Steve Goodman will appear in concert on the Juniata Campus on Saturday evening, October 11 th, at 8:00 p.m. in Oller Hall. Advance tickets are available at the Ellis Information Desk: students, $3.50; non- students,$4.00. All tickets will be $4.50 at the door.

New Faces - New Tactics

by Perry Habecker

Juniata needs more students. Even an empiricist such as myself can readily see that enrollment has dwindled, many upperclassmen have left, and the freshman class is not as large as previous freshman classes. Even though the trend towards a decreasing application: enrollment ratio is occuring in all but the big name schools, the discouraging fact is that the other schools can at least fill out to capacity. . . I have more than a passive interest in the admissions department, and I felt as though I was knowledgeable as to how admissions operated. An interview with Mr. William Asendorf corrected my misconceptions.

The most profound message conveyed to me was that "it takes more than six people in one office to bring in a whole freshman class". Well, I guess seeing this statement in print makes it seem a bit trite, but I had never before realized the importance of reputation and alumni.

So what are these new tactics? you may now ask. The number one game plan is the assignment of office personnel to regional districts. The person assigned to a district is expected to become familiar with all the secondary schools in the area and the prospective students also within that area. This adds a personal touch in that telephone followup calls are used to inform the prospective student of classmates who are also interested in Juniata and to remind him what JC has to offer. This "personal touch" is another point of emphasis within the admissions department. You know, convincing the prospective that he isn't just a number at Juniata.

Once these district contacts are established (and this will take a few years to properly implement) then admissions personnel will be freed to move into newer territory. Thus it will eventually satisfy Dr. Binder's hopes of reaching New England, Virginia, and Ohio.

The second strategy, of tantamount importance to the first, is to identify and incoctrinate influential Alumni (doctors, clergy, and teachers) in the ways of the "new" program. Whereas JC has always provided a decent, livable campus, the academic program has changed considerably.

With a good attitude about Juniata it is not at all difficult for alumni and students to generate inquiries from their home towns. It is the inquiry that is of primary importance. Admissions is then able to provide the information and encouragement.

In order to accompiish these goals, two new positions have been created in the admissions department. Bob Dambach, formerly of Newark and Whippany, N.J., is a 1973 grad of the University of Dayton. He recently earned his master's degree from the university of Iowa (speech and dramatic arts). He has worked as a college radio broadcaster and is very much interested in radio. David Diercksen, also from New Jersey (West Caldwell), is a '74 graduate of Westminster. He spent last year interning in student affairs at the University of Pittsburgh while earning his master of education degree. Jean Pollock is also new to the admissions office. Many readers will recall that she is a JC 1975 alumna. A native of Abbottstown, she "emphasized" in philosophical psychology and was active in many campus committees.

Colleges can no longer sit back and expect people to come pommeling on the door wishing to gain entrance. Prospective students must be solicited and convinced that Juniata has something to offer them. (See also; Newsletters, Interviews, Alumni meetings, and Open Houses.)

POE - Another Name For A Major

by T. Michael Kutz

My high school treated its pupils as non thinking creatures. If they wanted to do one thing, they took one package of courses; if they wanted something else they took a different package. Thinking by the pupils was kept to a minimum, the system made the decisions. I passed through this system, taking the "academic package" and, in my senior year, started my shopping for a college (that being the logical extenstion of my course package). Most of the schools I looked at seemed based on the same principle; the student is non thinking, decisions must be made by the system. But I found one college that was different. It assumed students to be "developing human beings." As such, they were considered reflective, interpretive and capable of making decisions. Because of this assumption, the educational program was designed to give the student the freedom to practice these human charactteristics. Included in this "human education program" was a program of emphasis to be written by the student. The attraction was irresistible — in 1972 I came to Juniata.

Now it is 1975 — the education program seems different. The expianation of the POE is still the same. It consists of 15 units of related studies planned by the student. The claim is still made that the POE is different from a "major".

The reality however, appears to be different. Some departments have got into the habit of handling some areas such as graduate school as teaching. But, the student should be made to those students who are interested in a certain area, and steps should be taken to make sure students understand that certain requirements must be met to go into some areas such graduate school on teaching. But, the student should also be aware that her or his program is not just a set of units listed by a department. The student writes the program of emphasis, not the department.

It is not just here however, that reality is missing the goals of Juniata's "human education". We, as students, seem to have accepted the idea that the POE is just another name for a major in one department. Last week I became both upset and depressed when a freshman asked me what was my "major". He then went off talking to a transfer student saying that his "major" was this and she replying that her "major" was that. This isn't a phenomon of new students either.

Letters to the Editor

Letters to the Editor should be addressed to: Editor, The Juniatian, Box 667, Juniata College, Huntingdon, Pa. 16652. The editors reserve the right to print only non-libelous and responsible content and to edit all letters and commentaries submitted to The Juniatian. The staff also reserves the right to publish all full signatures unless the writer can supply valid reason for omitting his name. It is also requested that all letters be double spaced with 70 spaces per line.

To the editor:

"Assassination— It's Becoming A New American Pastime?" (Juniatian 9/25/75) rings of tainted logic and fascist assumption. If one is to assume that political assassination is the work of "depraved psychopaths" and "deranged persons" as Mr. Wiener purports, one must also assume that such deeds are irrational and possibly motivated by the unconscious mind. Wiener also suggests that politics may be the root reason behind the plot to kill. If this is in fact the case, the assassination may very well be grounded in a rational conscious thought process. (Note the assassination attempts on the lives of such men as Alexander II, Mussolini, and Hitler.) Political assassination is often the work of "Normal" men and not the work of "nuts".

What is a depraved psychopath anyway?

We'll get you yet,

Underground Sam

that this mob violence should be allowed to continue. Although I am not a logician, their arguments impressed me not in the least. Perhaps the arguments did have some logic to them, but their methods of arguing was on a much lower level: "MacVeigh is a. . . ." (the reader will please fill in the space with the appropriate phrase or phrases). Nothing more than merely pointing out what, to me at least, has been obvious for years was said. I doubt further that anything will be said; people have a tendency to disagree without giving reasons.

Because the nature of the reaction (it involved an attempted depantsing which I admit was meant only as a joke), I have become more convinced that the students who will participate in future Stormings only make a mockery of their roles as responsible people. Or perhaps they are by nature irresponsible. (That was a mistake, saying that. Hey, does anyone want to earn some cash on the side working as a bodyguard?)

Dave MacVeigh

To Whom It May Concern:

I wish to publicly apologize to the entire college community for attempting to breal Mountain Day. What could have been in my mind when I crossed the quad and tried, yea, actually jiggled the library door. Why was I not with my fellows, good sports all, airing out my cold in the morning dews and damps? How could I think of wasting my time so frivolously in the library when I should have been soberly contemplating the Mountain Day?

I am willing to abase myself before the community in the hopes that others will come forth and testify. Perhaps the Holy Team Spirit will then descend upon us all.

George Allen,
Susan Hochberg

To the editor:

in response to my article which appeared in the Oct 2 issue, I have received a number of comments, all fo the unfavorable. A solution to this problem does not appear to be in the offing. The students who have spoken, indeed argued, with me about the Great Tradition of Storming the Arch are quite convinced

Activists On JC Campus

by Karen Philhower

Ms. Neal met us at the door. "I'd like to begin by saying 'don't move or we'll blast your head off'." She looked quite capable of carring out her words so I made a serious effort at not moving. After a mild frisking we were invited in. Ms. Biggs said, "We're extremely flattered that we were approached by a paper of such outstanding reputation."

They all lit up cigarettes simultaneously. You couldn't help but notice that they were all wearing scarves. I opened up the interview by asking the question all of campus has been asking; "Is it true that this apartment wears scarves to show their backing of the FREE PATTY HEARST MOVEMENT?" Ms. Blum answered my question. "Yes, we found that during this rainy season we were always wearing scarves so we decided to dedicate the effort to the FREE PATTY HEARST MOVEMENT." Miss Hearst would have felt honored I'm sure.

"How active is your branch of the organization?" I asked. Ms. Stone who had been silent up until this moment (amazing) said, "We're planning some group participation activities. Any campus revolutionaries are welcome to join in the fun. Our first project will be to the robbery of Juniata's bank. . .or possibly the business office— I have connections there." "It seems to be the only way we'll ever be able to pay our phone bill", Ms. Messick told me. Ms. Randall added "We also intend to confiscate meal tickets in order to feed the hungry. . in other words, all our members."

"How much support does your branch of the movement have here on Juniata's campus?" I wanted to know. "More than you'd believe" I was told. Ms. Randall closed the interview by saying, "We're always looking for new members. And we'll accept any donations. . . money, guns,. . . scarves." As I was walking down the stairs I could hear the echo of their final "FREE PATTY!"

JC Centennial Initiates New Plays

The centennial year is going to be the busiest one in memory for the Juniata department of Speech and Theater: three major productions are planned in addition to an all-campus extravaganza on Founders, Day, a high school drama competition in the spring and a number of smaller projects.

Tryouts for the first of the major productions, Kurt Vonnegut's Happy Bithday, Wanda June, will be held tomorrow, Friday the 10th, at 2:00 in the Ellis Hall mini-stage. As usual, students, faculty and staff are invited to perform and to work on the various production crews. Anyone who would like to participate but who cannot make the Friday afternoon session should contact the play's director, Bruce Davis, before the middle of next week. Final casting decisions will be announced next Wednesday.

Wanda June is a play about heroes in the modern world— it asks, among other things, whether we can still afford the luxury of admiring the kind of men that western peoples have bestowed their highest praise on since the time of the ancient Greels.

The characters are a typically Vonneguttian crew: a central figure whos is part Odysseus, part Papa Hermingway; the pilot who dropped the bomb on Nagasaki; a vacuum-cleaner salesman; a woman making the tradition from carhop to (nearly) liberated woman; and a motley heavenly host, including an amiable war criminal and the title character, and eight-year-old girl smacked down by a Good Humor truck on her birthday. The play is a comedy.

There are two nice parts for women, five for men, two for children and lots and lots of work for stage crews and technical people. Rehearsals will start October 20, and the performances will take place on December 13th and 14th.

Students who have too tight a schedule to squeeze in a play this term might budget their time towards participation in one of these other theatrical presentations:

February 1st and 2nd—Black Good Friday: A Lincoln Remembrance. Clayton Briggs, Public Information Director Charles Pollock and Prof. Earl Kaylor are collaborating on an original scrip centering on the assassination of Lincoln. The production will blend live actors with slides and motion-picture sequences. Prof. Briggs will direct.

May 1st—Founders' Day presentation. Founders' Day has been transplanted to May 1st this year, and will be the major celebration of the college's centennial. Background research is under way for an original script for an evening of readings, drama and music evoking the national and local milieu in the year Juniata was founded.

May 9th and 10th—The Contrast. Written by Royall Tyler in 1787, The Contrast is believed to be the first comedy written in the U.S. The contrast of the title is that between the powdered-wigged and white-hosed citizens of the new nation and the more rough-hewn emerging American types. There are parts for ten actors. Prof. Goehring will direct.

Fuller details on these last three productions will appear in the Juniatian as the time for assembling casts and crews arrives.

This issue being the third of the year, I think that perhaps it is an opportune time to explain my philosophy about writing this column so you may know what to expect from me a writer, and what I think is food taste in writing and what is not. I will try and use the past two weeks columns to exemplify the points that I am trying to make.

First of all I think that this column should be a controversial one. I do not want that everyone should agree with my opinion, however, I do expect that people who read these articles should think of the issues involved in a new or at least a different point of view or develop their present arguments into stronger ones. In last weeks column I argued against gun control as I felt it was an ineffectual way to deal with the problem of violence in our society. There still are strong arguments for gun control that can be made and if you as a reader have good reasons for supporting such measures, good, that makes me much happier than having blind followers. In summary of this point then reasoning, some support for statements made and some raw thoughts are three of the things that I think a good column should have in itself and should produce in the reader.

The fourth and last thing that I think an article must have is taste. Although many times you will find me attacking things that I feel are inadequate, my purpose is not to have any members of the program under fire, harbor ill feelings towards me or the paper, but rather I would hope that if they find what I say to have a grain of truth in it to work to correct the problem. If someone feels that my points and conclusions are unfounded, my box number is 164 and I invite you to let me know.

As a rule, however, I will try and have some supportive facts behind what I am saying. Also the way some things are said have a lot to do with whether the statement is offensive or a differing controversial opinion.

In talking with the editor last week we both agreed that the article covering the Albright-Juniata football game was a well written article, however, lacked good taste in it's assessment if the situation.

When dealing with people, who do a great deal of good for this school, put in a lot of work every week, and puts the results of their week's work on display every Saturday afternoon, I feel, and I believe the editor does also, that negative comments, such as were made, should be avoided, and we are both very sorry that they occured, as they were unfounded. I hope in the future when organizations are confronted with criticisms that they are presented in a constructive way.

WJC Now Serves Huntingdon

by Dave Holl
Station Manager - WJC

Now that another year on the time clock towards graduation has begun ticking away, allow me to cast a few reflections on Radio at Juniata College.

To begin let's talk transmitters for AM carrier current in the dormitories, a subject which has over the years proven discusting, assimine, repulsive, and downright stupid to some who fail to understand. Frustrating, nerveracking, confusing, and absolutly absurd to those who do understand but yet fail to witness results which should have occured with their work — theoretically at least. Still to others it's been hopeless, annoying, and above all expensive. Why all the adjectives? To hopefully provide empathy for a problem which has plagued radio at Juniata since we were all still wondering whether or not we'd pass our driving test. Unbeknowns to many, WJC has been closed two times in the past four years by the FCC. You know what people say about the number three, thus our caution and apprehension exibited in adjusting those transmitters to "legal levels". Incidentally, as you've probably noticed, reception is exceedingly poor at legal levels. As it was put to me last spring by an FCC official, "Carrier current is not one of the most appreciated techniques of broadcasting by the commission. Did you ever consider free air educational!!? Et Tu Brutea, then fall Ceasar! Score another on the Funny Candy Corporation. Despite numerous setbacks we've made surprising advances counter attacking the confusion and obstacles of the past. All AM transmitters are now on except South and Lesher which serve a unique problem to our growing list of unique problems. We hope to have those difficulties in check by the new year however. Some helpful hints on reception are to, number one, reverse polarity on your AC plug. If that fails then, number two, turn your radio 90 degrees on its axis in an attempt to zero in the field. Should you Nodle Compredde' ask anyone with their program in physics or drop us a note at Box 1005 and we'll see you are offered some assistance. What's the moral of all this? Simply, as Don Quixote supposedly said, "for each time we fall we shall rise again." Hopefully that won't become a habit, falling that is!

Secondly, allow me to reflect briefly on a somewhat more enjoyable topic. The purpose of WJC, I maintain, as does the station constitution, that our purpose is threefold. One, to serve as an information center for communication to the listening audience. Two, to serve as an entertainment source for our staff and the listening audience. And finally, third, to provide education, once more, for the listener as well as the staff members involved. We are the students station but we serve more than simply Juniata College. Due to the fact that we are on the Huntingdon TV Cable we also must serve the Huntingdon Community at large. Thus you will witness the emergence of our newly formed local news team. We're here to serve your interests and the communities, so needless to say, as our Sign On and Sign Off do say, if you have any comments good or bad send them once again to Box 1005 and I'll personnally respond.

Not wishing for this to turn into an advertisement, where it seems to be quickly digressing, allow me finally to say that we, like all organizations on campus, need your time and efforts in whatever quantities and areas you can deliver. Get in touch with us whatever your field of consentration.

In conclusion, I'm not going to offer any words of phenomenal wisdom, or any major revelaton. I just simply wish to convey the pride we have in radio at Juniata after 21 years of broadcasting. Years that were not without problems, nor without people confident they could solve them.

Legal Internship Offers Worthwile Involvement

by Steve Holsinger

There is a new course offering at Juniata for those students interested in law and the legal profession. Although its first term of existence is not yet complete, the Legal Internship promises to be a very successful and informative addition to the social science curriculium. The main purpose of its development was to give the pre-law student the opportunity to work right along-side the lawyer; to observe office procedures; to become familiarized with the numerous legal volumes available to the lawyer; to observe court procedure; and to become accustomed to the very formalized and unique legal jargon.

In addition to this "on the job" training, the participating students meet at regular intervals with Professor William Vocke to discuss, as a group, the experiences they receive with their prospective attorneys. This type of exchange tends to highlight the differing styles of attorneys as they go about their typically hectic scheduals. It highlights, also efficiencies and inefficiencies in legal procedure, and enables the student to draw some conclusions as to how he or she would react if they were placed in a similar situation. Mr. Vocke then probes a bit deeper and discusses many thought-provoking questions concerning lawyers and their profession in today's highly specialized society. Such questions may deal, for example, with the large numbers of lawyers that become involved in politics (ie. Why are lawyers more likely to enter politics than non-lawyers? Once in politics, does the attorney's former legal career affect the way in which he votes on an issue? Observing the lawyer provides a thorough knowledge of the base on which law is practiced, while the discussion sections with Mr. Vocke probe beneath the surface of the legal profession. When combined, a very thorough and well rounded study of law is developed.

The attorneys in Huntingdon County have been both co-operative and helpful in the planning of this new internship. There are four students who are participating this term with four fine lawyers. Dan Bausher is working with Stewart Kurtz, a graduate of Villanova University School of Law; Mike McElhinney is with Charles Swigart, a graduate of the University of Virginia School of Law; Lowry Whetstone is working with Judge Morris Terrizzi, a graduate of the Dickinson School of Law; and Steve Holsinger is with Newton C. Taylor, a graduate of the Duke University of School of Law. These three attorneys and Judge Terrizzi, along with Professor Vocke, have helped to make the Legal Internship a success. Without their interest in the college community, the prelaw students at Juniata would never have been afforded such an opportunity.

POE — Another Name

People who have been on campus for a while will ask the question; "What's ya major?" It seems stuck in our minds that we are to be in one department taking all its courses.

This idea even appears in this fall's HEA unit. There is a final paper dealing with three questions, one of these concerns the POE. The question started out OK, "How do the disciplines of my POE. . ." but the "s" is soon dropped from disciplines and HEA students find themselves having one department.

The one discipline method seems to be the only one accepted. While I think this is fine for those who want it, it should not become the "only way". The student should be allowed to create her or his own program, combining different disciplines if desired. To permit the POE to become another name for a "major" would do a disservice to the students of this college.

"Do They Make It Together?" What A Ridiculous Question

by Steve Townsend

There was once a point in our lives when we sat in our rooms trembling with trepidation over the notion of actually entering a four year institution of higher learning. And while we worried, our parents were on the phone to just about every relation we had ever encountered boasting about how their intellectually prodigious offspring was about to enter the ranks of doctors, lawyers and other such respectable types.

But though we couldn't realize it at the time, there was a certral irony in this situation. Most certainly it should have been we who were rejoicing because, if college offered anything that our young minds could relate to, it was the opportunity to lose our virginity. And lose it we did!

By the time we had become seniors questions such as "Do they make it together?" were completely ridiculous. Of course they made it together, and probably as often as possible to the great dismay of the occupants of the room below. Without a doubt our education had widened to include a liberal knowledge of the opposite sex. The irony of a few short years ago had resolved itself. Regretfully, however, our sexual situation of today is just as ludicrous because now we find ourselves in the awkward position of not being able to admit its existence.

Imagine what would happen if you went to a school official and requested single beds because you felt that the bunks were unable to hold up under the stress. And with what kind of response do you suppose the parent would greet you, if, upon your return home, you asked them whether or not your order from Contraceptive of the Month had arrived?

The list could go on and on for these are very real contingencies. The new irony in which they place us is that we may not, in all good propriety, deal with mature matters in a mature way. This new irony, however, will not prove so humorous as the last for it will work a subtle kind of evil upon us all.

At the end of our four years here we will have become a perfect little group of two faced foolers. Commencement exercises will see us complacently accepting our diplomas and paying studious attention to a string of addresses that are alltogether too trite, but underneath this mask of acedemic serenity, our bodies'vital currents will have us wondering just how long the ceremony will keep us from that adorable lover.

Field Hockey

The women's field hockey team led this year by co-captain Jacque Prentiss and Kim Norris had their first two games last week against Bucknell University and Frostburg State College. The varsity team lost to Bucknel in a close game by a score of 2-1. The one goal for the JC offense was scored by left inner, Pam Julius. On Friday the team suffered a second close setback against Frostburg State. The score was 2-1 again and the JC goal was made by Bev Martin. The Junior Varsity team also met two defeats last week: Bucknell 8-0 and Frostburg 5-0. This week the team travels to Indiana University of Pennsylvania on Wednesday and hosts Shippensburg State College on Monday at 3:00 and Lycoming on Saturday at 10:oo. Come to the games and support the women's field hockey team.

The Women's Field Hockey Team is on the move for another fine season.

J. C. Ruggers Are Defeated

The Juniata Ruggers dropped their first contest of the season this Saturday at the hands of a powerful Bucknell club 21-0 in Lewisburg, Pa. The loss, coupled with two season opening victories dipped the Indian's record to 2-1.

Untimely injuries at the beginning of the game to forwards Todd Price and Mark Dooley forced the Blue and Gold charges into an unfamiliar game plan. Dooley was taken to the hospital for x-rays as a result of a neck injury, that occured when he got in the way of a misguided foot. Price suffered a leg injury, but stayed in the game at a different position than usual. Since no substitutions are allowed in Rugby, Juniata played with a man disadvantage and with players reshuffled into unfamiliar positions.

The Juniatians never got in the groove and were outclassed in all departments the rest of the way. Bucknell's large and experienced squad gave JC a good lesson in the finer points, but if the past is any guide— Charles Lerman's squad will certainly benefit from the competition with such a tough club.

Coach Lerman cited Bucknell's ability to keep the ball moving as one of their strong points, and emphacized that they were definately the strongest opponent on Juniata's schedule.

Juniata will host Indiana University of Pa. in their initial home stand of the year this Sunday. Athletic Director Walt Nadzak has informed officials that if the ground is dry at College Field the game will be there, otherwise Sherwood Field will be the game-site.

All eyes are intent as the line-out proceeds.

JC Indians Beat Frostburg Team

Juniata capitalized on their opponents mistakes in the first half of Saturday's game, as they stormed to an easy 27-16 victory over Frostburg State, and earned their second victory in three starts. A dropped punt, a fumble recovery, and an interception all in the first half got the Indians on the right track again as they bounced back from their loss to Albright of last week.

Quarterback Scott Magley connected on 5 of 8 passes for 61 yards and led off the scoring with a one yard plunge while the game was still young.

Frostburg's Tom McMann lost the handle on a punt which was recovered by juniata's Bob Cunnion at the Marylander's 35 yard line. George Oravec pulled in an 18 yard pass from Magley two plays later for the second talley.

Back at his own 25 yard line, Frostburg tailback Joe Dodson fumbled the ball, and Steve Lehman pounced on it to give over from the three to make the score 20-0.

The final score was set up when Safety Denis Burke intercepted a stray Frostburg aerial on the 25 yard line of Frostburg. Tight end Ed Flynn grabbed a 12 yard scoring pass from Magley to give the Blue and Gold a commanding 27-0 lead. Stan Nosal accounted for three points via PAT, for his contribution to the scoreboard.

Frostburg's points came on a late second quarter touchdown run, and a TD strike from seven yards out during the fourth period. Frostburg scored a two point safety on a controversial call in the closing minutes, but the game was well out of reach.

Juniata faces Susquehanna U. this week-end for Homecoming.

JC Cross Country Team Is Off and Running Great

by Evafelea Lyras, "Teddy"

The Cross-Country team, coached by Carl Meditch and Donald Mitchell started its 1975 season with a win over Albright College. Senior Jack McCullough led his team to victory by running the 5.4 mile coursein 29 minutes and 50.5 seconds, setting the record for Albright's new course. Capturing second place was Paul Wilson with a time of 31 minutes and 9 seconds. Also placing for the Indians were fifth place Dave Parker, Steve Hooper and Mike Bodley tieing dor seventh, and Dave Quig for eighth place. Austin Robisson came in fifteenth.

Coaches Meditch and Mitchell foresee a very favorable season in front of them if the team continues to improve at the same rate. The Susquehanna-St. Francis meet, which will be run on Homecoming Day, is one of the toughest of the season along with Delaware Valley and Gettysburg. With an all-out team effort the team has a fantastic chance of beating these three teams and becoming the champions.

Because of a new ruling this season, only 9 runners are permitted to run the away meets. The Juniata team consists of 11 runners, but all will have a chance to run before the end of the season. Other runners on the team are Brian Smith, Adam ?, Evagelia Lyras and George Anderson.

With a very promising season ahead of them, the runners have a great chance of becoming the champions; so lets all wish them luck and support them by cheering them on to victory during Saturdays meet.

Women's V-ball - Tough Season Ahead

by Marge Morgan

Power volleyball has come to Juniata in the form of the Juniata Women's Volleyball Club. This year's team is coached by JoAnne Reilly and includes Cathy Crouse, Cheryl DeArmitt, Priscilla Grove, D. J. Lingafelt, Gail Lodge, Peggy Manz, Marge Morgan(co-capt.), Cindy Piccirilli(co-capt.), Jane Robinson and Linda Shaw.

The club's schedule includes matches with St. Francis, Wilson, Indiana and possibly Dickinson and Altoona-Penn State. In a scrimmage early in September with Altoona the team looked well balanced and competitive. Balance is the team's strongest point with lack of height and experience the major negative factor.

The team practices 3 or 4 times a week and is expecting a good showing in our first game at St. Francis on Wednesday, Octobe 8. Our home opener is on Monday evening October 13 at 7:00 against St. Francis in Memorial Gym, so come out to watch a good volleyball game and cheer the team to victory.

POE Review — A Royal Pain

by Suzi Baker

After attending a recent program review session for seniors, I have to say "fap" and other expletive deleteds. In case you are unaware of what the program review is let me elaborate. The program review, as stated in the information sheet given to all seniors, is "the culmination of your educational experience at Juniata College." This is the administration's definition. From a student's viewpoint it's a royal pain in the ass; another requirement to consume your precious few remaining days at old J.C.

I realize some of my contemporaries will take issue with this opinion. After all, the program review should be the culmination of your academic life. Well, I would opt for an unculminated experience for a number of reasons.

First of all, the stated purpose of the program review is to evaluate the student's achievement in his college program. I believe that your academic record speaks for itself. I feel this four-year record is a more accurate evaluation of your achievement than a day of bullshitting with your advisors.

The requirements of the program review are five. Students are required to deal with the subject matter of their program of emphasis (hereafter referred to as POE); the rationale for the coherence of their POE; and the relationship of the POE to the life purpose of the student. (This is assuming of course that we all know our life purposes at this point). It seems to me, we dealt with these issues when we submitted our final copy of our POE. It was evaluated and approved, then why go through it again?

Students are also required to deal

Interview With Dr. Hartman

by Mike McElhinney

Last Friday Dr. Hartman told me that in his opinion "Most students want to do well and want to have responsibility." Based on my interview with him and other reports I've heard, I'd say this statement exemplifies the attitude he has as he begins this school year as the new Dean od Students.

In addition to being the new Dean of Students, Dr. Hartman is Associate Professor of Philosophy and Associate Academic Dean. He holds a copyright on the comments at the ends of everyone's program of emphasis—DTH. The large pile of programs on his desk indicate that he is still spending a great deal of time dealing with academic affairs. he sees an analogy between the program of emphasis and dormitory living: both allow ". . .freedom within a context of responsibility."

According to Dean Hartman, one of the biggest problems on campus is the enforcement of college policies originates outside the student body. Students should regulate themselves by peer control. "They should be able to make up their own set of rules within limits. . ." And every hall should have its own judical board to enforce the rules agreed upon. Dr. hartman said "I'd like to see a social structure in each dorm to which the people in it are committed to. . ." The idea is to get students involved in the construction of those things that have a causal effect on their lives."

The new dean believes that both students and the administration need ". . .to get some new habits." For example, in the past, damage would be done and no repair would be made. It would appear that it didn't matter if things were brolen or not. Dean Hartman helped establish a new reporting procedure for damage. "We're trying to fix things as soon as they get broken. . .It does matter if things are damaged."

This summer I learned that Dr. Hartman had a list of several things he wanted to do while Dean of Students. After five minutes of searching, while never ceasing to talk, he produced a list of some 89 things. Don't be alarmed; I'll just mention some that we discussed:

1. Reorganize judicial board. Dr. Hartman wants to get rid of the punitive image the board now has. He wants it to become more fair and constructive, trying to help students instead of reprimanding them.

2. Dean Hartman indicated that he'd like to develop some way of measuring the level of student satisfaction on campus. He hopes to be able to identify areas of dissatisfaction and do something to correct

Albright Speaks On Careers A Glimpse of the Real World

Archie E. Albright, Jr.. a man who has had three distinct careers—lawyer, corporate executive and investment banker— will spend five days as a Woodrow Wilson Senior Fellow on the campus of Juniata College.

Designed to span the gap between the academic community and the world of practical affairs, the Woodrow Wilson visiting fellows program draws representatives from business, diplomacy, public affairs and the professions and places them on college campuses to exchange experiences and ideas with students and faculty.

The innovative program is administered by the Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation of Princeton, N.J., under a million-dollar three-year grant from the Lilly Endowment of Indianapolis. While at the college, Albright will discuss careers, business and the stock market with students and faculty. He is also scheduled for public lectures on personal investments and the stock market.

In pursuing his careers, Albright reached a measure of success in each and then moved on to a more challenging assignment. A man described as "disposed to move directly into the eye of the hurricane," Albright managed a large chemical company despite his lack of direct industrial experience and took the helm of financially troubled investment banking houses during periods of crises on Wall Street.

The only career Albright formally trained for was his first, as a corporate lawyer.

"Young people feel their career choice is not equivalent to being locked in cement," he states. "They have the option to move out of whatever career they may have chosen, in order ot move into something new that comes closer to providing the sense of satisfaction or achievement they want for themselves."

In order to maintain the greatest options for career change, Albright believes that undergraduate education ought to be less specialized and more open to the broadest varieties of "accumulated wisdom and experience."

Albright was graduated from Wittenberg College in 1942. After a tour of duty in the Navy, he entered Yale Law School, where he was editor of the Yale Law Journal and was graduated in 1948.

After handling corporate law for the New York City law firm of Patterson, Belknap & Webb for five years, he felt the need to have more control over the business results of his corporate clients. "As a lawyer I could write the most brilliant memorandum," he recalls, "and find out it ended up in some executive wastebasket."

In an effort to remedy this frustration, Albright became executive assistant to the president of Stauffer Chemical Company of New York, where he remained for 15 years, becoming executive vice-president in 1968. Once again, he felt the need to expand his field of competence.

"So I came to Wall Street in 1968," he says, "because I felt it provided opportunities that one couldn't achieve within the confines of one industrial corporation. In my capacity as partner in Kuhn, Leob & Company, an investment banking firm, I dealt with a number of

by John S. Porter

Perhaps I shouldn't "gloat over Freshman Class Float as much I am, but I feel proud that we n — and that I was part of it. nding many hours painting the t, and riding in one of the trains t made it up, I was thrilled to r that OUR class had won First ce. This was the first time in ny, many years the Freshmen such honors in the Homecoming ade.

low do you win First Place? ll, first get a good slogan. "Onedred Years Of Training" was slogan. "Training" has several nings: training (or being edud) at Juniata; training (or deveng) Juniata College for one dred years; or, as we meant, AIN ing — the motion or motions in makes. Then, make sure that slogan sticks with the theme of Homecoming Parade. The e was "One Hundred Years At ata" and the Freshman Class t was the only easily-recognize- one that stayed with that e. (The other floats depicted small part of the history of ta, but the Freshman Float an overall view.) What does Monopoly have to do with Juniata, today? The Tangerine Bowl applies only to one segment of Juniata — football. What about other sports such as basketball or track? Or other activities such as movies, concerts, . . . or studies(?) The Glory Years is a good slogan, but '55 to '75 is only 20 years. Remember, the theme was 100 years at Juniata, not just 20.

Next, in order to capture the First Place Prize, get some easily recognizable objects, like Trains and Monopoly boards. Some abstract creature that might possibly be the "Beastie" in Lord Of The Flies, just won't do. No two people can look at it, and agree on what it is. At least with Monopoly (which most everyone has played or heard about), people can say, "Hey, there's Boardwalk. Or, "Hey, that's Oriental Avenue. Look at those dice!" With trains, people can also identify them, and be part of the parade. The Birthday Cake, too, was part of the theme, and most people could recognize it (and feel hungry).

Then, to top it all off, you need some timing. Our forty-foot flatbed

Shapp To Run For President; Wants To Save The Economy

BY Mark Wiener

On September 25th, Milton J. Shapp, the two-termed governor of Pennsylvania, formally announced his candidacy for President of the United States. He is so far the oldest candidate (63) as well as the only jewish candidate to join the growing list of Democratic hopefuls for the '76 election. He associates himself with past democratic leaders such as Truman and Kennedy, and thinks that his leadership would give new spirit to the American people.

Shapp feels that he is the only candidate that could save the economy, for he is the only one who understands it. His economic policy would include using corporate budget methods applied to federal budget, separating capital expenses from operating expenses. He stated that John Kennedy was about to enact his (Shapp's) proposals just before he was assassinated. (Shapp said he outlined the program to Kennedy in 1961 when he was a consultant to the Department of Commerce.) He also stated that he would neither quit his job to run for president, nor compromise with something like running on a Walace ticket.

He is currently presiding over an administration that is tainted both past and present with corruption, including the recent controversy about a 20,000 dollar contribution to Shapp's 1970 campaign by a wealthy contractor who since has landed million dollar state contracts. When asked about this, Shapp stated that corruption is an important issue, and his administration has been the most open in Pennsylvania's history, (then he refused to comment about the contribution).

Shapp's wife, Muriel was starter of his new campaign with a 15,000 dollar contribution, and since then he has collected over 120,000 in contributions; and hopes by late this month to have 5,000 dollars from twenty different states to qualify for matching federal financing.

Fortunately, Milton Shapp doesn't have much of a chance. Anybody whose name is synonymous with corruption as his is, guilty or not, is not going to get the Democratic nomination. Charisma is not the most important characteristic a president should have, but Shapp even makes Ford look like Kennedy!

If Shapp does make it to the Democratic convention, he should pick a running mate with which he could identify. Richard Nixon anyone?

A Wizard, A True Star

by Karen Philhower

If you've ever ventured into the pinball parlor in Ellis you might have seen Juniata's renowned pinball wizard setting his Tote cole (small size— this man needs his change) on a nearby machine before depositing one more quarter into "King Pin". Who is this man who claims "Pinball should be made the national pastime of the world!"? A close friend of the radical activists who have been lending their support to the F.P.H. Movement, this celebrated wizard cheerfully admits to spending more time with the flippers than with the books. Whereas he finds "King Pin" to be "very challenging" he finds his academics to be unentertaining and definitely less rewarding. I asked him if he was better at the silver ball than at his academic endeavors. His reply: "You'd better believe it". However, is his pinball life more active than his sex life? "Not quite, but it's a close second", was the enlightening answer. I found his answer incredible since he had just informed me moments earlier that he spends nearly 45 hours a week with his fingers glued to those flippers. I knew I was in the presence of a truly great pinball artist, a man who unfailingly draws admiring looks from every corner of the pinball room (possibly the world), a man whose machine racks up more games on specials than you could believe possible, a man incapable of tilting.

Other than Randy Patterson, four of the wizards interviewed declared "King Pin" as their absolutely and undeniably favorite machine. Steve Cordova enjoys it most because not only does he consider it to be easy (hear that, Randy?) but it allows him to come even closer in ful- filling what he calls his "private goal". Like every wizard his private goal is "good pinball playing". Three F.P.H. activists who have adopted new names for political reasons also cited "King Pin" as their favorite machine. Their reasons from 'Tommy's' "Only machine I understand" to 'Zelia's' "My friends hang there, man, what's it to you?". 'Grinning Wizard' told me she played it "for political reasons' but wouldn't elaborate on whether this had any connection with the F.P.H. Movement. She did inform me that her pinball life was definitely better than her sex life, saying that she indulged in academics and pinball much more often. 'Tommy' who was quoted as saying "Pinball is my life" responded to my asking about her sex life when compared to pinball with the only word that puts fear into the bravest of wizard's hearts: "TILT".

Two other wizards favored "Wizard" calling it "the best" and "a challenge". Using the pinball profanity common to all wizards Pete told me "Pinball is _____ great!" while Paul replied, "____, I tilted." Both claimed to be better at pinball than at their courses and that they "didn't quite" spend more time playing pinball than studing. Obviously, though, those bells and knocks must be far more reinforcing than any grade could ever be.

The remaining wizards, who averaged more than 20 hours a week playing pinball, were unable to decide which machine they favored. Depending on their mood they played any number of the world famous Juniata machines, and especially foos ball. Calling the pinball culture an emerging underground movement, the addicts of many years claimed that pinball can nearly always be far more habit-forming than heroin. Some of them had tried desperately to refrain from entering the pinball room a couple times a week and found i impossible. They developed intense feelings of nausea and unbearable finger cramps that could only be relieved by dropping just one more quarter into the slot.

Sore Thumb On Campus

Minority students come to Juniata College with the same hopes and goals as the rest of the college community. But upon entering, they find, at times, that their determination to fulfill those goals are handicapped. Like a square peg trying to fit into a round hole, they become frustrated when they don't seem a part of the college campus. They can't be #35709 as the rest of the students, but rather they feel as if they stick out like a "sore Thumb."

The Minority Student Union is an organization of students designed to cope and deal with those minority students who want to fit into that round hole. Our goal is to make the minority student become an active participant in the school's affairs. In an institution of higher learning, like Juniata, we feel that a student can expand his energies better in learning when he doesn't have to worry about fitting in. Our organization is interested in making the rest of the college community aware of the problems minority students face on and off campus.

In the past few years, the Minor-

(Along Muddy Run)

by Saltz

The big fall weekend here at Juniata, homecoming, has come and gone as all special events seem to do. However, in this Bi-centennial celebration, there seemed to be a bit more excitement than most events, and I think that this deserves an article.

First of all, thanks are in order to Nancy Molnar, Clay Pheasent, Sam Siriani and Sally Pennington for their fine organization of the events for the day and in particular the Parade through Huntingdon. The Homecoming parade through town was a tradition with the college, and for some reason was dropped for a few years until last year when it was revived. This year it grew up a bit and included three school bands, four class floats (all of which I think deserved first prize), Homecoming Queens from years past riding in Jeeps furnished by a town dealer, as well as this year's queen and attendents. The thing that impressed me the most about the whole affair is that there were groups of students who banded together and participated in the parade, not for a prize, but I assume for the shear enjoyment of being a part of such an event. This I feel deserves recognition and discussion.

The one aspect of the parade is that we here at the college are relatively alienated from the rest of the Huntingdon community, and there are sterotypes built up on the part of both groups about the other, some of which are less than complimentary. Everyone on campus at some time has either said or heard something to the order of "Those dumb, damn townies". Unfortunately, I have heard that there are similar remarks made by some of the town's residents about the students of this College. Certainly I am not trying to say that everyone feels this way that I have described above, but there is to a certain degree, ill feelings harbored by both groups. I feel that this is not a good situation for anybody, and the Parade last Saturday was a definite help toward better relations between the college and community.

Another aspect of the Parade, which I mentioned earlier, was the participation of people who seemed to just be caught up in the excitement of the weekend and were expressing this spirit. Although the college's prime and most important function is the intellectual aspect of it's students education, there are things to be learned outside the classroom that while they may be secondary, are still extremely important.

The looks on the little kids' faces when one of us clowns gave them a lollypop, was something that I will never be able to write about, because you have to see it to understand. Also, if the children weren't smiling, a look at the parents would reveal a deep thank you for taking the time to entertain their child. All in all, it's a great time, and if you don't exactly know what I'm talking about, take the time next year and get involved with the Homecoming Parade. The Parade will be better, and then you'll know.

Student Gov't.

by Tex Ahearn and Pegi Manz

Student government and Center Board, in conjunction with the college and Huntingdon community, are planning a Marithon weekend, Dec. 5, 6, &— the first weekend of winter term. All proceeds will go to a local charity in keeping with the Christmas spirit. The marithon will be centered in the main gym. Events in the planning are a dance marithon, volley ball marithon, & broadcasting marithon by WJC. All other clubs and organizations and the community at large will be encouraged to participate in all aspects; For information contact Sam Siriani or David Laird.

Another current concern of the Student Government is the feasibility of co-educational dorms. Questionnaires will be distributed by the R A's to all students in order to determine the students desire for this life-style. This survey of students opinions has been preceeded by a study of approx. 35 other colleges and their co-educational accomodations. Following the completion of the survey the Student Concerns committee plans to hold an open meeting. Hopefully in the future, Juniata will have more opportunities for co-educational living.

The Food Service will also be having a meeting within the next week. The committee is currently re-examining the Food survey's solicited last year. These will be used to make suggestions to the food service as to the students meal preferences. All students are welcome to attend the meeting, which provides a chance for voicing any complaints or comments.

The Board of Trustees will be meeting on the weekend of Oct. 16, 17, & 18. This is one of their annual meetings.

This week the Residence Hall Ass'n will be conducting elections of dorm representatives at large. A schedule of the elections will be posted in the dorms and meal lines. After the elections, the R.H.A. will begin the scheduling of events within the dorms. All meetings will be open and participation is welcome.

Homecoming- Big Success

by Dave Corman

Thank you! Center Board has been receiving such a large volumn of favorable responses and critical suggestions concerning Homecoming '75 that we feel the past weekend was definite success—and we are optimistic and confident of an ever better program for next year. (of course, we need lots of ideas; let us know how you think)

The dance on Friday night was so crowded with dancers (and spectators), a person could have easily "bumped" without a partner! The Coffeehouse and Dance Committee are hoping to plan for more "packed houses" the rest of the year — so keep your dancing shoes ready! The parade was rated as a "big " success (in spite of obnoxious low hanging tree branches and utility lines) and we want an even "bigger" one next year. The winner of the centennial trophy in the class float competition was the Freshman class of 1979: "100 Years of Training", with the Seniors taking second place followed by a tie for third place between the Sophomores and Juniors. (There was no fourth place which would seem to indicate some kind of high quality competition overall!!) Winners of a $10 first place award in the secondary float competition were the "Indians" of third Terrace.

Our thanks and appreciation to the Juniata College Concert Band and the Kishacoquillas, Southern Huntingdon and Huntingdon Area High School marching bands for their performance and participation. We also thank Mr. Klare Sunderland and Key Buick of Huntingdon for the vehicles which carried the Homecoming queens and the 1975 Homecoming Court, and Mr. Glenn Cunningham for being grand marshall.

The Steve Goodman concert was not especially "attended" (meaning that Oller was not full), but the people who did go enjoyed themselves— which is a more important measure of success than attendance. We do want to know, however, why the rest of you didn't go to the concert and the kind of concerts you would like to hear (and see) in the coming year. Okay?

* * * * * *

This Friday night Center Board offers "Jeremiah Johnson" starring Robert Redford for 50¢ (the movie, not Robert!) in Oller Hall at 8:15 p.m. On Saturday night in Tote you are invited to a Coffeehouse featuring Peter Cavanahg and Tom Breton (yes, the second guy is British, by the way). It should be interesting and it is free. We hope you have a relaxing weekend — catch up on the sleep you missed last weekend.!

Homecoming Float

truck didn't arrive until 8:40, the morning of the parade. It was parked in the parking lot of Cloister and the Gym, so we had to tramp through the wet grass, hauling all of our "goodies" from Tussey-Terrace to the truck. What a sight we must have been! Then, when we got going for the ride into town, it was discovered that we hadn't finished painting our cake. So, out came the white paint to finish that, and then the blue and yellow paints to decorate the cake, all while we were riding through town. Now that is how to win First Place Prize for your class float (however, I suggest that you hold-off on the idea of using trains, for several years).

"Senioritis" Causes Symptoms That Fulfill Nader's Prophecy!

by Steve Townsend

It was a beautiful fall afternoon. So beautiful, in fact, that even I, a dedicated shunner of outdoor activity, decided to venture forth and soal up what might well be the season's last barrage of vital life-giving solar rays.

Rummaging through my drawers, I found my only pair of shorts, the bottom half of a Boy Scout uniform inscribed with the words "R. G. Davis, Drexel Hill". I bought them at a used clothing sale two years before in case just such a rare day ever blessed Huntingdon. Rolling them up over my knees, I spaced out to bask in the warm sun.

After a few minutes, however, I began to suspect that something was drastically wrong. I was not cold, but I could not bring myself to feel the warmth of those rays. The sun seemed as if it had been stripped of its great wealth of cosmic guidance. "Very rare", I said, "but maybe I just did too much caffein. There's too much base reality in that drug, gotta cut it out."

Back in my room, I did what I usually did in such cases and took a three pint Somines solution enema. "Much better", I mumbled, "no more heinous delusions of earth."

Upon finding myself back out on the lawn, I quickly noticed that, rather than righting itself, the situation was rapidly deteriorating. I didn't even cast a shadow! Bad depression started rising up like high tide in a Jersey bog. The trees turned into a man-made rubber substitute and began to sag, Muddy Run began to back up and overflow with a terribly fowl gray ooze. As I fled back to my room, I noticed that I was surrounded with environmental horrors.

"It's happening!", I screamed at my freshman roommate, "It's finally happening!"

"What's happening?" he asked.

"Why, don't you see? It's the back up, the retraction of nature, the fulfillment of the Nader prophecy! There's no hope!"

"Where's your head at? I'm leaving until you calm down."

Falling upon my bed, I wondered why he had not sensed the disturbance. "Certainly", I thought, "he must smell the noxious industrial odors." I then lapsed into a coma like sleep.

Upon waking I found that, to a large degree, the horrors had receeded. "This is my chance.", I thought, "I've got to clear out of Juniata before those things come back. I've been here too long anyway." With that notion I suddenly realized that the Earth's problems were not environmental so much as they were persecutive, my persecution to be specific! Could it be that these things were delusions? Would that explain my roomy's puzzlement? Could it be that I had the much feared mentally depressed state known as "Senioritis"?

Tearing open the curtains I began to check on my suspicions. They seemed to be verified. How else could people walk to class without gas masks? or play tennis with all that sludge on their feet? Most certainly, I had a bad case of "Senioritis".

By the next morning I found that if I wore shades the hallucinations were not nearly so vivid. That discovery enabled me to make my way to the College Health Center in search of some kind of cure. The nurse there seemed very sympathetic.

"Mr. Townsend, this is a very common disorder among fourth year students."

"Yeah? So What? What cures it?"

"A diploma.", she said.

"A diploma!?" I screamed. "You mean I'll have to put up with these heinous delusions for another eight months?"

"Thats right."

With that, green pea soup shot from her throat. "No sense wiping it off", I said inwardly, "it's not really there."

Dr. Hartman

the situation—". . find out what they (students) need and then get it to them."

3. Dr. Hartman also wants to meet students face to face. "Getting out to see students I think is important." And I'm sure almost everyone is aware of efforts his office has made along these lines. Recently four meetings were held at various locations on campus to discuss program reviews. Dean Hartman thought these meetings went well, but the meetings that were held at the beginning of the year about the "alcohol thing" were "disturbing". He feels that many of the students still don't know what the alcohol policy is. In addition, there have also been several meetings held with freshman, most of which have gone well. Dr. Hartman said that by having meetings like the ones already held another massive S.T.A.R.T. thing can be avoided.

I asked if he viewed his job as a temporary one. He replied, "I find my job exciting; I love it, but I see this as a one year think. I don't know how anybody could do it for more than one year."

Dr. Hartman told me that "The purpose of this office is to help students live in conditions that are the most conducive to what they're here for." At least up to this point in time the Dean of Students office seems to be making a serious effort to do just that.

Writer's note:
I'd like to correct an error in an article I wrote appearing in the September 25th issue of the JUNIATIAN titled "Interview with Dr. Hinder—'No Skeleton in the Closet'". Dr. Hartman wasn't chairman of the commission on alcohol; Dr. Tom Robinson was chairman of this committee. Dr. Hartman was chairman of the committee on the quality of campus life. This committee put the alcohol commission's policy which I referred to into operational form. It did not draft the original policy.

JC's Book Review-Time Enough

by John S. Porter

TIME ENOUGH
by Emily Kimbrough drawings by Mirces Vasiliu

Have you ever had time enough to do all of the things you wanted to do? Time enough to relax, and enjoy nature with all of its beauty? Time enough to go different places, meet different people — and learn new ideas and ways? Probably most of us haven't, but Emily Kimbrough did.

She went to Ireland for a cruise on the River Shannon. She encountered no terrorists, no bombings, or the ever-present strife that one might find in Northern Ireland. In her book, Time Enough, Emily Kimbrough tells of her experiences as she travelled through Irland. Her flight from New York City to Killaloe, Irland was relatively inexpensive. Upon her arrival in Ireland, she and some other people — mostly friends — hired a boat to carry them up the Shannon, stopping at places of interest. The boat's name was ST. PATRICK, and her Captain was Mr. Ronald Kearsley.

Starting from Killaloe, Emily Kimbrough & Company went up the river until they came to Garry-Kennedy. There, they came to a slow moving bog (or lough as they call it in Ireland). Lough Derg is 24 miles long, and has many quaint villages and towns along its shores. Next, they came to Dromineer. Here they disembarked around on the top of an old, decaying church building.

One of the travellers, Miss Frances, always gets an armful of postcards from all of the sites of her journeys. She would send these 'souveniers' to her friends. She bought over two dozen postcards, at Drmineer.

Next, the St. Patrick went through a lock — which was below a swinging bridge. They tied up at Banagher, to spend the night sleeping peacefully. One of the crew, a lady by the name of Maeve, ran along the boat dressed in high-heels and a short dress, to toss the rope to someone on the dock, when the boat was about to tie-up. What a sight, this must have been!

The boat and its passengers proceeded up the Shannon, stopping at numerous other villages and hamlets (which I won't bother to bore you with, by naming them all.) Along the way, Mr. Kearsley kept reminding his passengers that they have "time enough" to do whatever they want. He says that in Ireland, the people don't worry about time. The Irish, Mr. Kearsley says, take it easy, all day long. They don't get excited when something happens, because there will always be tomorrow and "time enough" to get things straightened out. Emily Kimbough feels that this lack of worry leads to less heart attacks, and fewer ulcers.

When they arrived at Athlone, they found a museum—one of the best in Ireland—and took a tour of it. This museum was on the second floor of a one-time fortress. The keeper, Mr. English, told his fascinated audience, how it housed some of the military in years past. After the museum-tour, the group retired and spent an enjoyable evening at a pub.

Irish pubs are different from our bars and taverns. In a pub, everyone sits around tables, facing the counter. At the counter, one of the customers sings to the group. They take turns singing, telling tales, and cracking jokes. As they drink more ale, the singing becomes louder, the tales longer and the jokes better. After spending that night and part of the next morning (to sober up), in Athlone, the group journed up the river in their boat to Lanesborough. At Lanesborough, all of them had lunch in town, and then went sightseeing. Emily K. met an old lady, who displayed a very, unique sight. It was probably the only one of its kind, left in the world, according to Emily. She saw the name of a house, and the name of the town, carved in stone, in the GAELIC language. Although only able to write the name of the town on a matchbook, Emily was thrilled at seeing this. (I think that I would be thrilled, also. The last person to speak GAELIC, was a lady who died in 1969. This journey was made in the Fall of 1972.) The words were: BEAL ATHA LIAG — which means Lanesborough — or river crossing.

After this exciting event, Emily went to a small store and inquired about whether or not the man carried SANKA. "In all my life, I have never seen such a transformation.". Continuing, Emily says, "he was like a mad-man."

"I do not carry that, and if I did, I would throw the slop out of the window! Coffee is what I carry, not some decaffa-something swill . . . ." said the outraged storeowner.

At it turned out (everyone admitted this while sitting around at 'cocktails' hour), all of the travellers had been to that shop, one at a time, and each had asked for SANKA. Naturally, the man was outraged. For the rest of the journey up the Shannon and back, you will just have to read the book yourself. I recommend this book to all people who don't have TIME ENOUGH.

with methodological questions implicit in their disciplines as well as moral and/or aesthetic questions raised in acquiring this knowledge. This sounds like a rehashing of HEA. Is HEA a prep course for your program review? If not, why be redundant?

The program review is a degree requirement. It doesn't matter if your review is lousy, you'll still graduate. Yet, the comments of your program committee become a permanent part of your record. Now I have to ask myself, if your program review is not important enough to require passing (as such), why make the comments a permanent part of your transcript?

After reading this article some may feel that I would abolish the program review. Nay! Nay! I believe some people feel a need to have such a culminating experience. That's fine with me. I personally feel my own achievement can best be evaluated by my acquisition of a job and/or my admission to graduate or Professional school. There's the real test of your college program and yourself!

Goodman Big Success At JC With His "Bobbin' Red Robin"

by Rob Lopresti

"There's not a hell of a lot of people here, but there's no one here that doesn't want to be." Like most of the things that Steve Goodman said, sang and did last Saturday night in Oller Hall, this comment was right on target. For an hour and a half he kept the not-too-large, but very enthusiastic homecoming audience listening, clapping, and laughing a lot. From the moment he appeared on stage and began to sing "when the red, red, robin comes bob-bob-bobbing along" he had the crowd in his pocket.

Goodman played the whole show solo, which surprised a lot of people, since he uses a lot of back-up musicians on his albums. But if his sound lost anything in size or variety by his playing alone, the show gained much more by the increase in flexability and personal nature.

Steve Goodman sounds like a cross between John Prine and David Bromberg, with unique additions of his own. Most of the songs he played were funny. The subjects included vegetarianism ("Chicken Cordon Blues"), hotels ("I ain't home"), daytime TV ("Door Number Three"), towing companies ("Lincoln Park Pirates") and that familiar feeling: "I don't know where I'm going but I'm going nowhere in a hurry blues." Goodman is a very funny man and his explanations of the songs got as many laughs as the songs themselves.

The few serious numbers stood out because of their high quality. About "City of New Orleans" he said "Arlo recorded it and I've been working ever since." Other softer numbers included "Penny Evans" a moving acapella number. "I Can't Sleep" and Mile Smith's marvelous "The Dutchman".

The show was opened by Rick Messler and Drew Gorman, two folk guitarists from New York. They played songs by Dylan, Ledbelly and Randy Newman, as well as their own creations. They also came out with Steve for the encore. It was a spiritual called "I'll Fly Away", which they had the audience singing along on.

The concert was terrific and Steve Goodman's albums are likely to enjoy an increase in popularity in Huntingdon. Those who made it to the show know tha Juniata experienced a unique and exciting talent on Homecoming Night.

Albright Speaks

different corporations, cutting across a number of industries and a variety of financing problems."

Not content with managing diversity, Albright next decided to have a try at adversity. "My next job," he admits, "seemed the ultimate challenge of applying what I had learned in managerial techniques to what was a badly managed securities industry. It was clearly a bit of an ego trip."

"What I couldn't see in mid-summer 1969," Albright says, "was that the market was going to go through its greatest crash since 1929." His experiences during Wall Street's four years of near-crisis, from 1969 to 1972, will be the subject of one on-campus public lecture.

Albright, who is currently executive director of Drexel Burnham, an investment banking firm, has a son at Yale University, a daughter at Kirkland Collage, and a younger daughter in high school.

"I've an interest in the way people between the ages of 18 and 22 look at the world," he says. "They see things from such different ends of the pipeline from me that sometimes I find the way things come into focus for them absolutely startling. I find it exciting and rewarding to chew things over with them."

Albright has published articles and speeches in a number of financial and trade journals. A member of numerous national and New York civic organizations, he is the chairman of the board of the National Repertory Theater, on the advisory board of Yale Law School, and a trustee of the New York Police Athletic League. He also served on former Mayor John Lindsay's Council on Environment in 1970.

During the week Mr. Albright will be involved in the following courses: business policy, marketing management, social institutions, political decision making, comparative political system and several freshman seminars. He will also be available to discuss business and legal careers with students and the entire decision making process in choosing a career. Students who would like to speak with him individually can schedule an appointment with Professor Lakso in G-416. He will give public talks on the stock market on Monday, Oct. 20 and Wednesday, Oct. 22, in G-402 at 3:45 p.m.

"Jeremiah Johnson"-Action For Men; Redford For The Women

by Zig

In continuation of our sweeping trip through the genres, this friday night at 8:15 p.m. in Oller Hall the film committee presents Jeremiah Johnson, an adventure-type, men's action film featuring none other than the heartthrobbing star of women's action films, Robert Redford. If that sounds like a strange combination, it just may be because it is. Redford simply does not look like your average, run-of-the-mill mountain man but yet it's a favorite film of Redford's for it depicts a way of life that I think he would find romantically appealing — a man's struggle for survival in the wilds of the Utah mountains.

A narrator tells us at the beginning of the film that Jeremiah Johnson is a "mountain man", a loner and by implication, a drop-out from a decadent civilization who is willing to seek survival in the wilds rather than endure corruption in the world of men. Director, Stanley Pollack, fills the screen with panaramic mountain scenery as background for Johnson's exploits. By necessity Johnson learns techniques of survival that the "civilized world" would call animalistic. Even as a loner though his path crosses the lives of others. He adopts a small boy, a deaf-mute, who is the only survivor of a group of settlers slain by Indians and is lead into the tender trap of marriage when he's introduced to the daughter of a French-speaking Indian chief. Love grows among the three of them but even in their secluded lives they are not immune to the invasion of tragedy. Redford shines at the point as the crazed Johnson, driven by sorrow to a bloody revenge. Even by running away from civilization he can't escape the corruption that he dispised there, nor can he simply engage in a different way of life without fighting to keep it.

Juniata Chicks Split Decision

by Marge Morgan

The women's volleyball club traveled to St. Francis College for their first volleyball game of the season on Wednesday, October 11 and returned with one win and one defeat. Volleyball at St. Francis is a varsity sport, and the school boasts a varsity and junior varsity team as well as many substitutes.

Two matches were played, and every Juniata player played at least one match. In the first match the Indian's lack of poise and experience was evident as they lost two games to 0. After losing the first game of the second match, Juniata began to warm up and won the last two exciting games to take the match 2-1. Juniata's ball control was their strongest point while St. Francis' good, strong serves gave the Indians the most difficulty.

On Monday, October 13, Juniata again faces St. Francis in two home matches, and the Juniatians are hoping for a double victory. On October 22 they will travel to Indiana, Pa. for a match with Indianna University of Pennsylvania. The club's next home match will be a Parents' Day game with Wilson College at 11:00 A.M. so bring your parents and introduce them to volleyball at Juniata.

Juniata Rugby Does It Again!

by Alan Wirt

The Juniata Ruggers returned to their winning ways on Sunday by crushing hapless Indiana University of Pa. 46-3 under over-cast skies at College Field. The win upped the Juniatian's record to 3-1, with only two more games remaining on their Fall schedule.

Freshman Tom Morris scored two tries, matching the two-try effort of Jim Kistler. Mark Dooley, Brian Ashworth, and Skip Hartman also added tries. Al Kulp booted a couple of 3-pointers along with five conversion kicks to bolster the scoring cushion. Skip hartman accounted for the remaining conversion kick, giving him five points towards Juniata's largest point production of the year.

Superior conditioning and good pursuit were plusses which Coach Charlie Lerman felt responsible for his squad's total domination. The Indians wasted little time getting started and by half-time the score was 30-0, and with no substitutions allowed, it was hard not to run up the score.

The "B" teams of both clubs staged a scrimmage that was half the length of a normal game, and Juniata prevailed this time by a score of 12-7. Vince Yaniga, a 1973 alumnus of JC, scored one of the tries, in a game that featured the talents of former football star, and current Baseball and Wrestling Coach, Bill Berrier.

The team would like to express its thanks to Athletic Director Walt Nadzak for allowing the clubs to use the College Field, and would hope this site will be available for future games as well.

Cross Country Is Still Tough!

by Evagelia Lyras, "Teddy"

On Homecoming Day with an all-out team effort, the X-Country team showed its strength by remaining undefeated as it beat Susquehanna and St. Francis in a triple meet. Jack McCollugh and Paul Wilson led the team to victory as they glided over the very hilly 5.5 mile course in 34 minutes and 49 seconds, and 33 minutes and 37 seconds respectively. Dave Parker, our third man on the team, came in 6th, followed by Dave Quig who came in 9th. Also running for the team were Steve Hooper, Austin Robison, Mike Bodley, Adam Marder, and Evagelia Lras.

Bubbling over with elation with the team's double victory, coaches Meditch and Mitchell say that with the team's improvement continuing as it has, its chances are excellent of becoming the champions. The team faces 6 more meets this season with Gettysburg and Deleware Valley being the toughest. The team races Elizabethtown (awat) on Tuesday, so keep on trucking runners because you can beat them all!

ity Student Union has not been as active as we had hoped. The greater weight of this activity rests on our lack of students. in this school year we hope to work with the Admissions Office in recruiting more students.

Our major goals for the upcoming year are:

I. The recruiting of more students
II. Fund raising for grants and activities
III. Obtaining lecturers for school functions

We welcome you to Juniata; and hope that you participate in our organization.

THE JUNIATIAN

VOL. XIA NO. 5 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | OCTOBER 23, 1975

P-M Seniors Study Cancer

Browns Mills, New Jersey, September 30, 1975 — Two Juniata College seniors with medical aspirations got some first-hand medical experience this past summer when they participated in a work-study program at the Deborah Heart and Lung Center in Browns Mills, New Jersey.

The students, Beverly Baum, 21, of Elizabethtown, Pa., and Dave Mingle, 21, of Roaring Spring, Pa., worked in various departments at Deborah, such as cardiology, surgery, laboratory and outpatient.

Miss Baum, a graduate of Elizabethtown Area High School, hopes to be a pediatric cardiologist and is currently preparing a research paper on "Impact on Adult Patient of Cardiac Catheterization." Her hobbies include hiking, backpacking, needlepoint, poetry, violin and piano.

Mr. Mingle, who attended Central High in Martinsburg, hopes to engage in family practice. He is preparing a research paper on "Malar Flush in Mitral Stenosis." Dave's extra-curricular activities include track, softball, basketball, soccer, piano and trumpet.

Deborah Heart and Lung Center is a non-profit specialty hospital engaged in the care and treatment of operable heart and lung diseases. It is located in Browns Mills, New Jersey. It is supported largely by the Deborah Hospital Foundation, comprised of some 30,000 volunteer men, women and children in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Florida and California. Regional volunteer Headquarters for Deborah are located at 901 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19107, 135-25 Northern Boulevard, Flushing, New York 11354, Browns Mills, New Jersey 08015, and 3001 South Ocean Drive, Hollywood, Florida 33020.

Dave Mingle and Bev Baum enjoy their research!

Drama Division Series Proves To Be Amusing

In the opinion of the staff of Division III it would be fitting for Division I to present a series of dramas in commemoration of the centennial year of Juniata College. This would give the members of Division I a welcome respite from day-to-day teaching duties, and it would increase the visibility of the division to the college community. Division III is prepared to demonstrate its cross-divisional solidarity by providing the accessories, props, and expertise that can give the plays much-needed punch and bounce.

Below is a tabulation of plays that Division III can furnish with material aid and advice. For each scene that we feel qualified to improve, the name of the appropriate Division III consultant is given.

Comeback For Tricky Dick?

by Mark Wiener

With over fourteen months of itter seclusion, painful illness, and elf-pitying depression behind him, ichard Nixon, the nation's first resident forced to resign from ofce, seems to be trying a comeback. tarting with friendly chats on the each and private dinner parties, he now up to talking with reporters nd even playing golf in a Teamster harity tournament.

Although the past year has aged im noticeably, he is no longer the ckly specimen he was after his esignation, during a near fatla bout ith phlebitis. He takes anticoagunts daily and has occasional pain in s leg, but friends close to him say e has a healthy "California-sunhine" look. He golfs, jogs, and ccording to neighbors, "runs into e ocean like a surfer".

Nixon spends seven days a week orking on his personal memoirs, a rgeted 300,000 word book that hould bring him over two million dollars. This is much needed, since he owes $50,000 in medical bills, $148,000 in back taxes, and a possible $226,000 to who ever was the source of the payment of his final mortgage on "La Casa Pacifica". (However he does get a $200,000 maintenance budget from Congress.)

Nixon also agreed to the filming of an extensive interview with David Frost, to be shot in August, with a six-digit price for Frost.

Last week Henry Kissinger described to reporters Nixon as an odd, unpleasent, and unnatural man. Whether Nixon has completely turned over a new leaf is not known, nor is the reaction of the American public as he comes more and more into the limelight. On the whole, our society is a forgiving one, but can we forgive a man who let nothing stand in his way, not even the law, for his quest for power? For Richard Nixon, it may be to soon to expect absolution. Then again, it may be too late.

Marathon Weekend - A Fund Raising Project

This year the spirit of giving and sharing will be brightened by a joint effort of Student Government, Center Board and high school Student Council planners who have scheduled the first weekend of second term, December 5 and 6, as Marathon Weekend to raise money for the Community Center located in downtown Huntingdon. To be held in Memorial Gym starting at 7:00 p.m. Friday, December 5 and ending Saturday evening, the activities include three continuous games of volleyball consisting of players from both the high school and college communities, a dance marathon, a broadcasting marathon from the gym by WJC, and a hoagie sale by IVCF with all proceeds going to the charity.

Volunteers for all aspects of the marathon are desperately needed. If interested in any of the areas listed below, please fill out the form and return it to the proper address by October 31. If you have any questions please contact either Dave Laird (227 Tussey, 643-9830 or Sam Sirianni (100 Cloister Arch, 643-6215).

—Fun-Raising Committee- Members assist in raising money on both a local level and from the outside community by way of the mail. (Bill Compton-chairman).

—Puplicity Committee- This is the heart of the operation. Through local and off-campus publicity interest and much needed support will be obtained. (Elaine Joyce and Hank Hallowell-chairmen.)

—Players for the volleyball teams (faculty, students and administration). Three teams of about forty members each. Teams can be worked out. (Dave Laird-chairman).

—Referees and Scorekeepers for the volleyball games. Two hour shifts round-the-clock. Times can be worked out. (Dave Laird-chairman).

—Couples for the dance marathon. (phil Klippert, Tim Reimer, Michelle Andre, Bill Bruner-chairmen).

—Persons to man the switchboard in Founders Hall round-the-clock. Times can be worked out. (Sam Sirianni-chairman).

—Persons to answer the phone in Memorial Gym because of people calling in pledges. (Sam Sirianni-chairman).

— and a cast of thousands (odd jobs). (Shelly Kaltenbaugh-chairman.

Please sign up below for at least one position. This is no time for apathy or shyness. Together we can make it work.

Escape Now To "Papillon"

by Zig

In the face of endless conflict and opposition, we've still managed to salvage a showing of Papillon for this Friday night. Due to circumstances beyond our control however, we've been relegated to Alumni Hall at 10:00 p.m. (groan) and the charge will be $1.00. As a carry-over from last year's film series administration, Papillon is our first example of what has to be known as an "extra film". It was one of the top 10 movies that YOU (yes, you out there) chose from our survey that we handed out at supper one spring evening last year. It is an effort to bring more recent (and therefore more expensive) films to Juniata without having to charge you too much more to see them. So the word for this week is — bring your parents to Papillon (please!)

Released in 1973 in time for the Christmas movie-going audiences, Papillon is meant to be another of the male love stories. This time it takes place in the picturesque surroundings of squalor, pain and degradation that was once found in the penal colonies of French Guiana. Found there are two types of prisoners. The first type — like Henry Charriere (played by Steve McQueen), whose nickname, Papillon (the French name for butterfly) is symbolized by a tatoo on his chest — are continuously obsessed by numerous plans of escape. The second, like Louis Degas (lovably as always played by Dustin Hoffman), have hopes of living longer by going with the system no matter how unjust it may be. Hordes of other prisoners are on hand to demonstrate by their dramatically vivid deaths just how difficult both types really are.

In his hardened determination to escape and to protect the cowardly Hoffman, McQueen is forced to endure the standard indignities of prison life including an extended period of solitary confinement where he is transformed into a broken, crawling things having to depend on insects for sustenance. Despite its visual message of a man and his inexhaustable will to survive, the film has a grim, desparing tone of futility. By the time of his getaway, McQueen, is an old man, gray and broken, a helpless victim of his own couragous determination in a world where the only options lie in compliance with authority or futile and costly revolt.

Emily Frankel Guest Dancer

by David Corman

Scheduled during the following week on the Center Board program of activities are two "specials." The first is presented by th films committee and the second by the fine arts committee in conjunction with the Juniata Artist Series.

For Parents' Weekend, the films committee will be offering "Papillon" as part of its "extra" selection of flicks complementing this term's film series. Starring Steve McQueen and Dustin Hoffman, and featuring top-notch cinematography, this escape film is definitely a steal for only $1.00 admission — so bring your parents! Movie-time is 10 p.m. on Friday, October 24th in Alumni Hall.

On Tuesday, October 28th the Juniata College Artist Series proudly presents Emily Frankel, dancer. A native of Pennsylvania, Miss Frankel has performed throughout the world — in Europe, South America, Africa, the Orient, and across the United States. Her extraordinary discipline and intensity — fusing theater, music, and dance (both classical and modern) — have captivated audiences and, according to one critic, made her "a legendary figure in the dance." Student tickets for the performance are available, FREE, at the Ellis Information Desk. Tickets will be $5.00 at the door. Curtain-time will be at 8:15 p.m. on Tuesday evening, October 28th in Oller Hall.

Letters to the Editor

Upon reading last week's Juniatian, we were notably discouraged over a misinterpretation of the Homecoming float competition.

First we should say all the classes put in a lot of time and effort into each float and deserve due credit. However we wish to correct several misconceptions expressed by a member of the Freshman class. First of all, his claim that a Freshman class has not won Homecoming in "many, many" years in incorrect. The class of 1978 (last year's Freshman class) won the float competition in 1974. Secondly, we would like to defend the themes of the other classes. The Sophomore class float, "The Tangerine Bowl" refered to as only covering one segment of Juniata's college history, actually represented one of the most celebrated and remembered events in Juniata's 100 years. The abstract "creature" ignorantly refered to as "the beastie in the Lord of the Flies" was blatantly a football player. It's unbelievable that any observer could misinterpret that, or it's participation in the Sophomore theme.

The Junior class in it's presentation as the Glory Years illustrated Juniata's proud participation in the Tangerine Bowl and the Amos Alonzo Stagg Bowl. The Senior class used an immaginative and an original approach in the construction of their float. The monopoly game is in the Guiness Book of World Records, which to our way of thinking is an important aspect of Juniata's 100 years.

In conclusion, our goal is not to heighten the animosity that this unfortunate situation has already created among the classes. . .but just to set the record straight.

Elaine Joyce
Nancy Molnar
Hank Hallowell

To the Editor of the Juniatian:

During the Susquehanna football fame I was obliged to ask two different groups of students to refrain from violating our campus drinking policy. In both instances these groups of students were openly and falgrantly "passing the bottle", even after I requested that they refrain from doing so.

I simply wish to warn the student body at-large that this small group of irresponsibie people will only serve to ruin any type of adult drinking policy you might attempt to have instituted.

What is to be done about it rests with all of us. However, a beginning could be to rally with your student personnel workers and develop a plan. This plan should be to identify and discipline those who exhibit their lack of interest or responsibility toward a drinking policy designed for students of the social and academic excellence of most of those at Juniata College.

Sincerely,
Thomas W. Woodrow

Donahue and Long display gifts from the "other dimension."

JC Receives "Magic Rock"

by Karen Philhower

Everyone at Juniata is aware that rumors float around about nearly everyone. Trying to determine what's true and what rumor is next to impossible. Remember the rumor about the food service improving the quality of its food? Or how about the one concerning Concert Committee's choice of Bonnie Rait over Electric Light Orchestra? Or the on about pass/fail grades keeping out people of grad schools? Anyway, you can imagine how skeptical I was when I heard that Jim Donahue and Mike Long had met some creature from some other dimension. It seems that they were walking towards Roundtop when the scenery tore open and some strange extraterrestial being jumped through the split and communicated with them. I decided to ask the two of them exactly what happened.

So I first asked Donahue, "Exactly what happened?" His slightly incoherent reply was "I felt as though it was. . .I was. . .being drawn into the "Outer Limits" or something. . .a shining silver dot began to expand and pulsate directly overhead. . .I couldn't look for too long, though, 'cause my head, no—my mind—sort of began to vibrate, you know; I mean. . .so anyway this dot thing starts to get bigger or at least that's what we thought—It was really coming down towards us, see, only you couldn't tell. . .glancing up only once or twice, for fear of. .well, glancing up, we saw that it was some metallic device and that it left a trail that looked to me like zipper teeth. .so I thought to myself. . ."

If I hadn't cut him off he would have rambled on forever. Thinking maybe Long could get to the point I directed my next question to him. "But exactly what happened?" His answer gave me a little more (not much) idea concerning what had taken place. "It was behind the science building, near Roundtop that it happened. This giant, gleaming zipper came zoaring down from above, unzipping the very scenery itself just ten feet in front of us. It was as though a huge movie screen had been slashed down the center; everything seemed warped and wrinkled around the incision, trees bending, clouds folding. .for some reason this didn't seem strange. You could see beyond the opening. . .nebulous. .black cloudy. . .gaseous, anyway, some of this seemed to sort of ooze out of the gash in the landscape and it floated towards us. Incredibly enough it began to take form—or many forms—because it continually restructured itself. . .a galaxy of lights and bizarre sounds emanating from it. . .I was amazed. This being, who had to be from the Other Dimension. .well, I could see him from all sides, all possible views and angles, even from the inside out. Strangely, it produced two 3 dimensional objects and dropped them at our feet. I barely noticed these objects at the time because I was overwhelmed by the being. . .it exerted an almost magnetic force on my thoughts, and my mind seemed to become multi-faceted, in much the same way as the being's presence. The the "thing" was drawn back into the tear, and everything became normal once again, the trees straightened, the lesion closed."

Donahue, who had been politely listening while Long spoke, said, "It was absolutely incredible, I was utterly blown away." Thinking he might be a bit more coherent now, I tried again. "But exactly what happened?" "We've been telling you" he said,. "This being, this thing filled our minds with thoughts of peace and love and beauty and wisdom, left us a record and a rock, maybe it's a magic rock, and then

Senate Closes Meeting

by Todd Lins

Senator: I would like to make a motion that the rest of this meeting be closed to all students except senators.

President: Any discussion or questions?

Voice of a non-senator: What is your rationale for such a motion?

Answer from another senator: Ah, well. . .ah, I'm sorry but to give you an answer would mean to discuss the subject. . .silence. . .

The vote: A majority. The motion passes.

In a period of five to ten minutes I watched the student government close its' door to the students so that secrecy could be maintained. All this action was of course justified by article 18 in the senate's constitution which reads as follows, "The entire senate shall determine, by simple majority, the Constitutionality of all its proceedings." (See Constitution of the Juniata College Student Government.) How convenient that this governing body, a circle of "yes men and yes women," have such power in their constitution. The question I wish to raise is whether this power to close public meetings is justifiable within the realms of other laws.

It is to bad that the little conscientious senator who made it a point to have article 18 at his finger tips (to justify closing the meeting) did not also make it a point to look at the consequences of his action. As indicated in the minutes there was "some" discussion (one question was raised) indicating that the senators themselves did not question the validity of their action.

Since the senators are too busy with their full schedules of important meetings, I feel compelled to show these people that higher laws exist to which they must adhere — especially in the area of public meetings.

One such state law is the Sunshine Act #175. The following three sections were taken from this act with some deletions. (Section 2) The meetings or hearings of every agency at which formal action is scheduled or taken are public meetings and shall be open to the public at all times. No formal action shall be valid unless such formal action is taken furing the public meeting.
(Section 3) No public meeting of any agency shall be adjourned, begun, recessed or interupted in any way for the purpose of an executive session except as hereinafter provided. An executive session may be held during the course of a properly constituted public meeting upon notification to the public present by the presiding officer that for a period not exceeding 30 minutes the meeting will be in recess for the purpose of
(1) Considering the dismisal or discipling of, or hearing complaints or charges brought against a public officer, employee, or other public agent unless a person requests a public hearing.

(Along Muddy Run)

Arriving home this weekend, I saw a sight that has been increasingly becoming old hat when the Susquehanna River Valley gets more than a day's hard rain; that is a river threatening to over flow it's banks. As a matter of fact the Juniata River did at places leave its winding path and wander over a few low lying fields on its way to Duncannon.

Flooding may seem a little dumb to get irate about, as little can be done to stop a river from rising. However, much can be done to stop the raging waters from destroying residential and industrial areas thereby saving people and corporations thousands of dollars.

Actually I find it difficult to understand why modern man persists in building cities on the banks of rivers. With transportation in the state it is today, I fail to see why Huntingdon, or even Harrisburg persists in building so close to an area which invites natural disaster. Realistically, when is the last time you saw a freighter docked off the 4th Street bridge downtown!

For those areas, situated next to rivers and financially unable to move to higher ground, do not despair. There is an alternative, which the Dutch made famous: dikes.

Actually we are fortunate as we do not have to travel abroad to catch a glimpse of a dike. On your next trip to the beer distributor in Smithfield take a gander at that mound of dirt between yourself and the river and thank it; because there would be no beer in that town had they not invested thusly. The last flood would have washed them out just as the one in 1972 did.

If you're not into kinds of dikes that are in Smithfield, a more attractive display can be sighted at the town of Sunkery. The latter town learned long ago the destructiveness of floods and took steps that really do not always save them; but the water has to be high for that area to be under water.

The last town I would like to discuss is Harrisburg, a town which has been flooded twice in the past 3 years. The cost of a system to protect the Harrisburg area was deemed by the powers that be in that city to be prohibitive. The Governor also does not seem to be too concerned about the matter of flooding of Harrisburg. Why should he be? He doesn't live along Front Street in the Mansion anyway, but takes to higher ground in the West Shore area. This lack of interest has cost Central Pennsylvania money, but even more important is the fact that some people have died as a result of being caught in their homes as the waters rose. As the water receeds so do our memories of the Toawma. The stance taken by the politicians that it probably won't happen again in 20 years still haunts those who have lost family, friends or possessions through the ordeal, and realize because of lack of action it could happen again.

I commend Huntingdon for making the effort to protect their citizens, and loath those "public servants" who will not take appropriate measures to protect their constituency.

The Traumas of JC Freshmen Horrors of Scientific Methods

As I stepped into Cloister I couldn't help but notice the savage sight of a wired out freshman trying to jam a silver dollar into the telephone's nickle slot.

"Directory Assistance! Directory Assistance!", he was screaming, "I must have Directory Assistance!"

Trying to be polite, I pretended not to notice that it was anything out of the ordinary and began climbing the stairs. Suddenly, however, he fell to the floor and burst into a woeful plethora of excruciatingly touching sobs. I, as an animal of compassion, felt compelled to rush to his side and offer my sympathy.

"What's wrong, Jake? What's this business about Directory Assistance? I'll listen—really!

"Modes," he choked. "I have to know for Modes. It said on the bathroom wall, just above the urinal, that they would know."

I felt his confusion to the very bottom of my being. I too had been like this once; lost, cut adrift among the horrors of the scientific method. It was my duty to help him back to the surface of reality.

"I'm a Modes grad.", I said, feeling like a priest administering last rights to an accident victim. "Tell me what it is you need to know."

"Can a Venus Fly Trap survive on Del Grosso meatless spaghetti?"

The question fell upon my ears like a hammer onto glass for how was I to answer? How was anyone to answer such a question? Reflecting upon how tough Modes has become, I was about to express my ignorance when the student, with eyes that pleaded their case to my emotions, looked up at me. In all good conscience, I could not disappoint the poor fellow. Afterall, he was depending on me to save his young acedemic career. Instinctively, I dredged up something that I thought would sound adequate.

"You don't want Directory Assistance.", I told him. "You want a greenhouse, some place that specializes! You see, what your professors are trying to accomplish is meant to prepare you for your own specialization. They posed this question so as to acquaint with particular fields of interest for there will come a time when they will require you map out your own field. They call that exercise Program of Emphasis. Here's a dime, try again."

His face lit up as if someone had just thrown the switch activating the Christmas ornaments of his head. In an instant, he was to his feet and had begun kissing me in uncontrolable joy.

"I'm saved!", he franticly yelped. "I'm saved!"

Disengaging his lips from my nose, he began to tear through the yellow pages of the telephone book. Taking this opportunity to escape before he strated in on another series of embarrassing embraces, I slipped, as fast as I could, up the four flights of dusty stairs to my room.

Senate

(2) deleted

From this section it can be seen that close meetings are legal, but only if there is a recessed called, the motion said nothing about a recess. Therefore, the meeting legally should have been open to the students.

The next section should be of particular interest to those senators who act without questioning the issue or the validity of their actions. (Section 8) Any member of any agency who participates in a meeting or hearing knowing that it is being held or conducted in such a way to intentionally prevent an interested party from attending or with an intent and purpose of violating this act is guilty of a summary offense. . .deleted is the penalty.

It seems that the senate worries about legality only if it is convenient but soon shuffles it under the rug when it becomes burdensome. They are perfectionist when it comes to the trivial but so inadvertent when it comes to the legality of their actions. It appears that when the senators pull out their papers from their notebooks they replace them with their brains, but I guess this is necessary for the meeting to run smoothly so they generally will finish by 8 P.M.

Article 18 is outmoded and needs to be changed either through amendment or abolishment. The Sunshine Act was passed in 1974, our constitution was written prior to this law. Unless it is changed senate will have the power to close their meetings any time it wishes and the rights of those students who elected these officers will continue to be violated by a simple majority vote.

went back to his own world." "We haven't been the same since", Long informed me rather gravely. "It changed our conception of reality, you know."

I asked about the record and the rock. "It's a 45 record", Long told me. "Red", added Donahue. "The rock's magic, I'm pretty sure. I've watched it, waited for it to do something, I know it will do something. . .it means something, it must mean something, why would he leave it if it didn't mean something?", Long muttered. "The record might be magic too", Donahue informed me. "One side is just weird unearthly sounds like we heard when the being was near us; the other side's English, maybe a translation." "Well, what's on the English side?" I asked him. "It's not something just everyone should hear. It's not something I can tell just anybody. Since you intend to print this, I'll have to simply say that the English side contains more wisdom than is to be found in Beeghly Library and the Science Library combined."

"The record's only part of it", Long told me. "There's the rock, and then there's us. We're not the same, well, it's not that we're not the same, it's just that we're different. . .not really different, just changed, multi-faceted you might say. We'll never be what we were last Thursday morning. Only a week ago, but a lifetime ago. . Our soul—no, our minds—no, our psyche—something. . .it's just not the same." Donahue said, "He's right. We're not the same, never will be. We spend all our spare time deciding what we'll say to our visitor if and when he appears again. After what we heard on the record, we've got millions of thinks to discuss with him."

The story I had just heard from them amazed me. I could think of only one more think to ask them. "What do you intend to do with the magic rock?" Long's answer convinced me that this visitor from the Other Dimension had indeed affected his mind. "Maybe I'll eat it."

Be A Slave

by Valerie Dove

On Thursday, October 23, 1975, one of the most exciting activities at Juniata College, will take place! The annual Freshmen Slave Auction will be held in Alumni Hall at 8 p.m.

Freshmen guys and gals will be auctioned-off to the highest bidding under- and upperclass men. For a price, the slaves will perform certain kinds of services, such as running errands; washing and ironing clothes; and cleaning rooms for their "masters".

Also remember, Parents' Day will be that Saturday, so you can get these chores done before Mom and Dad get here!

So come out and bid on a slave, on October 23! (The money will go to the Freshmen Class treasury.)

Athletic Standing Statistics Discussed Here At Juniata

by Alan Wirt

In these days of tight budgets and spiraling costs, more colleges are dropping football and de-emphacizing intercollegiate athletics, right? Well, not quite so. The fact is that more NCAA member colleges and universities have started Varsity Football teams in the 70's than have dropped the game. Surprisingly, since 1964, 35 institutions have added the sport, while only 29 have dropped it. A net of six over the past 11 years.

The 1950's seemed to be the high point for abandonment of varsity football, when 78 institutions dropped the sport in the first five years of that decade. Since then, and as a result of the NCAA Television plan, the sport's popularity has picked up again. Major college games all over the country are beginning to outdraw their professional counterparts in attendance. While Profootball ticket sales have declined overall in the NFL in recent years, the Colleges are getting record crowds. e.g. Penn State-Stanford: 61,000, Ohio State - Penn State: 88,000. It has become apparent that the public is tired of pro-football players' high salaries, soaring ticket prices, boring offenses, and wildcat strike antics. The college game has been able to capture America's heart with all its color and pageantry, as the pro game sinks deeper and deeper into its own grave. One can hardly feel sorry for the NFL's plight.

The NCAA reported the following NCAA members that started or resumed varsity football since 1970. 1970: Fordham, Fullerton State, Georgetown (D.C.), Plattsburgh State, Plymouth State, St. Mary's (Cal.) 1971— Boston State, Federal City, Rochester Tech., St. Peter's; 1972— Nicholls State, Kean. Lake Forest, Univ. San Diego, William Paterson; 1973: Albany State, Bowie State, Madison, New Haven, New York Tech, Salisbury State, Seton Hall; 1974: Framingham State; 1975: Fairleigh-Dickinson at Madison, Canisius.

JC Ruggers charge on to victory over Penn State 18-0.

Rugby Record Raised to 4-1

On Saturday, October 18, the Rugby Club traveled to State College and defeated the Penn State "B" team by a score of 18-0.

Juniata's aggressive pursuit of the ball paid off many times, and helped to compensate for a relatively inexperienced group of forwards. Penn State's backs often either dropped the ball or failed to pick up loose balls cleanly, giving repeated opportunities to the omnipresent Juniata ruggers.

Fullback Rich Jager opened the scoring when following up his own routine punt near the Penn State goal line. The Lions' back did not show proper respect for Jager's speed, and he easily beat them to the ball in the in-goal. Al Kulp, displaying his recently improved kicking accuracy, made the first of his three conversions of the day.

Early in the second half, Juniata added to its score when freshman Tomm Morris put his foot into a bouncing ball near his own goal line, popping it clearly over the Penn State attackers. Morris followed his kick with a length-of-the-field foot rush, and fell on the ball behind the PSU goal.

The third Juniata try resulted from a sustained wing attack deep in Penn State territory, with Terry "Turkey" Overly applying the coup de grace.

The victory raised the club's "A" team season record to 4-1. The "B" team is undefeated in two scrimmages.

Next Sunday at 1:00, the club returns home to close its season by hosting the Lancaster Rugby Club. Everyone is invited to bring his or her parents to see the last rugby games of the year and the final appearance of the club's veteran seniors.

Cross Country

by Evagelia "Teddy" Lyras

The Juniatian runners upped their record to 4-0 as they easily conquered Elizabethtown, 18-45. In 85° heat Paul Wilson and Jack McCullough again led their team to victory as they tied for first place by running the 5.1 mile course in 29 minutes and 21 seconds. E-town managed to capture third place, but the Juniatian runners Dave quig, Dave Parker, Steve Hooper, Mike Bodley and Austin Robison seized fourth through eight place thus insuring Juniata's fourth victory of the season.

Also running for the team were Adam Marder and George Anderson. The Juniata runners race again at home on Wednesday, October 22 against Shippensburg and on Saturday, October 25 (Parents' Day) at home against Dickinson. So come out and help cheer the team on to victory!

Women's Field Hockey

by Alan Wirt

The Women's Field Hockey Team played three games last week. On Saturday, October 11, they defeated Lycoming College by a score of 4-1 in a well-played effort. The Varsity team traveled to Williamsport Area Community College on the 14th, a Tuesday, where they were again victorious with a score of 5-0. Then on Saturday, October 18, the Varsity team suffered a defeat at Lycoming Colege, by a score of 3-2. This week, both the Junior Vasity and Varsity team will travel to Dickinson on Wednesday, for a challenging game. Good Luck to the Women's Field Hockey Teams!

Echoes of "Start Day" Still Recurring Throughout JC-Some Positive Results

by Wendy Jacobus

Although it's difficult for most students to remember the courses they had last year, let alone the events that occurred on campus, for a moment delve into your memory and try to recall Spring 1975 and START DAY. Supposedly out of that period of discussions and Town Meeting, evolved an awareness of the types of problems that plagued the college community. In an attempt to find solutions to those problems the Commission on the Quality of Campus Life was formed. The Commission has since that time been involved in everything from the alcohol policy to the definition of community.

There is a general consensus among the commission members that the main problem on campus is communication. The commission then, in its first formal contact with the college community, is attempting through this article to open some lines of communication. They would like to disclose some of the changes that have developed at Juniata, as a result of student concerns, and disseminate some information that hopefully will clear up other concerns. At the same time, the commission would like to specify that they are not responsible for these changes but are simply publicizing them.

First, it was apparent last year that many students felt they had no input into the system. A major concern in this area was faculty selection, retention, and evaluation. Students felt powerless in terms of faculty selection at Juniata and yet had a great investment in the quality of faculty selected and retained. This feeling was probably attributable to the problem of communication reiterated earlier because most students are not aware of the input they have in this field. The Personnel Committee, composed of three students and six faculty members with voting privileges, evaluate the effectiveness of each professor. The student body plays an integral part in this evaluation process for the committee weighs heavily the results of the Personnel questionnaires and the Student Government Course Evaluations. (The personnel questionnaires are mailed to individual students who evaluate specific professors they have had during their years at Juniata College.) The committee then sends its final recommendation to the Provost who makes a final decision. Students are encouraged to appear before the Personnel Committee or the Provost with any concerns they share pertaining to any faculty member.

Another area of discussion revolved upon the Admissions Office. Students were disturbed by the number of withdrawals last year as well as the quality of students granted admission to J.C. First, as of September 30th only one student had withdrawn as compared to 14 in September 1974. Also, as of September 30th the number of inquiries from possible applicants has doubled compared to last year. Although this factor can not be interpreted to mean that admissions will double, it does perhaps suggest an increased interest in Juniata College by high school students. Also, in answer of complaints that academic standards had fallen, an academic probation policy was instituted in the spring. Finally, many students last year were disturbed by the lack of Placement service available to graduating students. In answer to this interest, authorization for the hiring of a Placement Officer has been granted. This individual will aid students in securing employment or admission to graduate school and will serve as a valuable resource to upperclassmen.

There was also a controversy over the use of athletic facilities last year. For the first time this fall, the Women's Field Hockey Team and the Club Rugby teams have played their games on the football field.

Another concern to some students last year was that if they had a serious problem (physical, mental, or emotional) college authorities had to become involved before that student could secure help. This is also a fallacy. The college , which does employ professional counselors, a psychiatrist, nurse and part-time doctor, can not and does not try to prevent any student from securing help from local community agencies. Also, any medical records kept by the college are destroyed at the time of the student's graduation and open to their inspection any time during their four years at J.C. The definite advantage to proceeding through college channels though, is that Juniata will pay for the first medical visit. But for the student who desires to avoid college channels there are many helpful community agencies in Huntingdon including Drug Crisis (643-3733) and Family Planning (643-5364).

Finally, a major concern last year was student/faculty participation. It appeared as if few people were willing to become actively involved in college activities. Where was the small college community atmosphere students had come to Juniata to experience? Regrettably the commission has discovered no majic potions that if mixed in with "Frankly Goods" and "Tuna Melts" will automatically instill in each student the desire to become involved. On the other hand, the commission would like to express their delight in the participation by students, faculty and administration at Fall Mountain Day, Homecoming, and Parents Weekend. The increased participation in these activities hopefully is an omen of a very promising year; the beginning of a new 100 years at Juniata where there will exist a truly unique and beneficial quality of life.

My heart is in the right place, but I sure wish that I was a little bigger!

Anyone Interested In Skiing? Here's How To Save Money

If you are in college, graduate school, high school or technical school, don't go skiing until you read this. The Student Ski Association has a unique program which will save you from $1 to $15 a day on ski lift tickets, lessons and equipment rentals at over 150 major ski resorts nationwide.

The program works like this: present your SSA Student Ski Card at a participating ski area's ticket window on a weekday and you'll get your day lift ticket for half the weekend price. The same goes for ski lessons and equipment rentals at the ski area. On weekends and holidays you'll save at least $1 on your lift ticket—at some areas as much as $5.50!

For example, a regular weekend lift ticket at KILLINGTON, VT. normally costs $11. With an SSA Student Ski Card a student will pay only $6—a $5.00 per day savings.

Here are some typical weekday lift ticket savings at major ski areas: Killington, Vt. $5; Mount Snow, Vt. $3.50; Waterville Valley, N.H. $3.50; Sugarloaf, Me. $4.75; Boyne Mtn., Mich. $3.00; Indianhead, Mich. $3.50; Lutsen, Minn. $4.50) Copper Mtn., Colo. $2.00; Squaw Valley, Calif. $2.00.

Membership in the Student Ski Association costs $7 for the entire season. There is no limit to the number of times that the Student Ski Card may be used at any one area.

SSA also publishes POOR HOWARD'S COLLEGE GUIDE, TO SKIING which contains technical information, such as number of lifts, trails, vertical drop, restaurants and other facilities, on every participating area. To save students money on lodging, POOR HOWARD'S has a unique guide to low cost lodge nearby participating areas.

Every year SSA offers a potpourri of weekend and week-long ski "carnivals" and beach vacations. Each carnival is at a major ski resort like Aspen, Steamboat, Killington, Mt. Snow, Sugarloaf or Boyne Mountain. Daytona Beach is a popular spring vacation destination offered by SSA to members who are looking for a change from the snow.

Priced to fit any student's budget, the "Great Ski Carnivals" include first class lodging, lift tickets and,

WJC - Hopeful Changes

by Donna Caton
News Director of W.J.C.

Our campus radio station, WJC, has undergone several changes and additions this year which will hopefully better inform and interest students of Juniata College, and listeners in the Huntingdon vicinity. The major changes occurred in the news Dept. of WJC. Until recently, the news heard over the air was a "quickie rip and read" job in which the disc jockeys, between songs, dashed to the UPI (United Press International) newsprint machine, grabbed whatever had just been printed over the wire service in the way of sports, news, and weather, and read it—unread and unrehearsed. Now, in addition to the newly formed student news service, which broadcasts weekdays at 6:00 and features world, local, and campus news, along with sports and weather — WJC has purchased and soon will install "The American Entertainment Radio Network" system. This is the ABC Contemporary News Service, an audio line from New York to WJC. It will replace the UPI service, and will cost the station $120 a month. Being automatically channeled into the station, the service will simply be turned on every hour by the DJ's, and Juniata College will receive its first national news direct from the ABC service. Also broadcasted with this system will be other topics of interest in brief, including the Christian Faith Line, Consumer Action, and several famous personalities. Every day, after the 6:00 news, the Juniata Student News Service will follow.

The Network is scheduled to arrive for installment this week, and will be put into operation beginning the week of the 3rd-10th. It will undoubtedly be different and entertaining, so how about tuning into the new WJC music and news station and finding out what this is all about.

The Wine Snob Debunked

by R. Corbin Houchins
THE WINE SNOB DEBUNKED
OR
You Can't Taste While Talking

Benjamin Franklin said, "Wine is constant proof that God loves us and loves to see us happy."

Unfortunately, some people aren't happy with wine unless they can reduce its appreciation to arguments akin to the number of angels that can be accommodated on the head of a pin.

To be sure, the glories of the grape are many and various. The last thing we need, however, is another self-proclaimed pundit swirling a glass and talking about the Gay-Lussac equation while claiming to perceive Gregorian chants and the Rites of Dionysius in the wine.

Just as one need not be a botanist to appreciate a rose or a meteorologist to delight in a sunset, you need not be an enologist to enjoy a glass of wine.

It may be that wine snobs exist because table wine, the kind of wine that increases the pleasure of food (and hence the most important category from an aesthetic standpoint), is relatively new to America. For a long time, the pleasures of table wine have been taken for granted by American families with strong European heritages and by the upper class. But until relatively recently, only a minority of wines shipped in America were table wines. Only in 1969 did table wines make up the majority of shipments. Since then, the category had grown steadily both absolutely and relative to other types.

One of the by-products of the new popularity of fine wine was the wine snob, ready to dictate, pontificate, and obfuscate. There were special glasses to consider, the appropriate wine with each dish, not to mention correct temperatures ans serving procedures. And the wines themselves had to be from places with strange and confusing names.

What some wine drinkers haven't realized is that straight-forward standards of what looks, smells, and tastes good are applicable to all wines. There is no compendium of tasting secrets known only to people who can say Grand Echezeaux five times fast. When the fundamentals are known, with a little practice you will discover that wines disdained by the snobs may stand very comfortably beside those famous European names. More importantly, you will find you are comfortable enough with good wines to share Ben Franklin's relaxed attitude — and that is the most important step toward real appreciation.

In my next three columns, we'll take a close look at tasting techniques.

Letters to the Editor

Dear Sir:

I am concerned at the degree of misunderstanding about the Program Review which seems to exist, as exemplified by Suzi's article two weeks ago. Faculty and students alike need to take the experience seriously if it is to fulfill its goals, namely, to enable the student to demonstrate as high a degree of understanding as possible of his Program of Emphasis and its relation to other pieces of his college experience. It is not a test of how much a student knows, but of how deeply he can think and communicate about the disciplines he's chosen to concentrate on, their methodologies and assumptions, and the moral dilemnas peculiar to each. This is one of Juniata's ways of trying to ensure that each student has a final opportunity "to put it all together", to be reflective about his college experience. In order for this experience to be rewarding to all involved, time and planning are absolutely necessary, and they in turn demand commitment by faculty advisors as well as students. Our collective purpose is to do all we all can to aid us in being liberally educated persons, persons who believe they have choices, who have the tools to examine and analyze the implications and values of each choice, and the "guts" to make a choice.

Thank you,
Elizabeth E. Cherry

Dear Editor,

I am writing in reference to the article, "POE Review—A Royal Pain" of the October 16 issue of The Juniatian. I ask that you pass my compliments on to Ms. Baker for an argument well written, and further request that my differing point of view be accommodated in print.

I do not doubt that Ms. Baker's regard of program review as "fap" probably exemplifies the attitude of a good many senior Juniatians (—all the more reason for me to take issue to it). But I also believe that responsibly forged opinions are malleable when confronted with new information or different logic. And so, I will present a rebuttal to each of the major points Ms. Baker makes against Program Review. Please regard my comments as food for opinion-forging and not as attacks.

1) Ms. Baker claims that the objective of program review, the evaluation of the student's achievements in his/her college program, is better judged by one's four-year record of grades than by a bout with program review. To me this seems equivalent to saying that evaluation based on the sum of the parts precludes any advantage in evaluating the whole. I suspect that the majority of Juniatians believe that the POE package is at least different, if not greater, in its implications than a transcribed list of courses. And by this, the POE as an entity in itself warrants review if an evaluation of a student's achievement is to be at all comprehensive.

2) Ms. Baker then claims that three of the Program Review requirements are redundant exercises, i.e., that students deal with the subject matter of their POE, the rationale for the coherence of their POE, and the relationship of the POE to the student's life purpose, —redundant because a student must have already dealt with these issues when writing a program, and then again in reviewing it. Agreed, the issues dealt with are the same, it is the dealing that differs. In writing a POE, one is proposing a plan and expressing some expectations with what little insight one can scare up. In reviewing a POE, one hopefully footnotes those same oversimplified sentences with four years of acquired insight and meaning, and finally asks, "Did I do what I set out to do? How well?"; i.e., one evaluates.

3) I, like Ms. Baker, have noticed that HEA is many ways a "prep course for your Program Review." It seems that HEA profs guide this personal research, where one's advisors evaluate it in a program review. To me this only suffests that the HEA format could be generalized.

4) Ms. Baker is annoyed that "if your program review is not important enough to require passing (for graduation), why make the comments a permanent part of your transcript?" The explanation to this is practical rather than philosophical: if graduation was contingent upon passing program review, almost no teacher would have the heart to flunk you. This was exactly the situation with the Comprehensive Exams of the previous curriculum. In that case both the graduation requirement and the evaluation were virtually worthless. At least by our present system the evaluation (comments) are meaningful.

5) I concur with Ms. Baker's comment that the real test of a college program is the acquistion of a job or admission to graduate or professional school, (although I would extend this to include how far and how fast you go from there). But contrary to Ms. Baker's implication that this deflates the significance of Program Review, I would think it would tend to make program review all the more valuable. Here is a dry-run opportunity to discover some weak points and do something about them, or just plain learn something important to your field, without putting your job or admission on the line.

All of Ms. Baker's discontent with program review is associated with the structural policies. I think I've answered to these and hope to have dented a few opinions as a result. It is my experience that the success of failure of a Program Review depends solely on the attitudes and efforts of the student and faculty involved. I hate to be a bore, but what you get out of Program Review is definitely a function of what you and what you make your advisors put into it. It is a bare-faced fallacy to pass off one's own laziness as a fault in the system. You owe it to yourself to give program review a fair shake.

LETTER

In last week's Juniatian, the article by Todd Lins reported a "closed Senate meeting." His facts were inaccurate. We feel that these misconceptions should be cleared up.

The entire meeting was not closed but only a small part. There were committee appointments to discuss and approve. The Senators felt that they would feel more comfortable not discussing the appointments in front of Administrators and other students. Also, the meeting was not closed by the Eighteenth Amendment, as was related by Mr. Lins in his article, but by a simple motion from the floor.

Ideally, the Eighteenth Amendment is a very necessary part for a government. Someone has to have the responsibility in deciding the constitutionality of any action. The Federal system, which the United States subscribes to, provides for a Judicial System and in England, Parliament decides constitutionality. For us, the Senate seems the logical group to make this decision. This amendment hardly seems outmoded.

He went to great extent to point out the parts of the Sunshine Law that were broken. In his eagerness, Mr. Lins failed to include the most important part of the law— Section One, which defines who the law applies to. If he had, it would have shown that the Sunshine Law applies only to state agencies. Juniata College Student Government has never, to my knowledge, been an agency of the state.

A Juniata Student takes time out for a relaxing tune.

(Along Muddy Run)

by Saltz

Although at the beginning of the year I made a vow to myself that I would not write one of "those" articles concerning the drinking policy here at Juniata College, I must break this promise to myself and drag you, the reader, and myself through this issue again.

The event that spurned the writing of this article was a letter that was printed in last week's issue by Mr. Thomas W. Woodrow. In short, Mr. Woodrow was upset that he had seen students of this school drinking alcholic beverages at the homecoming football game, and wished to warn the student body that such actions would ot speed the adoption of a more adult policy to wand the consumption of such beverages on this campus. I do not know about the one group that he spoke to, however, the other group was not compromised of students at the time Mr. Woodrow spoke to them, but rather was made up of very recently graduated Alumni of this college. I wanted to clear that statement up, and also would not desire to destroy Mr. Woodrow's credibility as the other folks that he saw drinking very well could have been students. Also, the line of reasoning used in his letter to the editor seems to be very popular trend of thought on this campus.

It has become a very popular ideal on this campus that if we placata the board of Trustees, that is, behave ourselves in the way that certain groups on this campus feel are acceptable, maybe these groups on campus will give us our privilege to consume alcoholic beverages on campus. The odd thing about this all is that for those who are 21 years of age now, technically if not practically are having this privilege inhibited now.

Mr. Woodrow's letter I wish to cite again, not to attack him directly, but rather to attack the ide that is floating around this campus He reffered to the group(s) of st dents as irresponsible and detri menttal to the attempts to make ou drinking policy more adult. If drink ing at athletic contests is unadul there are a lot of college and profes sional ballparks and stadiums tha should be left in on this piece knowledge. Many Ballparks in bot Major Leagues sell beer in th statium, and you do not have t watch the NFL game of the wee too long before one can spot fa with flasks in hand. The Juniat community is going to have to re lize that the consumption of alcoh is deemed in this society as bein perfectly moral. Despite what so of the major powers on this camp believe for their own basic valu system, they are doing the studen and any one else who falls und their "jurisdiction" a grave i justice by forcing these beliefs u us.

Maybe the problem is with m and I simply remember the time the 1960's when their would ha been serious repercussions by t students at many major colleges a universities when students f something wasn't in it's best orde Maybe in this Bi-centennial year just think about the revolutiona spirit that got this country und way, and then look at how t students appear willing to lick th masters' hand and accept their mi bone reward, after of course show them we won't bite it.

The fault of the slow change this situation is not only the fault the Board of Trustees, or only t fault of the Administration of th college, and really not complete the students fault either. We mu remember, however, that if want something, and want it b enough we hold some power that can use to obtain our desires.

Reduced Pot— Penalties Bill

A bill to implement the recommendations of the Governor's Council on Drug and Alcohol Abuse has been introduced in the House by Representatives Norman Berson (D-Philadelphia) and Joseph Rhodes, Jr. (D-Allegheny). The proposed legislation would remove criminal penalties for the possession of a small amount of marihuana.

The legislation, House Bill 1699, would substitute a civil fine of $100 for the current penalty of thirty (30) days in jail and/or a $500 fine for the possession of under thirty (30) grams of marihuana.

The bill has been referred to the Judiciary Committee where public hearings are expected in the spring.

Similar legislation is expected to be introduced in the Senate in October 1975.

Mungs Are Everywhere What Is Your Reaction?

by Steve Townsend

The Dictionary of Environmental Abnormalities defines a "Mung" as "any film-like, clinging, noxious, repulsive substance which, upon contact, creates the impluse to flee, vomit, pass-out or spit uncontrolably in an effort to rid oneself of the terrible incleanliness of the thing."

One might assume from this definition that something as putrid as a Mung would only be found in the sewers of Bombay or Pittsburgh. This is not the case, however, for we have Mungs right here on our own secluded campus. "Impossible?", you say? Why, have you never been grossed out by the dried, snot-like yellow crust that seems to cling to a goodly number of our tea spoons? Of course, you have; and that yellow crust is none other than a Spoon Mung!!

Another noxious Mung that sickens students and petrifies visitors is the Coffee Stain Mung. Better known as the brown stain that coats the inside of our coffee cups, this Mung, unlike the stubborn Spoon Mung, can be scrapped off with a willing fingernail. However, many Mung specialists frown upon this procedure because of the tendency for such persons to develop leprosy.

A third classification of Mung with which we frequent contact is the Cafeteria Tray Mung. This foul occurance manifests itself in the form of a moist, repugnant globule of organic matter splotched against the very center of a tray.

Dealing with the unexpected appearance of such Mungs can be a very difficult and embarrassing problem. For example, when one is confronted with a Mung, should he fall to the floor in a fit of spastic repulsion or try to play it cool by pretending that it's not really there? Researching the question in the Biology dept., I found that one should allow the circumstances to dictate his response.

Recent Environmental Protection Agency Manuals state that "the playing it cool" approach is permissible only if one has not had a direct physical contact with the Mung. In the event that one actually happens to touch a Mung, E.P.A. declares that it is essential that one resist the temptation to convulse because, in most cases, the average human has only three minutes to cleanse himself of the toxic bacteria or risk the possibility of having it penetrate the epidermis! Their warning against directly ingesting a Mung is even more ardent due to a recent incident at a West Varginia College.

It seems that a student had inadvertently finished half his cup of coffee before noticing that the cup's Mung had been flaking off and floating to the surface. He died of Diarrheal Dehydration before he made it to the exit!

Even though these warnings ring of potential disaster, leading a normal existance in the presence of innumerable Mungs is still very possible. For a minimal price, N.A.S.A. will sell you an air tight, Mung proof space suit.

" A Review of the Movie, Papillon"

by John S. Porter

The movie, Papillon, played by Steve McQueen and Dustin Hoffman, was very well done. The scenery in it fit the characters and the theme. Jungles, swamps, beaches, and ocean were all used to "set the stage" for different parts of the story. Every time a shift in ideas occurred, such as new characters and a new sub-theme, the scenery would change. The characters played their parts very well, and it was directed with painstaking detail.

Papillon, the movie, was shot on site in French Guiana, and portrayed the stark realities of prison life (or death), for thousands of condemned French prisoners, who had been sent to the only French colony in South America.

Papillon, the man, played by Steve McQueen, is convicted of killing a pimp. He didn't do it, but knows who did. He refuses to reveal that information, as he refused to tell who slipped him the cocoanuts, when he was in solitary confinement. Papillon (which means butterfly) is sent to the penal colony in French Guiana. He attempts escape several times, only to be brought back and placed in solitary confinement — the first time for 2 years, the second time for 5 years. During the second escape, in which Dustin Hoffman takes part, Papillon meets up with some aborigines, living in thatched huts. Their chief asks Papillon to tattoo a butterfly similar to the one Papillon has on his chest, onto the chief's chest. Also during this escape, a Roman Catholic nun turns McQueen over to the Spanish, who in turn, take him back to the French in Guiana. This is one of the truly sad scenes in the movie. Another sad time is when one of the partners in McQueen's escape, dies and is fed to the sharks.

In the book, authored by Henry Charriere, many bodies are thrown to the sharks. On one "burying", Papillon goes along to pay his last respects to a friend. The sharks in their desire to eat the dead man, push the body in an upright position, as if he is walking on the water. This horrifies Papillon so much, that he almost falls overboard.

Although this movie cost $1.00 and didn't start until 10:15 Friday Evening (Oct. 24) it was well attended. I had estimated only 100 people would show up. There must have been 3 or 4 times that many, who turned out to see the movie. Students, parents, and even faculty viewed the realistic drama, of French prison life in the late 1930's.

Overall, I feel that while the movie does a great job (it won 5 Academy Awards), the book does a better job of showing life in France's notorious penal colony. The movie left out much of the book — more so than most movies. In the end of the book, Papillon goes to live in Colombia. The movie doesn't tell where he goes. I viewed the ending of the movie as being very short and cut-off — almost as if the director was hurrying to get to lunch. It seemed as though he chopped off some very valuable scenes. You might want to read the book, to see exactly how it ends.

"Greaser's Palace"— A Most Outrageous Film At Juniata

by Michael Trim

On Saturday at 8:15 in Alumni Hall Juniata College will have a chance to witness the most outrageous and unique film to be seen on this campus all year (except if we ever get Pink Flamingoes). Greaser's Palace, a film by Robert Downey (A Prince) is an irreverant view of the world. It is a religious parody and a coment on the human condition which manages to be extremely funny. Mr. Seaweedhead Greaser, whom the palace is named after, is the tyrannical overlord of a small distortedly Western community. What happens when these bizarre Westerners meet a Messiah-like phenomena named Jessie (who is on his way to Jerusalem to see his agent Morris and to become an actor singer dancer) can only be described as unreal. Hamster called this film a "must" and Steve James can't believe that the film committee is actually going to show this movie to the campus. For 50¢ you are guaranteed seeing a movie you will never forget.

V-Ball Ladies Hope For Win

by Marge Morgan

The Women's Volleyball Club travelled to Indiana University of Penn. on Wednesday night October 22 and returned with two more losses. I.U.P., a large state school, has two very strong teams and uses a very advanced and complex offense-defense system.

The varsity lost two games to none. In this match the defense showed great improvement in spike coverage, but the offense was almost totally lacking. When the offense was able to set up for a spike, they did look good. The second team also lost in two matches after losing a 14-9 lead in the first game. The Juniata serving consistancy, long a sore sport, was improved in both matches; but as often happens, the team let one serve get the best of them which was a major factor in the defeat.

The club was scheduled to play a home match with Wilson College over Parents' Weekend and was disappointed by a last minute cancellation. Juniata's next, and possibly last, match is a home contest Wednesday evening October 29 with Altoona-Penn State. The club played Altoona earlier in a September scrimmage at Altoona Campus, and the team is hoping for a victory.

Cross-Country Loses - Running Below Average

by Evagelia Lyras

With three more meets to go, the X-Country team is 4-1. Running below average times, the team had a bad day and bowed to Shippensburg, 25-35, on Wednesday, October 22. Again Jack McCullough and Paul Wilson raced home ahead of the pack. Jack, being timed in 33.37, was followed by Paul only 12 seconds later. The Indians, however, did not appear till Dave Parker managed to squeeze in between the Raiders and grab ninth place. The Raiders had come instrong and made a monopoly by seizing third through eighth place. The Indians again disappeared but showed up again as Steve Hooper, Austin Robison, and George Anderson ran in to capture 12th, 13th, and 15th place respectively.

Despite the fact that two of the top six men, Paul Wilson and Dave Quig, could not run, the team got its revenge on Saturday by squandering Dickinson 21-34. Jack McCullough, finishing way ahead of the group, ran in first followed by Dave Parker and Steve Hooper. Dickinson took the next three places but Austin Robison and Mike Bodley butted in and grabbed 7th and 8th place for the Indians. Also running for the team were George Anderson, Adam Marder, and Evagelia Lyras.

On Tuesday, October 28, the runners travel to St. Francis for a tough meet as will be the one the team will travel to on November 1 against Delaware Valley. According to coaches Meditch and Mitchell, with another all-out team effort, as that against Dickinson, the team will be able to conquer the remaining three teams, so keep your eyes open and watch the team continue its winning streak.

Rugby Club Wins Again End With A 5-1 Record

The Rugby Club closed its season last Sunday at College Field by splitting a pair of games with the Lancaster Rugby Club.

The Juniata "A" team beat Lancaster's first side by a score of 13-4. Freshman Tom Morris opened the scoring in the first half by beating the Lancaster backs to a loose ball in their in-goal. Al Kulp made the conversion kick.

Early in the second half, Lancaster came back to narrow the gap with a try on a sustained attack along the left touch line. The conversion attempt was missed, however, leaving the score at 6-4.

Juniata struck back quickly with a sudden and dramatic drop-kicked goal from 30 yards by Alan Kulp, raising the Juniata lead to 9-4.

A final touch was applied by Jim Kistler, who broke down the sideline for a 60-yard run ending in a try. Kulp again converted.

Key factor in the Juniata victory were superior conditioning, hard tacking, and ball pursuit. Junior Tom Terndrup did some especially nice kicking into open spaces, where other players could follow up fast enough to prevent Lancaster from mounting an effective attack.

In the "B" team game, Juniata did not get as many breaks, and lost 12-3. On the verge of scoring several times, the "B" squad never quite finished off an attack. Several good running movements were stopped by passes that traveled forward (illegal in rugby). An exciting first-half tandem breakaway by Bill Berrier and Jerry Blecher went some 70 yards, but was stopped by a last-ditch tackle on the 5-yard line by a very fast Lancaster back. A second-half break by Brian Ashworth was also halted by the last defender. The "B" team's only score was another drop-kicked goal by Al Kulp, filling in a position after playing the entire "A" game.

The club would like to thank President Binder and Athletic Director Nadzak for allowing their home matches to be played on Collegefield, the only location on campus that is currently suitable for rugby.

The club's overall fall season record finished at 7-2, quite a good showing for a relatively inexperienced group. The club is as yet uncertain whether it can play a normal spring season, due to a possible shortage of players. Novices are always welcome, and anyone who might be interested in learning the game and playing in the spring should contact a club member as soon as possible.

As this season ends, the club would like to give a special acknowledgement to its seniors: Jerry Blecker (President), Chris Davidson, Lee Flinner, Skip Hartman, George Kourakin, Alan Kulp, and Todd Price.

With so many things going on, these parents and alumni are trying to decide what to do next!

THE JUNIATIAN

VOL. XLX NO. 7 — Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 — November 6, 1975

The Church In The World

During 1975-76 Dr. Calian holds the Distinguished Professorship of Evangelical Christianity at Juniata College. We of The Juniatian thank him for his permission to reprint his recent article which appeared in the THEOLOGY TODAY. Dr. Calian's publication will appear in three consecutive issues.

THE CHURCH IN THE WORLD

by Carnegie Samuel Calian

Triple celebrations in the Soviet Union

The timing of our trip was excellent. We arrived in the Soviet Union during a time of celebrations. Such was the experience of our traveling Seminar on Eastern Christianity which I led last Spring. My original goal in organizing the seminar was to witness a Russian Easter in Moscow, which happened to fall on the weekend of May Day festivities this year, and was followed several days later by the thirty-year victory anniversary of the "Great Patriotic War" (the Soviet name given to World War II). These celebrative manifestations (May Day, Easter, and the thirty-year anniversary of victory) left imprints upon our group of twenty-two ecumentically oriented Americnas. Our group consisted of grassroots lay persons and clergy interested in Eastern Christain worship and culture. While each celebration was unique, the accumulative impact is etched deeply into our memories.

Arriving in Moscow in the midst of the extended May Day activities was impressive. The main road from the airport to our hotel was lit up in Christmas-tree fashion. The streets were decorated with bright red neon stars; the walls of buildings were draped with huge hed banners and gigantic posters of Marx, Lenin, and Engels, the trinitarian leadership of Marxism. There were also painted signs (in Russian), exhorting "Workers of the World, Unite." Thousands of Moscovites and visitors were filling the streets and Red Square. The crowds were orderly, and the streets in spite of the numerous decorations were quite clean. The atmosphere was electrified with excitement. We quickly settled in our hotel and joined the vast throngs in the area of Red Square. It almost seemed as if the crowds were awaiting some kind of resurrection from Lenin's marble mausoleum. However, the famous tomb with its hourly changing of guards remained quiet and serene, the focal point of honor and respect during the May Day weekend.

The following day, I tried to make contact with the Foreign Office of the Russian Orthodox Church to announce our arrival. Letters had sent earlier to the proper authorities. I was informed, however, that no one was in the office due to the May Day celebrations and the pending prepararion for the Easter Eve services. Our Intourist guides also informed us that it would not be possible to visit the famous Monastery at Zagorsk. This came as a disappointment, since it was on our agenda. However, I did learn later that day that Patriarch Pimen was going to preside over the Easter Liturgy at the Yelokhovsky Cathedral. There would be a large crowd there, and I was informed that we might not be able to enter.

Yelokhovsky Cathedral is the seat of His Holiness Pimen, Patriarch of Moscow and all Russia. The church itself is famous for its icons, relics, tombs, and excellent music. It is the largest operative church in Moscow, a city of voer seven million people. There are approximately forty-five active Orthodox churches in the city and another four congregations of Old Belivers. In addition, there is the well-known Baptist Church (which the Seventh Day Adventists also use on Saturdays), the Roman Catholic Church of St. Louis, the Armenian Apostolic Church, a Muslim mosque, and two Jewish synagogues. The total number of religious places of worship is quite modist, given the population of the city.

We were told that the parishioners attending the Easter Eve Service at the Yelokhovsky Cathedral would have "passes," but we did not have any passes. The purpose of the passes was to assure an orderly procedure and to avoid congestion. Hoping that our lack of passes would not prove to be a barrier, we took a metro to the Cathedral and prayed that we would be able to pass through the three checkpoints on the way to the Cathedral, and finally find our place in the visitors' (diplomatic) section of the church.the first checkpoint was approximately three blocks from the church and consisted of uniformed guards who questioned us and then allowed us to enter the area; the second checkpoint, two blocks from the church was represented by civilian guards with red arm-bands who listened to our request and allowed ut to continue; and finally in front of the Cathedral, a line of men in dark suits allowed us to pass single-file into the visitors' entrance. We were an hour early, but the Cathedral was already packed.

There are no seats or pews in a traditional Orthodox sanctuary; people stand for the entire service. W saw women, with tightly wrapped scarfs around their heads, predominating in the congregation; but there were men and young people present as well. Overhead in different balconies there were two choirs. A single priest chanted the liturgy below in the center of the nave before the iconostasis (the screen of icons which separate the sanctuary from the nave in Orthodox churches). An Orthodox nun was preparing the candles for the service. At approximately 11:15 p.m., a bell was rung, and the Easter eve service began. The choirs sang and then responded to each other antiphonically; the music was magnificent. The ecclesiastical procession began with deacons, priests, and bishops filling the nave of the church. The Patriarch presided from the center in a commanding position. The deep resonating male voices of the clergy echoed throughout the Cathedral. The pageantry of the moment was felt by the thousands present. It was clear to everyone, Orthodox and non-Orthodox alike, that the service was building up momentum for the climactic stroke of twelve when the lights were dimmed and His Holiness Pimen announced, "Christ is risen" [Christos voskres], and the tremendous ground swell from the congregation responded, "He is risen indeed!" [Voistinna voskres]. All were eager to have their candles lit, representing Christ as the light of the world. In that sanctury of flickering candles, it was not difficult to understand why the Orthodox tradition has been referred to as "the candlelight kingdom." What a testimony to the reality of the resurrection! What a witness to the abiding hope of Christians everywhere! It was an unforgettable experience for our ecumenical group of Americans from Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant traditions.

On Sunday, unable to visit the monastery at Zagorsk, we continued our tour of the city under the knowing guidance of our Intourist leader, a young woman who understood Moscow well. The afternoon found us visiting the "U.S.S.R. Ex-

Educational Cutbacks?

by Mark Wiener

Last month a Governor's Review Board, that was established by Governor Shapp last February, last month made 412 recommendations on how to save a possible 359 million dollars for the state. These savings would come from reducing current expenses in such areas as health, the closing of certain mental hospitals, and ending support to the state's general hospitals); stricter control on government related spending; and a new plan for state-wide higher education, that is, a cut in aid for both colleges and students alike.

Some 120 recommendations were made in the review for "improving" the higher education system. They involved state owned colleges and universities, and the Pennsylvania Higher Education Assistance Agency (PHEAA), from which thousands of students get financial aid every year. The review stated that around 80 million dollars can be saved through "increased effectiveness in organization, planing, and administration in the education areas".

What could this all mean to you? Well, 80 million dollars could be saved without significant cutbacks in expenses and services. So if the recommendations were to be carried out, it could mean higher college tuitions and smaller financial aid grants. In these times of sky rocketing college tuitions and expenses, that have even prevented many students from attending, any cuts that would cut state support would be ill-advised. Such enactments of recommendations of theis nature would only serve as a catalyst in the increasing decline of higher educational institutions.

In four short weeks the JC B-Ball players' practice sessions will hopefully pay off.

Cultural Irrelevance-Does Art Still Reflect Values

by Perry Habecker

Art has traditionally been for the average man. Paintings have always had a definite iconography. Music has always followed rules which produced ear pleasing results. Architecture has always explicitly exemplified cultural values. Dances typically enriched the culture with their religious or historical merit.

Unfortunately, recent times have seen the promulgation of an eclectic sort of art— uncreative art that (1) tends to confuse the sensient observer, (2) appeals only to those few with some esoteric knowledge, (3) "overwhelms" those who wish to maintain a social distinction. If contemporary art is a reflection of contemporary values the art of today must represent weak, conflicting, and unintelligible values, or if you will, a culture in a state of confusion. These values were demonstrated by the Artist Series dance performer last Tuesday. (It should have been required viewing for HEA students.)

Dilettante that I am, I observed the entire show. But I guess it was the optimist in me that kept me in Oller after the first five minutes. I mean, I didn't want to miss anything should something actually happen. That "something" never did happen. Throughout the performance I couldn't help but think, "people pay to see this?" (I was sort of proud of myself for having sat still for 83.5 minutes, though.)

There was nothing inherently meaningful in the dance. And believe me, I tried to find some meaning! The "rave" reviews as printed in the program could not have seemed further from the truth.

Let's be more specific. The performer's actions seemed to show a concern for self-destruction, narcisism, and dusting off the stage all at the same time. Also, there appeared to be hint of synchrony of body contortions to the music. There were distinct scenes: Dancer plays with cape; dancer plays with her hair; dancer tries on an entire wardrobe; dancer discards entire wardrobe; dancer becomes a butterfly. The dancer did posses a certain amount of physical skill.

I was impressed by some aspects of the show. I thought that the colored lights on the stage were very pretty. Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony was interesting to listen to. The performer did try to explain herself. It was unfortunate that she pulled a leg muscle on the JC stage. Upon recovery might I suggest ballet, burlesque, or belly-dancing. Those dance forms I understand.

Donaldson Elected Chairman

James R. Donaldson, manager for marketing analysis and planning with AP Parts Company, Toledo, Ohio, has been named as chairman of the 1975-76 Annual Support Fund at Juniata College. The announcement was made by Dr. Frederick M. Binder, president of the college.

According to Dr. Binder, Juniata will seek, under Donaldson's leadership, to reach a record support fund goal during its centinnial academic year. The 1975-76 fund, juniata's seventh such effort, will seek to raise $150,000, some $20,000 more than last year's campaign.

Donaldson, a native of Coraopolis, Pa., and a 1967 Juniata graduate, assumed his current post with AP Parts, a leading manufacturer of automotive exhaust system and shock absorbers, in 1974. He had been manager of planning services with Leslie-Locke Building Products Co., Akron, since 1972. Both AP Parts and Leslie-Locke are divisions of the Questor Corp.

Prior to joining the Questor firms, Donaldson had also served as economic analyst with the Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. He holds the master of arts degree from the University of Akron, and is married to the former Linda Clever, a native of Belleville, Pa.

In addition to his support fund duties, Donaldson will continue to serve on the commission to Plan for Juniata's Future, which is currently preparing a report to be given to the Board of Trustees next year. The report will suffest "courses of action for the college in her second century of service."

We, the undersigned, are all DJ's at WJC and we take exception to the article written by Ms. Caton last week. Since she is a novice at her job, maybe she didn't understand the situation last year. We liked to read UPI News. We didn't grab "whatever had just been printed over the wire service" — we read our news at the prescribed time, (no "quickie rip and read") and why weren't the DJ's asked if they wanted the change, or for that matter, how come the whole campus wasn't asked?

Although the ABC News Service may be a good gimmick for the present we didn't think it will sustain listener interest. BRING BACK UPI!

Calian Writes 'Gospel' Book

Dr. C. Samual Calian, the J. Omar Good Visiting Distinguished Professor of Evangelical Christianity at Juniata College, will deliver a paper based on his book, "The Gospel Scoording to The Wall Street Journal," at the annual meeting of the American Academy of Religion, to be held this weekend at the Palmer House in Chicago.

The paper, entitled "The Wall Street Journal — Values and Assumptions — A Theological Critique," is one of a number to be delivered to groups from within the 3-4000 delegates expected in Chicago. The meeting, which will also include the Society of Biblical Literature, is the leading gathering of religion personnel throughout all of higher education.

Dr. Calian's book, published this year by John Knox Press, compares the "gospel" of The Wall Street Journal — The "bible" of the business world — to the kind of educa-hibition of Economic Achievement," covering 500 acres. The permanent exhibition includes everything from cars and radios to spudniks and cyclotrons. The history of sputniks was fascinating. Aware of the joint space venture between the U.S. astronauts and the Soviet cosmonauts, our group showed great interest in this carefully laid-out exhibit hall.

An unexpected incident occured in the sputnik exhibit hall. Our Intourist guide introduced me to one of the directors of Soviet television who mentioned that he had "spotted" our group entering the sputnik building. He wondered if we would like to be interviewed on Soviet television to share our impressions of the May Day celebrations. How would you react to this surprising request? I informed him that I would like to further the spirit of detente between our countries, but would also like to ask a favor in turn. I explained that ours was a religiously oriented group, interested in Eastern Christianity. He listened as I explained our disappointment in not being able to visit Zagorsk. Could he help us to visit Zagorsk? He sympathized, but informed us he couldn't do anything about the situation. I informed him that I seriously doubted if the group would wish to cooperate with him, even though his request seemed quite innocent. He smiled and understood. We shook hands and went our separate ways. Our Intourist guide observed our communication and later said, "What kind of Christians are you, not to cooperate?" We may have done wrong, but I couldn't help but suspect that our Intourist guide and the TV director were equally surprised at our realistic stance on that Easter Sunday afternoon in Moscow.

We witnessed our third celebration the following week in the city of Kiev, the capital of the Ukraine, the second largest republic in the U.S.S.R. The Ukraine is the breadbasket of the Soviet Union, collecting over forty-two million tons of grain annually. Kiev has a population of nearly two million people, the third largest city in the Soviet Union. It was in Kiev that Orthodox Christianity was introduced through the efforts of Prince Vladimir in 988 A.D. During World War II, Kiev was extensively destroyed. Its population before the war stood at 850,000, and at the conclusion of the war it was reduced to 185,000. Forty-eight percent of the city's dwelling space had been leveled.

Today the city has been beautifully rebuilt and aesthetically harmonizes its buildings and commerce, with the twisting flow of the Dnieper River adding to the city's beauty. Kiev was the right place to be for the thirty-year victory anniversary of the "Great Patriotic War," recalling the defeat of Nazi Germany. Our Intourist fuide cited that twenty million Soviet citizens lost their lives during World War II. The issues of war and peace surfaced in our minds, reinforced by our own costly involvements in Southeast Asia and the Middle East.

On the morning of May 9th and the big parade, half of our group was invited to a reception by Bishop Makari, vicar bishop of Kiev. He will soon represent the Russian Orthodox Church at the World Council offices in Geneva.

We had been initially invited to visit Kiev by Metropolitan Philaret, Archbishop of Kiev, who had been our guest last March at the University of Dubuque Theological Seminary in Iowa. Metropolitan Philaret led the Russian delegation to the United States as guest of the National Council of Churches. Unfortunately he was not present for our visit due to responsibilities with the Holy Syrod in Moscow in connection with the victory celebration of the Great Patriotic War. In that war, the Russion Orthodox Church gave considerable time, talent, and funds to combat fascism. The Russian Church collected the funds necessary to furnish an entire Soviet tank division in World War II, in addition to the many heroic acts performed by its clergy.

On our way to the grand parade, we visited Saint Vladimir's Church where a service in commemoration of the anniversary was being held. The parade itself was a very elaborate and impressive affair. People stood in lines for hours to honor the veterans; they were reserved and sedate. While this was a time of happiness, there was no wild applause and definitely no yelling or Co-Educational Living- Its Not Meant for All!

by Lynn Bowman

Students from the Student Concerns Committee of Student Government and Residence Hall Association have been researching the issue of co-education living. They have already written to one hundred and fifty three colleges and universities in the surrounding area in order to find out if they had any type of co-educational living situation and if so, what kind.

In the past couple of weeks, surveys were passed out to the students presently living in the dorms to find out how many students wanted a co-educational living situation at Juniata and which was the most preferred. The results of the survey are the following:

1. We only received 438 surveys out of the 950 we sent out.
2. Approximately 20 more males than females turned surveys in.
3. As far as which type of co-educational living situation was preferred, we found that from most desirable to least desirable was this:
   —Dividing floors in half by long and short halls (for example long hall could by male and short female where separate bathroom facilities were— as in South Dormitory)
   —Floor by floor.
   —In dorms such as Tussey-Terrace where each side is a separate unit— one side being male and the other side female.
   —No co-educational living.
4. In answer to the question— What do you anticipate to be your parent's reaction to co-educational living, the most frequent answer, over all others, was non-committal.

At this point, I would like to clear up some things about this survey. First of all, the reason the whole co-education project was started was due to student interest in the issue. Secondly, if we ever get a co-educational situation at Juniata it will only be for those who want it. Some people stated concern about turning the whole campus co-ed because they said they didn't want to live in that situation. Also, there were comments about bathroom facilities. People stated that they wouldn't want to share a bathroom. Well, if one would have read the questionnaire thoroughly, one would have realized that none of the options mentioned entailed sharing bathroom facilities. In fact, it is a state law that there be separate bathrooms for males and females.

In questions no. 5 and 6 in the questionnaire where we asked students if they forsee any problems with co-educational living and what impact did they feel co-educational living would have upon dorm life, the answers were quite disappointing. I feel too many people put so much emphasis on the sexual aspect of co-educational living and on the fact that it will help the maintenance of the dorm. Although the letters we have received from the different colleges and universities indicated that their was less destruction, I feel that it is a minor factor. Also, I feel the sexual aspect was blown out of perspective. In studies that have been done and from the letters we received, they have found that males and females living in these type of situations become friends not sexual partners. The sterotyping of males and females is broken down and the whole situation is a much more natural way of existing than to be on total opposite sides of the campus.

We are eventually going to make a proposal to the Dean of Students concerning this issue so these surveys are very important. We need to have opinions of a good majority of the campus and I do not feel we have that, as of yet. So if you have not turned in a survey yet, and you still have it sitting in your room, we would greatly appreciate you filling it out and slipping it under the Student Government door or sending it through the intra-college mail to box #995 by November 14th. Only with valid results, that is enough of the students opinions, can we even start to make it work.

(Along Muddy Run)

Last weekend I made a trip home to do a little small game hunting and predictably had a great time. There are a number of factors involved why this weekend was more enjoyable than a weekend at J.C., but one of the biggest reasons was for the first time in a while I ate good food. In retrospect, it is amazing how that factor alone could make such a difference.

Last week, because of that hunting trip, five of my apartment mates enjoyed a batch of rabbit stew that was terriffic. Although we didn't have to buy meat, we figured the cost as if we had made that expenditures, and we still ate far under two dollars apiece. It seems to me that you do not have to spend a great deal of money to make food that would be acceptable to most of the Juniata College community that frequents Ellis Hall at dinner time.

The critical issue here, as I see it, is the care that is taken in the preparation of each individual meal. I knew nothing about making rabbit stew and neither did any of the other "cooks", but we took our time and turned out a decent dish.

I do not expect that our food service will ever turn out a meal "like mother makes", but they could upgrade the quality of their food by simply taking a little more time and pride in their work.

"The Sexes" — A Flannel Robe Leads to Self Introspection

by Steve Townsend

I discovered, upon having been given a robe, that the function of my taking a towel to the shower was not to have something with which to dry, but rather, to have something with which to cover myself, for on three consequtive occasions, I found myself having to stand in the shower stall until I had dripped dry. The impatient moments I spent there, besides fostering a state of severe self perturbment, gave rise to the revelation that my attention to life's everyday detail was sorely lacking.

On the morning following the third of these disquieting episodes, I began, in a determined yet still begrudging manner, to apply my talents to what most persons though of as the simple considerations of living a normal human existence. I soon realized, not being deprived of any essential faculty, that I had spent the major portion of the last three years lost in a personally private universe of irrelevant metaphysics. If I had somehow muddled through it was not because of any special knowledge of how to feed the body, dress to the weather or properly prepare for bathing, it was, I thought, because the confines of my limited existence allowed me to go about my business like some wind up toy bumping against the close quartered walls of a shoe box. Feeling deep pangs of shame, I decided that if I was going to continue to consider myself a metaphysicist, I would, straight away, have to learn about life in all its particulars. Responding to my determination, I headed, for good or ill, straight back to Earth.

It was down there, there upon that rock of wasted human potential, that I, with senses attuned to all I felt to be menial, realized that my cherished personal universe was the gift of someone else's devotion. Her gift, her love, the lingering shadows of her sacrifice, were in pervasive evidence, like the traces of a well chosen perfume, over the entirity of my life. Virtually nothing that I confronted was of my own doing, my very room seemed composed of her thoughtfulness. My bed was made but I had not touched it. I wore jeans that were finely patched with the most intricate of stitchings, whose beauty, up untill then, went unapplauded. I heated my coffee upon a hot plate that she, all the while keeping my comfort in her mind, paid a quarter for at a public sale. And, ironicly, it was also her, envisioning me clad only in a towl and quite chilled as a consequence, who saw fit to present me with my flannel bath robe. It was frightfully obvious that my metaphysics, my universe, my repulsion from detail, in short, my absolute freedom, had been possible because she had assumed the bulk of my daily burdens.

I thought, in light of my new realizations, about what it all said, about what it all told. Certainly, it told upon my brutishness, revealed me, not as a member of the stronger sex, but as a member of the selfish one. It told upon my masculine sense of belonging to those cast in the finest of silver. Most of all however, it told upon the nature of my masculinity itself which, up until that moment, had grown uncultivated, wild, ugly and weed-like. I saw that had it not been for the tender prunning touches of femininity, like the making of my bed, the patching of my jeans, I would have long ago choked myself out of meaningful existence. But now, thanks to the clip inflicted upon me by the gift of the robe, I was able to begin the process of filling out my foliage and bringing my masculinity to fruit. I could only hope that when it came it would be as nourishing to the feminine belly as hers had been to mine.

Editor's Note: "The Sexes" is a new and occasionally appearing feature of the JUNIATIAN which attempts to grapple with the vital nature of men and women. All persons so inclined are welcomed to contribute.

Martin Scorsese Arrives!

"Mean Streets", directed by Martin Scorsese, will be shown on Friday at Alumni Hall at 8:15 for 50¢.

Taking place in New York's Little Italy where the Mafia and its various activities are accepted as part of life itself, the film delineates the struggles and decisions faced by Harvey Keitel as he slowly climbs into the hierarchy of the local Mafia family. Keitel's devoutly hoped for ascension is helped by his uncle (Cesare Canova), but hindered by the depth of his Catholic upbringing and faith as well as his friendship with a reckless young character John Boy (Robert De Niro), and his love for the epileptic Teresa (Amy Robinson).

"MEAN STREETS" deserves attention as one of the finer American films of the season."

Lines On Wine

by R. Corbin Houchins
E & J Gaool Winery
Through the Drinking Glass
or
What to See When Looking at Wine

The great Chinese chefs say that good food appeals to all five senses. It should be attractive to look at and a pleasure to smell, feel good in the mouth, produce a proper sound when masticated and, of course, appeal to the taste. Except, I must admit, for the sound effects, good wine possesses the same characteristics.

The tecnique of tasting is designed to permit evaluation of all the salient qualities of the wine. Professional tasters vary a good deal in the details of their tasting methods the best starting point in developing your own technique of tasting.

The wine you are going to taste should be in a clear, stemmed glass of no less than an eight-ounce capacity. (Clear, so you can evaluate the color of the wine; stemmed, so your hand does not heat it.) The glass should be shaped so that the diameter of the rim is slightly smaller than the diameter of the part that holds the wine and poured no more than one-third to one-half full. (Only partly full to permit volatile components of the wine to accumulate in the upper portion of the glass so you can smell them, narrowing toward the top to prevent the volatile substances from dissipating into the air.) Such a glass can be used for any wine on all occasions.

First, look at the wine. Look at a light source through the wine. Then look down through the wine at a white surface such as a blank piece of paper or a tablecloth that is well illuminated, tilting the glass until the wine almost runs out of it. (Looking through the wine will reveal any cloudiness or suspended matter; tilting the glass so that the wine is shallower permits you to evaluate the color more accurately.)

What we are looking for is clarity and pleasing color. Color variations, particularly among red wines, are considerable. If you take care to notice them, you will find that different wines are more or less pleasing to look at. For example, I find a bright magenta rather annoying, and am pleased by, say, a velvety garnet with hints of terra cotta at the edge. Your preference may, with equal justification, be just the contrary—the point being that there is an aesthetic factor to pay attention to, however you may react to it.

Some people also note how the wine slides down the inside of the glass after swirling. I find that factor (caused by variations in surface tension among wines) of very limited interest. A wine with a high glycerol or sugar content will tend to form "legs" rather than "sheets," but that is only a rough guide to something your palate can tell you with relative precision.

Next week we'll continue our discussion of tasting techniques with some remarks on how to smell wine.

Upcoming Play Tryouts Tonite

by Jim Donahue

David Rabe is a Villanova graduate and Vietnam veteran; he is the author of The Basic Training of Pavlo Hummel and Sticks and Bones, which both have appeared on Broadway to critical acclaim.

Rabe writes of Sticks and Bones, "A major premise of the play is that stubbing your own big toe is a more disturbing event than hearing of a stranger's suicide". The play is a haunting and powerful work that chronicles the return of an American soldier-from Vietnam to his all-too-average American family. Rabe probes the peculiar systems of consciousness that have given us things like TV commercials, Mom 'n Dad, supermarket reality, Sominex, and "Southeast Asian conflicts".

In order to make the production of this play a creative, learning-type experience, we'll be looking into Eastern theater and an experimental design; but, before we can even get to the basics of casting, we need actors and actresses. There are five parts for males and two for women in the play, and a chorus of an undetermined number. Getting involved in something like this might easily teach you things about theater or yourself, but should be fun, too; it you haven't had any acting experience, don't worry— we really don't want "actors" as such, only interested people. At least, this production will evolve from the group's own explorations into Rabe's ideas and those of the experimental theater.

If you'd like to help, in any capacity, tryouts will be held: 7:30 tonight, Thursday, at the Mini-stage in Ellis Hall.

Help Needed!

by Laurie Reider

The Mount Union community youth center, The Union Depot, needs volunteers. The center needs volunteers to supervise and plan activities and to answer a telephone hot line. Volunteers will be required to go through a training program in helpong, listening and verbal and non-verbal communication skills.

A Free University is also being started and helpers are needed to organize and teach classes. The Free University classes will be taught by anyone interested in sharing their skills or interests with others. If you've got a skill you'd like to exchange, plan to attend the organizational meeting for the Free University on Saturday, November 22 at 10:00 A.M. at the Union Depot.

If your interested in working with youth, this is a great opportunity to gain experience and training in helping skills.

If you're willing to work at the center on a regular basis, pick up an application from Bob Rielly (Good Hall) or 324 Lesher. Interviews will be arranged during November.

Any questions? ? Call 643-3733.

We'll be moving into the Union Depot soon and it is located at the corner of Green and Halley Streets in the I.O.O.F. building in Mount Union. Phone 542-4591.

C-C Defeated

by Evagelia "Teddy" Lyras

The Cross-Country team got ripped twice by losing two close meets to St. Francis and Delaware Valley. Due to a foot injury, Paul Wilson had to fetuchanty surrender his services to the team. The team has a chance of receiving his very worthwhile services at the Middle Atlantic Champions which will be held this Saturday, November 8th at Gettysburg.

Even though the Juniata runners captured the first two places, they lost both meets. At St. Francis Jack McCullough came in first by finishing the 5 mile course which ended in ¼ mile slow, gradual and murderous uphill in 25 minutes and 56 seconds followed by Dave Quig who ran the course in 26 minutes and 42 seconds. Juniata appeared again as Dave Parker came in 6th, Steve Hooper 9th, followed by Austin Robisson, George Anderson, and Mike Bodley. The runners lost by only two points, 27-29 (the lowest score wins).

Evagelia Lyras finished first in an exhibition meet against two other girls at St. Francis. She finished the 3 mile course in 22 minutes and 59 seconds.

Jack McCullough and Dave Quig finished first and second respectively in the meet against Delaware Valley on Saturday, November 1. Since the team had to run without the services of both Paul Wilson and Dave Parker, the team did not appear till Steve Hooper ran in to capture 8th place followed by Mike Bodley, Austin Robison, George Anderson and Adam Marder.

The team is now 5-3 and faces its last meet of the season away at Gettysburg on Tuesday, November 4th. For the past two weeks the team has been preparing the MAC's on November 8th. The team hopes to better its second place position in the MAC's by capturing first place this year.

Center Board Attends Seminar

BY David Corman

"Imagination: The Key" was the theme for this year's annual Region Four Conference of the Association of College Unions — International, Held on October 18-20 at Morgan State University in Baltimore, Maryland. Representatives from the Juniata College Board assembled with members from other college centers in Pennsylvania and Maryland to participate in a three-day exchange of creative and educational ideas dealing with the role of the college center in planning and providing activities for the campus community. Sessions offered to delegates covered a broad spectrum of topics: from leadership development and programming techniques to outdoor recreation and dinner theatres.

The Juniata delegation included Sally Pennington (College Center director) and the following chairpersons from the Center Board: Sam Sirianni (general chairman), Beth Simmons (general vice-chairman), David Brown (fine arts), Elaine Joyce (public relations), Ron Seiler (Coffeehouse and dance), and Meg Meyer (secretary-treasurer). All were impressed by the conference and emphasized it as being a personal, as well as social, learning experience. They also feel more aware of their respective roles in College Center programming and coordination; but they need ideas to work with. . . especially yours! ! All Center Board chairpersons will be glad to discuss ideas with any student or group — especially ones for winter term.

VB Team Close With Loss

by Marge Mortan

The volleyball club closed its season on Wednesday, October 29 with a very disappointing loss to Altoona-Penn State before a home crowd. In the first game Altoona jumped out to an early lead. Juniata began a rally but it came a little late and the Indians lost 15- . The second game belonged to Juniata as the club won its first varsity game by a score of 15-11. The club got an early lead and managed to hold off a late Altoona comeback for the win. Strong serves, especially by Linda Shaw and Cindy Piccirilli, were the key to the victory. Then came the third game and a very embarassing defeat. The Juniata team fell completely apart both offensively and defensively to lose the game and the match.

Following the varsity match an additional game was played to give girls who had not played in the first match some extra game experience. This game was delayed and interrupted by a few uncooperative male students who insisted on playing basketball after being repeatedly asked to leave by the coach.

The club would like to thank President Binder and all the members of the student body, faculty, and administration who supported us and came to our games throughout the season. We would also like to acknowledge our seniors, Cathy Crouse, Gail Lodge, and Linda Shaw, who will be very greatly missed next year. Last of all, we would like to say a very big and special "Thank You" to JoAnne Reilly who sacrificed many hours to coach us, drive us to matches, and take care of all the other problems the club encountered, and take care of all the other problems the club encountered.

We are anxiously looking forward to next year when we hope to have a larger schedule and bigger turnout of girls (remember, it's not late for you to start playing volleyball!). The club is also planning some fund raising events during the winter and we ask you for your continued support so that we can have an even better team next season.

David Rabe delves into the values and structures of consciousness in a manner that is new and imaginative.

Juniata Defeats Del Val

by Gary Moore

Under a clear and brisk October sky, Juniata defeated Delaware Valley College 19-0 in a football game which had the defense shining as bright, if not brighter than the offense.

Juniata's small but determined defensive squad held DVC to a total offense of 23 yards; while J.C.'s offensive squad went for a total of 297 yards.

J.C. scored in the first quarter with only 4:14 left to go. Oravec made a 24 yard drive; bringing in 7 points for J.C.

J.C.'s next scoring was on a safety, making the score 9-0, with 1 minute and 30 seconds left to go in the half.

On a 55 yard drive, J.C.'s offensive line and backs put Nosal in field goal range. With only 25 yards to "boot" the ball, the action was a piece of cake for Nosal. Now it was J.C. — 12, D.V.C. —0.

With 14:56 left in the game, after a 42 yard drive, the ball was given to Lipstein who sliced his way through Delaware Valley's defensive line, for the final touchdown of the game. Nosal Kicked for the extra point, which made the final score — Juniata College 19; Delaware Valley College 0.

There were individuals who stood out in the game. Al Lipstein rushed for 102 yards, giving him 30.3% of Juniata's total offensive gain. Stu Jackson and Jim Geheret knocked down Delaware's offensive line, as they had 11 and 9 tackles respectively. Bob Devine grabbed 3 of J.C.'s 5 interceptions from Delaeare Valley.

It was certainly a pleasant day for Juniata College's football team, and for all of us here, the students who cheered you on, wherever you may be.

Alumni Attend Seminar

Four Juniata College graduates engaged in the field participated in an Alumni Seminar Program on "Business Policy" Sunday and Monday, November 2-3, on the Juniata campus.

Alumni participants were James R. Donaldson, a 1967 graduate and manager of marketing analysis and planning for AP Parts Company of Toledo, Ohio; James B. Moose, a 1965 alumnus and manager of batch and direct material purchasing for Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corporation of Toledo, Ohio; and Terence and Constance Baysinger Burk, both 1968 graduates, who own Treat Shops of Westminster, Md.

Sponsored by the college's department of economics and business administration, the seminar program was designed to bring the "practical experience" of these business persons into the classroom.

According to Charles W. Wise, department head and chairman of the alumni seminar program, "In addition to supplying expertise, the participants serve as examples of successful Juniata graduates and provide role models for the student to look at."

The program opened Sunday evening with a general session and panel discussion. Each participant gave a general description of his or her company and its basic organizational structure, explained his or her particular position and how it fits into the overall workings of the company, introduced types of decision-making situations encountered, and gave a general idea of specific topics for Monday's sessions.

Three different types of sessions were scheduled for Monday. Each participant had three hours, two in the morning and one in the afternoon, furing which he or she talked with individual students about career opportunities and academic planning.

Each also conducted and hour-long session Monday morning, discussing a specific topic with interested students. Subjects were: nature of markets, customer relations and marketing strategies, by Donaldson; what is purchasing?— developing supplier relationships and illustrations from personal experiences, by Moose; financing the small business— credit policy, employment procedures and record-keeping, by Mrs. Burk; decisions in product diversification, advertising, store location, manufacturing and/or buying products and equipment purchases, by Burk.

On Monday afternoon the alumni sat in on the Business Policy course taught by Dr. Ronald L. Cherry. They observed the class as it dealt with a case study and arrived at a decision. The four alumni then offered reactions to the case study based on their previous experiences and also constructively criticized the class' handling of the situation.

"Business Policy" was the first of three alumni seminars planned by the economics and business administration department for the 1975-76 academic year. During the winter term "Public Accounting" will be the seminar topic, and "Corporate Law" is planned for spring term.

to current operating expenses, has exceeded its goal in each of its six years. Funds raised have totaled some $772,000.

In addition, alumni participation in Juniata's several giving programs — including the Annual Support Fund — reached a record high of 49 percent last year. The goal for participation this year has been set at 50 percent, one of the highest figures in the nation.

Fresh Air - Turning Stale?

BY Mark Wiener

For reasons apparently more politically motivated than for the need of change in executive policy, President Ford last week committed what has been refered to as "the Sunday Night Massacre;" that is, the firing of the Secretary of Defense, James Schlesinger; and the director of the CIA, William Colby. Ford also "asked" for the resignation of Henry Kissinger as the head of the National Security Council.

To replace Schlesinger Ford appointed (to be approved by congress) his White House chief of staff, Donald Rumsfeld; and to take Colby's office Ford picked George Bush, presently the head of the American liaison office in China. Although Kissinger agreed to relinquish his office at NSC, he will be replaced by his hand-picked aid, Lieut. Gen. Brent Scowcroft, who will more than likely stay aligned to Kissinger's present policies.

Another future change in Ford's administration was announced the following day. Nelson Rockefeller stated that he would not run on Ford's '76 election ticket as Vice President.

The big questions are why Ford fired Schlesinger and Colby, and why Rockenfeller decided not to run with Ford in '76. There are various theories, but probably the most prevalent one has to do with Ford's determination to get the Republican presidential nomination. At least this would explain Rockefeller's decision. If he had not announced that he wouldn't be on the '76 ticket, sooner or later Ford probably would have. Such an action would be to please the more right-wing factions of the Republican party who would rather vote in the primaries for Ronald Regan than an incumbent with such a liberal running mate as Rockefeller.

Reasoning behind the firing of Colby as the director of the CIA may be because Ford considered him a liability since his organization has become son controversial under his direction. Unfortunately, Ford lacked the foresight of how Colby's firing would impede the Senate's investigation of the CIA and its covert operations, so after Colby had cleaned out his desk President Ford asked him to stay on until congress approved Bush to take his place.

Schlesinger's firing came as more or less a surprise to him, even though in the past he had hinted at quitting if the defense budget did not meet his demands. His push for more spending on arms and his "Don't trust Russia" policy was in direct opposition to Kissinger's delicate detente with Russia, and the criticism that he holds too much power. This move may somewhat lessen Kissinger's prestige, but how vincing Ford to fire his opponent, but to balance out the negative reaction from the conservatives of his party, Ford insisted on Kissinger losing his office at NSC, to lessen the criticism that he holds to much power. (Tis move may lessen somewhat Kissinger's prestige, but how much power he will actually lose is doubtful, since his replacement is one of his own "yes men", and in the military; which means he won't be a "political" threat to Kissinger. However, Kissinger may be jumping from the pan into the fire, since Schlesinger's replacement, Donald Rmsfeld, has long been known to maneuver to lessen Kissinger's control over foreign policy.

Whatever Gerald Ford's reasons for the drastic shape-up, it has cost him some of his Truman-inspired "plain speaking" that was to renew the people's confidence in the presidency after the Nixon disaster. At his news conference he constantly avoided explaining logically his reasoning for the shake up. The "new breeze of fresh air" is slowly turning stale a reflection on the stagnation that it was meant to sweep away.

The Church In The World

THE STATE OF THE CHURCHES IN THE SOVIET UNION
by Carnegie Samuel Calian
PART II

It is difficult to know the true state of the churches in the Soviet Union. A recent study by Trevor Beeson entitled Discretion and Valour: Religious Conditions in Russia and Eastern Europe (Fontana Books, 1974), published by the British Council of Churches, is helpful but incomplete. It is not possible to have a complete accounting of the situation. Visitors to communist countries will draw different impressions, depending upon their experiences and exposure to the faithful. In my own travels to Marxist countries, I have found that the situation varies greatly in each place due to hsitorical conditions in that nation's past and the shifting climate of the day.

An official visit, under World Council of Churches sponsorship, or to an academic gathering, or on personal invitation from one of the churches, is an opportunity not to be missed. I have experienced each. The generosity and hospitality are difficult to match. On the other hand, a tourist may encounter restrictions and more limited contacts. If possible, both kinds of exposures should be experienced. I make this point, because I feel that those on official trips need to be reminded that they, too, are experiencing limited and chosen situations.

The churches in a Marxist society have freedom to worship, but otherwise are limited in comparison to activities of churches in the west. Also, Christians within communist countries are cautious; the paranoid atmosphere of the Stalin era still prevails as well as the more narrow Marxist interpretations that give de facto second class status to religious believers. It is true that four years ago a law was passed in the Soviet Union that enables believers to bring into court unbelievers who are seemingly persecuting the faithful for their beliefs. Although I do not know of any such caese tried, it is comforting to learn that such a law now exists.

While we were enjoying beautiful Kiev, we could not ignore the fact that a few months earlier the Rev. Georgi P. Vins, leader of the Soviet reformed (dissenting) Baptists, was sentenced (January 30, 1975), for his religious zeal, to five years in prison to be followed by five years in exile, in spite of many appeals from abroad including one from the World Council of Churches. Also, there is the case of Vladimir Osipov, an Orthodox layman, recently arrested and now imprisoned in Moscow for publishing a journal in which he expressed an Orthodox Christian point of view. His wife, expecting a child, is kept in a cold hut with her health reportedly being further endangered by constant harassment and surveillance. While I do not personally know the facts or merits of either of these cases, Christians need to consider these persons as they seek to appreciate and evaluate church-state relations in the Soviet Union. Realistic Christians cannot afford to be caught up in a euphoric ecumenical cloud, oblivious to the struggles of fellow Christians whose cases cannot be easily dismissed from our thoughts. Perhaps history will show that their witness is comparable to the well-known stand of Dietrich Bonhoeffer in Hitler's Germany.

As the churches continue to practice their limited freedom of worship in the Soviet Union, we in the west should rejoice that these churches are very much alive. I am often surprised to learn that a number of Americans consider that all the churches in the Soviet Union are closed. This is far from the case. For the Orthodox churches, the celebration of the divine liturgy continues to be the most effective weapon to combat atheistic propaganda. There are church services daily, testifying to the transcendent vision of the Christian hope. This worship is often dismissed by the contemporary Soviet citizen as irrelevant for a modern communist state.

Following our visit to the restored churches of the Kremlin, a woman from our group remarked to the Intourist guide, "How is it that you know the history of the churches in the Kremlin so well and aren't a believer? Aren't you passing over what has made Russia so great? Aren't you harming the nation's greatness by not encouraging this churchly heritage?" Our Intourist guide shrugged her shoulders. On another occasion, a pastor in our group remarked, that the communists were committing an over-kill on Lenin. Our Intourist guide asked, "How is that so?" The pastor replied, "Why if I saw as many pictures of Jesus Christ as you have of Lenin, I would find if revolting." Again, our Intourist guide was thoughtfully silent.

It seemed to me that the atheistic propaganda for the most part is too simplistic and that most Soviet citizens are more sophisticated. In the Soviet Union today, people are asking questions, and more are coming to the churches for curiosity, if for no other clearly stated reason. There are no firm statistics on how many are attending churches, but the number of Easter cakes blessed in preparation for the Easter services indicates considerable participation. In one church alone, we were told, it was estimated that 40,000 cakes were blessed. Each cake represents a family, or even a few families in some cases. On the average, an Easter cake serves four persons; in that parish it was estimated that some 160,000 persons were touched by the Easter celebration. Many Russian church-goers, I was informed, believe that the church is in a stronger position

That's Justice?

WASHINGTON, D.C. (Liberty Lobby News Service)— How would a husband respond if he heard his wife screaming "Help! Police!" when she answered pounding at the door of their home . . . at night? This set of circumstances did face Kenyon Ballew and his wife, and their natural reactions ruined their lives.

Our police departments and the police officers who carry out their duties under laws that handicap their efforts must be admired. However, federal agents in some instances use "police state" tactics as in the Ballew case, when they allegedly were looking for illegal weapons.

The case received wide press coverage and Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) commented on the incident as recorded in the Congressional Record. He said, "Mr. Speaker, what has come to pass? Bearded strangers in scruffy clothes smash down the door of a man's home. The man is shot in the head. His wife is thrown half-naked outside as the man lies bleeding on the floor. The home is vandalized, walls smashed, furnishings ransacked, and dozens of personal possessions carried away.

Where did this happen? Was it in Hitler's Germany, or in Soviet Russia at the height of the Stalinist purges? No, it happened on the outskirts of Washington, D.C. It was committed by agents of the Internal Revenue Service, Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Division and the Montgomery County Police."

Congressman Dingell continued, "He was taking a bath in his apartment about 8:30 one evening. His wife heard shouting and heavy pounding on the door. She said she repeatedly asked, "Who is it? All she could hear through the pounding was the demand 'Open up!' She ran to her husband.

While the husband was getting out of the tub, these so-called 'peace officers' proceeded to bash down the door with an 85-pound battering ram. Naked and dripping from the tub, the man grabbed an antique revolver from the wall and went toward the living room, encountering two officers, whom the police themselves described as dressed in 'scruffy' clothes, carrying guns.

The records shows that the husband slumped to the floor with a bullet in his brain. The agents then shoved the wife, half-naked, out into the hallway and then turned the apartment into a shambles looking for illegal weapons. They refused to let the woman aid her husband who lay bleeding on the floor, but later handcuffed her and took her to the police station under arrest for what offense we may only imagine."

There was an investigation, and the couple sued. However, Federal Judge Alexander Harvey has now rejected the suit, claiming that Ballew had no right to resist the federal agents even though it turned out that the attack on the Ballew was for nothing — the agents found nothing illegal!

This unjust decision, similar to many others in recent years, appears to cater to the illegal rather than the legal. Law-abiding citizens fear up-holding the law because the criminal can sue them for a violent act, and win.

That's justice?

Letters to the Editor

Letter to the Editor:
To the "students" of Juniata College,

I am writing this letter in regard to last week's "(Along Muddy Run)" article, and all others on this campus with similar feelings.

It seems to me that everybody and his brother has to get in on the act and follow a certain few that enjoy condemning the food put out by Hallmark Food Services, in Ellis Hall.

First of all, one must realize that upon attending an institutional system, the food has to be mass prepared, for approximately 1000 people 3 times a day, in a short period of time. But, at home the food is probably prepared for the same length of time, but for a far less number of people. So right here the preparation for the number of individual meals has a great effect upon the out-come of what we eat.

Secondly I would like to know, with what authority the author has to critize on the amount of time and pride that is put into the preparation of our meals? Another point along this line would question the knowledge of the quality of the food before it gets to juniata College? Although I myself do not know the answers to these questions I am willing to make the assumption that the Food Service cannot afford the time or money to be choosy over the contents of nearly 3000 meals a day as "Mom" can be over a possible 20 meals a day, except in larger families, but even this number is probably an over exaggeration.

O.K., I'll agree that occasionally we come across an under-average meal, but even "Mom" burns the hotdogs once or twice.

I think that it is up to us, as adults, to have a little more understanding and respect for the people that put their time and efforts into the preparation of our meals!

Student Gov't

by Hank Hallowell

Once again finals loom ahead and another term draws to a close. It seems that the last few weeks I have been inundated by students asking "What has student government been doing?"— "I never see any Results." In answering these students I first have to restrain myself from violence' because after all, answering questions and receiving feedback is a large part of the Senator's job as Student Government members. I feel hostile, though, because students just don't seem to care. Frequently, meetings are sparcely attended. At times no one comes. You might think that it was the nature of the meetings; for example the food service. I know that there are more than eight people that have gripes about the food at Juniata College (there were eight people at the last food service meeting).

Just so the students won't have to say "what has student government been doing", here are just a few things to come. . . .a speaker program to better inform the students —Residence Hall Association sponsored study breaks finals weekend in each dorm—study rooms in Sherwood— Marathon Weekend— Centennial Project Committee— Student Concerns survey on alternative residence life styles— a future survey on credit for the D grade— another Student Government sponsored used book sale for the students' profit— and after break. Student Government will have hall meetings throughout the dorms. We hopefully will be more noticeable than we have been. However a true Student Government can not be realized without more concern on the part of the student body as a whole.

today than forty years ago. Those coming to church are not a simple or superficial crowd, but committed individuals. Today, the faithful are desirous of celebrating holy communion ten or more times a year, whereas earlier it was done only once a year in Orthodox services.

It is my own observation that combating atheism is not the main issue confronting Christians in the Soviet Union. As the average Soviet citizen becomes more affluent—and this is the case as I compared my notes with my earlier trip to the Soviet Union ten years ago—the primary struggle today is for a more meaningful and purposeful life that is measured beyond material gains. Soviet citizens are searching, as we are, for more satisfying answers that promise a more fulfilled life. Will the churches be able to provide guidelines and answers that will communicate to these searching individuals? The main issue facing the Soviet citizen is a longing for a larger vision of life that is apolitical. Hopefully, the worship opportunities allowed the churches might be the avenues that speak to the restlessness stirring in people's hearts.

This longing for a more meaningful life was expressed unexpectingly by one of our Intourist guides. She accused us in the west of being too materialistic—with our automobiles, homes, appliances, etc. "We in the Soviet Union," she said, "are more idealistic. We have a more simple, primitive existence and take time to enjoy ourselves. We have time for the spiritual life—reading, thinking, and helping one another." I found our guide's remarks quite interesting, since another Intourist guide had earlier labeled us as "idealists," and communists as "material realists." Apparently in labeling us, these two Intourist guides were negating each other in the labels picked for either side. Of course, there is no end to name-calling and the exchanging of labels. Labels in themselves are lifeless. The labeling process, however, does reveal confusion and searching on the part of our Intourist guides for some kind of all-encompassing style of life that includes material and spiritual needs.

I suspect that the increasing affluence in the Soviet Union may be causing the very same malaise known in the west; namely, a restlessness and searching for a more fulfilling life-style that extends beyond Madison Avenue endorsements and communist slogans and truly begins to address the daily struggles in order to minimize the dehumanizing process. I was really struck by the similarities of our aspirations, while our political leaders debate the nature and extent of detente. Will the churches in the future contribute significantly toward a more purposeful life-style, or will they continue to be preoccupied, in both the east and west, with their own survival and internal politicking?

VOL. XILX NO. 8

November 13, 1975

(Along Muddy Run) by Saltz

It's a big College, there's a lot going on. This is a true Juniata incident taken from the files of Lt. Wednesday. The names have been changed to protect the innocent. On November 5, 1975, 2130 hours.

I was working the night watch out of the 302nd Flory division in the East House Precinct. My name is Wednesday, My partner, detective Sergeant Stones noticed an alleged disturbance at the Sherwood Forest Parkway. He reported the incident to me. That's where I come in. I carry a badge.

We moved immediately, noticing the number of combatants. We called for backup. Officers Beaver and Peaches responded. Upon arrival we were met at the door by Capt. B. Bear. He briefed us on the near riotous situation. We had to move fast. We entered the building on the first floor and I ordered the Men to implement plan C. They moved to their respective positions through the screaming mob.

The mob unleashed a battery of eggs and fired torrents of water. We were pinned down. Little did they know that we had a plant among them. His code name was R.A. He didn't want to blow his cover, but he helped us out. He flanked the raging mob from behind and gave us the seconds we needed to restrain the mob.

Time was running out. The streets were in upheaval. We had to intervene in a confrontation with the townies. We left officers Beaver and Peaches to restrain the Sherwood mob. Sergeant Stones and myself moved out into the streets to deal with the townie dilimma there.

They had regrouped, ready to strike. The situation was volatile. We were approached by a gang member. She inquired as to our intentions. I replied we were friends. My partner, Stones, then asked them to break it up. They did so. No arrests were made, but a stern warning was issued by Capt. B. Bear.

We returned to the 302nd division. The beer was on Stones. I settled down to write this report.

The above part of this article was a fun spoof pointed at the show Dragnet, but also is aimed at an incident last week where a group of Juniata students participated in riling up some of the town people. For the information of some of the younger members of the Juniata community, there have been repeated battles between younger town members and college students. These confrontations have often ended in a good time of razzing; but many have broken into fights and have caused much damage to be done to personal property.

It was mentioned in one of my prior articles, notably the one about the homecoming parade, that we have done much to shorten the gap between the townpeople of Huntingdon and our Juniata College Community. The sad point that I have to make here is that a multitude of things can be done to include the town population in our activities, which hopefully would help us to get along better. However, a few incidents like bombing townspeople's cars with eggs and water, can put up another barrier that will be harder to break down than the present one. It would seem to me that even if good relations is something that if everyone doesn't work toward, it should be a goal that at least no one works to destroy.

Because of the work load that students experience at this school, particularly at the end of a term, it is very easy to understand how frustration can build up and the need for release of this agitation can result in pranks and horseplay. I've felt the same thing over and over again, and raised a little hell myself. In retrospect, however, and viewing this incident, I think that we should realize a few things, be included.

As funny as it seems we are college students. This puts us in a class of people which is described as some as cream of the crop. It would seem to me then, that we should not have to resort to causing others inconvenience because we ourselves are a bit strung out. We are training ourselves at this school to enter professions where stress and frustration are a part of the job. This being the case, now is as good a time as any to start living and dealing with this aspect of our lives.

The Pressure of Finals Is Often Unbearable!

by Zig

"Put down the knitting, the book and the broom, it's time for a holiday." Okay, old chums, it's going to be a long, hard frustrating stretch from now until the end of finals. So by Monday night if you are swaying on the brink of insanity from too much reading, too many equations, and too few hours outside the confines of a library, take a study break and come to where life is beautiful.

Come to Cabaret and let director, Bob Fosse take you back to the "devine decadence" of Berlin in the 1930's, where Hitler, the little fanatic with the Chaplin mustache, ful", and where Joel Grey as the M.C. puts the cabaret acts across with captivating vulgarity.

He is joined by Liza Minnelli, a first class talent, who makes Cabastage of the Kit Kat Klub "where life is beautiful, the girls are beautiful and even the orchestra is beautiful" and where Joel Grey as the M.C. puts the cabaret acts across with captivating vulgarity.

He is joined by Lize Minnelli, a first class talent, who makes Cabaret something extra-special. As Sally Bowles, she is supposed to be a third-rate singer in a second-rate dive, belting out tunes to pay for booze and cigarettes. Salley's booze and cigaretts. Sally's charming antics are sampled by a young Englishman (played by Michael York) who is in Berlin to study for his doctorate in philosophy. What he gets instead is a firsthand view of the growth of Naziism, a course in lowlife and a confrontation with homosexuality. Sally trades his affections for the cabaret stage where as an aspiring actress, she is doomed to spend her career.

It is on stage that Liza is as wonderfully exuberant as her musical numbers. She tears into each song with such vitality that as soon as she opens her mouth and begins strutting aroung the stage she emits an uncontrollable electricity that reaches out to touch each and every viewer. Her excellence didn't go unrecognized for she (as well as Joel Grey) walked away with an Academy Award on Oscar night 1972. So on Monday at 8:15 p.m., leave your troubles outside of Oller Hall and for 50¢ allow yourself to be charmed by Liza.

Poetry Contest

A $1500 grand prize will be awarded in the current Poetry Contest sponsored by World of Poetry, a monthly newsletter for poets.

Poems of all styles and on any subject are eligible to compete for the grand prize or for 49 other cash or merchandise awards. Second place is $500.

Accorcing to contest director, Joseph Mellon, "We are encouraging poetic talent of every kind, and expect our contest to produce exciting discoveries."

Win Top Award in Student Essay Contest

Students in college or graduate school have an opportunity to win a top award of $2,500 cash plus a $2,500 research or travel grant in an essay contest on welfare reform sponsored by The Institute for Socioeconomic Studies.

Leonard M. Greene, Institute president, said the award will be made for the best 10,000-word paper on the subject "Income Supplementation — A Solution to America's Welfare Crisis."

A second prize of $1,000 cash and up to 10 consolation prizes of $100 each also will be awarded. The staff and trustees of The Institute for Socioeconomic Studies will be judges.

The research program of a nonprofit foundation of White Plains, N.Y. is focused on exploring possible reform of the United States welfare policy.

Deadline for entry of papers is March 1, 1976. The essay contest winners will receive their awards at a presentation ceremony in Washington, D.C. early in May 1976. While in Washington, both the essay winner and runner-up will meet with ranking members of Congress in a symposium on welfare reform to be sponsored by The Institute for Socioeconomic Studies.

In announcing the competition, Mr. Greene said its objective is "to encourage America's students to think constructively about the vast problems caused by the failure of present U.S. socioeconomic policy."

Entrants' papers, he said, may give consideration to such topics as an evaluation of existing welfare programs, techniques of income supplementation, and how work incentives are affected by present welfare policy and how these might be altered by adoption of an income supplement.

The Institute will have the option of publishing winning papers, Mr. Greene said. During 1975, The Institute has published two monographs, "Great Britain's Tax Credit Income Supplement", incorporating a paper by the Rt. Hon. Lord Barber, T.D., and "Social Welfare Abroad", a comparative study of the social insurance and public assistance programs of industrialized democracies throughout the world, by Bette K. Fishbein, staff economist of The Institute for Socioeconomic Studies.

Currently planned for publication is an analysis by former U.S. Representative Martha W. Griffiths of Congress' next major effort to develop welfare reform legislation.

The Institute reserves the right to cancel the first and second prizes if, in the sole judgement of the judges, no suitable papers are submitted.

Registration forms and complete information about the student essay contest may be obtained by writing to Essay Contest Director, The Institute for Socioeconomic Studies, Airport Road, White Plains, N.Y. 10604.

Entertainment Available At Kit Kat Klub During Finals

by Steve Townsend

Starting this Saturday almost every one of us is going to be subjected to at least a couple of final exams. Those of us who have been across that route before know that it is not a pleasant road to drive. Studying for those tests is kind of like trying to take a '55 DeSota up an ice covered mountain on bald tires — no matter how hard you get down you never seem to get ahead. And, as if the burden of attempting to be competent at being comprehensive was not enough, inevitably, we find ourselves also having to deal with a number of other difficult enigmas.

By far, the most incredibly insane of all these riddles is the scheduling of our reading day after the start of finals. Only a Philosophy major can understand the logic behind that boner. Afterall, by any kind of normal sense of space and time, studying the day after the big exam is the equivalent of pissing with your pants up. Its equally futile, very sloppy, and just as embarrassing. Besides that, it's only the start of our difficulties.

The fact that our professors are human presents us with another problem as we approach finals. Just like us, they can show a capacity for dawdling and procrastination. What was possible to put off many times was put off. As a result, we find that, during the concluding week of classes, we have to write that last paper and take that last hourly in order to satisfy the syllabus.

Needless to say, finishing these assignments and still adequately preparing for finals is quite an accomplishment, but even if we manage (as we somehow must), there remains the frightful possibility of our drawing a complete blank in the testing room itself. How horrible this is! The hours upon hours of pouring over every page in the text become wasted only because you have grown too tense to allow your mind to relate it to your pencil! When this happens we pound on our temples, shake our fists in exasperation and start groaning out loud in an effort at evoking a little sympathy and understanding from the professor. Of course, its all in vain because no amount of acting can change the impression he receives upon reading three blue books full of introductory paragraphs.

Finals period is not all pain and bloodsweat however, it does have its rather delightful moments. Those moments begin the minute we hand in that last test paper. Our worries about grades, about CUM averages, about professional schools are temporarily swept away by a great tidal wave of joyous relief. It is during those sweet moments, and only during those moments, that we are able to forget that the whole exhaustive process starts a new in the next term.

The rooms in which the Writing Program Final Exam will occur are as follows—

Lines On Wine

by R. Corbin Houchins

WHAT THE NOSE SHOWS OR How to Enjoy a Clean Breath of Wine

Last week we looked at wine. In this column, I'll describe the step that requires the most care: smelling it.

What we are seeking are aromas, which are smells derived from the grape, and bouquet, which consists, at least potentially, of somewhat more complex scents, not necessarily related to the odor of the original grape juice. Bouquet develops from natural chemical changes which take place as wine ages. The wine does not have to be old or of a particular vintage to have a bouquet. Usually, some bouquet will begin developing right after the wine is first made, even before it is bottled.

The main difficulty with smelling wine is that your sense of smell fatigues extremely rapidly. If you take three whiffs of a wine close together, the first is likely to be fairly accurate, the second, extremely distorted and the third, of little value. The key, therefore, is in paying close attention to the first smell and in considering it for a few seconds while your sense of smell rests.

Swirl the glass in a circle parallel to the floor so as to coat the inside surfaces with wine. (The purpose is to increase the surface area from which the volatile components can evaporate.) At this point, some professional tasters prefer to take a long deep sniff with the nose four or five inches from the glass, ponder that, then let the sense of smell rest for a little while before swirling the glass again, sticking the nose well down into it and sniffing deeply. The majority go directly to the nose-in-glass sniff. In either case, you should breath in at a moderate pace and fill the lungs, then exhale slowly. What really improves with practice is not the olfactory senses themselves, but the ability to concentrate on and remember what you are smelling. Closing your eyes may help your concentration.

In smelling a wine, I look for cleanliness (absence of disagreeable odors), a smell that is vinous (i.e., "like wine" rather than grape juice or something else), and, in some wines, characteristic aromas of certain grape varieties, certain grape smells which suggest fruits other than grapes, overtones of spices and perhaps some subliminal suggestions of things having nothing directly to do with wine, like a pine forest or a sea breeze. In all cases, however, the main question is whether the smell in sum is pleasing and complementary to the occasion.

The next column will complete our introduction to tasting technique with —at least— a taste of the wine.

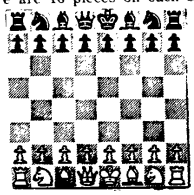
Learn to Play Chess!

by John S. Porter

On Wednesday, November 6, 1975 — the first move by those interested in chess, was made when two dozen players and spectators attended the chess tournament, held in the dining room of Ellis Hall, at Juniata.

For those of you who aren't familiar with how to play chess, let me give you a brief idea of the game. Chess is a very ancient game, going back to India, where it began in the 7th Century A.D. as a "war" game. It quickly spread to Persia, Africa, and to Europe, where it was a required subject in German schools as early as 1011 A.D. The board consists of 8 rows of squares, each row having alternating 4 white and 4 black squares, so that no two block squares are ever adjactent to each other. There are 64 squares in all. Each opponent (there are 2) has 8 pawns, 2 rooks or castles, 2 knights, 2 bishops, 1 queen, and 1 king. There are 16 pieces on each side, making up 32 pieces in all. The board at the beginning of the game looks like this:



White always starts first. The object of the game is to move your pieces in such a manner, so as to be in a position to capture your opponent's king, thus ending the game

For those of you who don't know how to play chess, but would like to learn, contact Todd Matthews— in Tussey. For those of you who already know how to play, I shall not bore you further.

At the chess tournament, there were a dozen players and about a dozen spectators. Twelve games were played at the same time, with only 13 people. Todd Matthews went around to each board and made one move. He came back later after his opponent had moved one piece, to make another move. The whole proceedure for all twelve games took a little more than 2 hours. Everyone lost except one guy. In this single game, Todd got whipped. Everywhere else, he won smashing victories.

Chess really became popular in America after the Boris Spasky/Bobby Fisher Chess Matches in Reyjavik, Iceland during the summer of 1972. It's a great game to play, so find a board — some pieces — and a griend, and join the chess club when it gets started at Juniata.

The Runners Place 5th in the MAC's

by Evagelia Lyras

Jack McCullough suffered his first individual loss of the season when Gettysburg, the 1975 Middle Atlantic champions, whipped Juniata 18-45. Jack has won 8 straight races this season. this time he placed third and saved the team from facing a shut-out on the extremely muddy and swampy, Flat Hand 5.1 mile course. Due to an unjury the team again had to do without the worthy services of fellow runner Paul Wilson. The Juniata runners showed up again as Dave Quig and Dave Parker tied for tenth place, and the rest of the team followed.

The team travelled again to Gettysburg on Saturday, November 8 for the Middle Atlantic Championships and returned with a 5th place position (out of 20 some schools) and a medalist. Jack McCullough placed a very respectable 6th place out of some 140 runners and received a medal for his performance. Paul Wilson, Dave Quig, Dave Parker, Steve Hooper, Austin Robison, and Mike Bodley gave the team support from behind in order to capture it a 5th place title. The race took place on a course that was not only drastically different from the hill-infested home course but also drenched because of the downpour that had fallen the night before.

Under the coaching of Donald Mitchell and Carl Meditch, the team has finished a successful season with a 5-4 record and is greatly looking to an exciting spring track season. On the whole most of the team will continue running and racing on their own during the cold, winter months.

Congratulations team for a successful season!

Christmas Spirit Prevails At JC

by Wendy Jacobus

During special holidays everyone's quality of life tends to improve, and this is true not only in towns and individual homes but on college campuses like Juniata. But there are always those Christmas holidays that are unequalled by any winter season that preceded them, and this December at J.C. promises to be one of those extra special Christmas times. The Commission on the Quality of Campus Life, in its concern for communication, would like to share with the college community the variety of "holiday happenings" on campus in which we can all participate.

The first example of this college commmunity Christmas spirit are the decorations erected by the Sophomore Class at Ellis Hall, the Junior Class at Good Hall, the Senior Class at Founder's and the Freshmen at Oller. Last year, with the exception of a few lighted dorm windows, little decorating was done on campus and the Christmas spirit seemed to be directly affected. But this year, through the efforts of the classes, the campus presents a real holiday appearance which seems to have helped boost Christmas moral. Hopefully all students were directly involved in the decorating of halls, dorms, or buildings because here was an opportunity to really spread holiday spirit. Along this line the greatest indicator of holiday togetherness was the willingness of college professors, maintenance men, and cafeteria personnel to help the classes in their decorating endeavors by donating Xmas greens, lights, and tools. In short, the decorating that was done was truly a "college community effort."

On another front are the Christmas parties. Even on "off years" parties flourish on campus and this year has proven to be a time that will be hard to beat. The most important aspect of the parties seems to be the cooperation that evolved. Entire dorms or towers have cooperated in throwing "gala affairs" this Christmas. Also, there was an extra bonus during the season, for the ban on "parties on halls" was lifted. Of course there were stipulations such as, the R.A. had to conduct an election in which anonymous votes were tabulated, and the results had to be unanimously in favor of the party on a specific date. Also, the Dean of Students Office had to lend its approval. But all in all, this temporary reinstatement of hall parties encouraged cooperation among students living in halls. Everyone was involved in the planning of parties.

But although individual parties fill an especially important part of the Christmas season, there are other events that occur in December which are qualitatively unique. Such an event is the Madrigal Dinner. The Madrigal Dinner, December 16th, is another affair where the whole college community is involved. Different classes are responsible for decorations and setting tables, entertainment is provided by members of the choir and orchestra, and there is usually a carol-sing. A special treat for students is the opportunity, which the Madrigal Dinner provides, of being served by faculty members. Also, there is an all-campus party following the Madrigal Dinner at the V.F.W.

Finally, a special addition to the holiday calendar this year is an evening of Christmas readings and music on Tuesday and Wednesday night, December 16th and 17th, at 8:15 in Shoemaker Galleries. On this evening Ester Doyle will perform a reading of Dylan Thomas', "A Child's Christmas in Wales", along with other Christmas readings and music which will be presented by members of the college community. There will also be a hot punch served. Many students and faculty members may not rate this event too highly on their holiday agenda but they are wrong to discard this event. Anyone who has never heard Ester Doyle will be missing an entertaining evening if they don't attend. Ester Doyle, a retired member of the faculty who is presently teaching one course at J.C., has a very special talent and the opportunities for students and faculty being able to experience this gift of hers are decreasing. She does not simply read "A Child's Christmas in Wales", she performs it. So don't miss this special addition to the J.C. holiday calendar.

It seems then the holidays at Juniata really do promise to be special; mainly because a lot of people were concerned enough to give of their time and talent to make this holiday unique. The key seems to lie in the fact that we all be willing to give of ourselves. But the season is far from over yet, and if you haven't been involved in class decorating projects or the planning of parites, there's still time to get involved in the Madrigal Dinner. But students are not the only ones who can participate. Professors were notified during Thanksgiving break that they were needed to serve at the Magrigal Dinner. This event can only be an all college affair if all members of the college constituencies are involved; students, administrators, and faculty. Simply then, it seems quite true that especially during the holidays if we'd all give a little we would all truly gain alot! Merry Christmas!

Founders in years past has perhaps a better appearance than one could perceive it currently.

Is US Republic Threatened By Too High Debt Ceiling?

by Robert M. Bartell

The temporary ceiling on America's national debt now stands at $495 billion . . . and the interest amounts to about $75,000 a minute!

Because the Administration assisted and encouraged by the Congress, has allocated the expenditure of about $35 billion more than they collected in taxes, these paper dollars will have to be printed and added to the national deficit. The first figure that hit the newspaper was $604 billion . . . an increase in one year of $109 billion! That's more than the entire budget a few years ago.

Liberty Lobby opposes this profligate spending. During hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee, Liberty Lobby's tax policy consultant, Dr. Martin Larson, expressed his views.

Dr. Larson said, "The federal government now disburses about $14 billion a year for education, although education got along very well without any of this money before 1964, and the net result has been that the cost of education has quadrupled. The government disburses billions in revenue sharing, with the result that cities are going bankrupt everywhere. It disburses billions to aid poverty, with the result that poverty has doubled or tripled. It has been disbursing hundreds of millions annually to hospitals with the result that a bed has increased in cost from $10 to $100 a day. Whenever the federal government expends money in these and a multiplicity of other unconstitutional programs, the cost to the taxpayers and consumers soars into the stratosphere."

Dr. Larson added, "We are convinced that unless the U.S. Congress adopts a sound fiscal policy the termination of the American Republic is inevitable within the foreseeable future. If the federal government continues its vast programs of unbridled waste, its deficit spending, its policy of issuing vast quantities of 'printing press' currency and its enormous giveaways to foreign countries, we will, before very long, have a five-cent dollar, see the destruction of free enterprise and witness the decline of all investments in insurance policies, savings accounts, bond reserves, etc.

"In 1969," said Dr. Larson "Liberty Lobby advocated the Tax Equity program which would close loopholes in the tax code totaling at least $45 billion. This would have made it possible to give every American family a basic exemption of up to $15,000 without reducing Treasury revenue."

In his testimony, Dr. Larson summed up his case, "The productive American people, the useful middle class, is now paying between 62 and 65% of their entire income in taxes and interest. They are approaching the breaking point. I sometimes wonder whether the Congress is trying to drive them into some form of bloody revolution.

"History consists to a large degree of rebellions against tyrannical government. Is this to be the termination of the noble experiment left us by our Founding Fathers?," he concluded.

Reader's comments are welcome. Please pass along any points of view to: Liberty Lobby, Dept. 3-14, 300 Independence Ave., S.E., Washington D. C. 20003.

American Women Continue To Reside In Ivory Towers

by Suzi Baker

As this country's bicentennial celebration nears realization, I can't help but consider the inequitable treatment still afforded half of American society. It is inconceivable to me that for more than 200 years this country has failed to recognize the untapped potential of women and this acute blindness remains. With the advent of our 200th anniversary, the future of women's rights is still clouded. Granted, major strides have been made in the past few years to equalize the system but it just isn't enough. Within this ivory tower we may easily deny that real sexual discrimination exists. Don't kid yourself. If you haven't felt the pressure within these walls just take one step outside. It's there.

What recourse does a woman have who feels she has been discriminated against? That, of course, depends on the particular type of discrimination involved. In a very general sense, the courts have construed the "equal protection" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to apply to sex discrimination cases. Briefly, this amendment states, "No State shall. . .deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." This particular amendment has been used to combat discriminatory laws and practices. Cases involving blacks, ethnic minorities, voters, poor persons and women have found recourse in this amendment.

For women, this amendment has been interpreted as "no State shall deny any person the protection of equal laws." In order to ascertain whether violations of this amendment have occurred, the courts use a two-fold test. The first, is a test for "reasonableness". The court examines the reasonable purpose of a law. If it finds this purpose in violation of equal protection, the law will be struck down.

The second test for violation is termed "strict scrutiny". The courts must determine whether the State has a purpose of "overriding public importance" in passing the law. Then the courts must decide whether the classification established by the law is necessary to accomplishing the purpose of the law.

There is another Constitutional alternative in the offing, although passage remains dubious. The Equal Rights Amendment was originally proposed in 1929, and Congress finally passed it in 1972. The Amendment is now being considered by the state legislatures. Thirty-eight states must ratify the amendment for the amendment to become law. Redently the ERA was defeated in both the New Jersey and New York legislatures.

Very simply the ERA states, "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex." The ERA does not prohibit discrimination by private individuals or institutions. However, the prohibition does cover a range of government activities from the p-assing of discriminatory laws to engaging in discriminatory practices. The ERA would also apply to those private institutions whose activities are supported by or involved with the government.

What the Equal Rights Amendment would do is increase the chances of winning sex discrimination cases. Presently, women have very feeble legal legs to stand on. The ERA would provide a solid base upon which discrimination cases can be built. It has become evident in the past 200 years that legislation and litigation are the most successful way to gain equality.

The Fourteenth Amendment and the proposed Equal Rights Amendment are the Constitutional bases to eradicate inequality. A number of statutes have been passed with regard to discrimination. Most notable among these are Title VII of the 1964 Civil Right Act, the Equal Pay Act, the Education Amendments of 1972 (affectionately known as Title IX), and two Executive Orders, numbers 11246 and 11478.

Women are making gains through court decisions. Since December 1974, the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that women cannot be excluded from juries; women cannot be ignored as income producers when the government computes survivor benefits under social security; and women cannot be denied child support based on the presumption that they reach adulthood earlier than men. The very fact that the Supreme Court has had to rule on such seeming trivialities is indicative of the still prevalent spirit of

T'was Weeks Before Christmas
And all through the dorm
Many creatures were stirring
With trees to adorn.
But the people in 321 (Lesher)
Those ingenious little beasts
Came up with a tree
Upon which all eyes could feast.
So simple and pure
This beautiful thing
In proper setting
So natural and free.

Student Gov't

by The Public Relations committee

Marathon Weekend is over, but student government is not going on vacation by an means. With new projects to plan and old problems to solve, we are preparing for a busy winter term. Last week the first ideas for a centennial project were heard. Although the ideas were few, and attendance was typically sparce, two ideas are now being considered. The first of which is Spring Clean-Up Day in which Sherwood Forest would be replanted, Muddy Run would get cleaned out as well as other beautification projects. The second idea was a Centennial Dinner for students for which there would be a speaker on the relevant history concerning the college, this dinner project would be run similiar to Madrical Dinner. Any further ideas would be appreciated, contact Jeanie Ahearn.

The Resident Hall Association is working on a Centennial project of their own. Plans are being made to hold competition for a Centennial-shirt design developed by a student and to be on sale in the Spring to anyone interested. After vacation the R.H.A. will be sponsering a movie for the students.

Among current concern for the students is the proposed return to the semester system. A commission will be set up to study the situation next year and make a workable proposal for the next year. Hopefully students will take the initiative and voice their opinions on this relevant topic.

(Along Muddy Run)

by Saltz

Although one couldn't tell it from the weather we have been experiencing, there is only two weeks left until the most celebrated holiday of the year arrives. Actually the spirit of Hanukkah and Christmas has struck many of the campus cammunity, if you are like me, you don't have a lick of your shopping done yet. The phenomena that facinates me is that the two major religions of the Americas, Christianity and Judaism manage to have one of their greatest religious holidays at the same time of year.

Actually when one stops to think about it, whether there is a divine being or not, there is nothing wrong with the ideologies that are set forth in each religions' scriptures. Treating all men like brothers could do a great deal with not only international relations, but also in the individual's interpersonal relations, The old as the hills Golden rule also says a great deal about how we should conduct ourselves towards others, a rule that does hold up somewhat, but I hear — him, he never bought me a beer, used to a greater extent.

The Christians are celebrating the birth of Jesus Christ, who to some was a man with vision, and to others was ans still is a divine being. At any rate, whatever he was or is, he also had (has) a great deal to say about how one should treat his fellow man. Love is of course the paramount important in Christ's teachings, of course truning the other cheek, something very foriegn to societies and people all over the world.

Now a stop and look at the above objectives of the Christian and Judaism teachings reveal why we celebrate a time together. Almost none of the religious' major Goals are met as mankind hates, kills, and have vengance in their whole beings. Is it any wonder when the previous feelings persist in amnkind for 50 weeks out of the year, that we shouldn't be able to pull ourselves together and be of good cheer for a couple of days and pull together the little bit of kindness that we so adeptly hide for the rest of the year.

I guess that I have painted the human race a pretty terrible mess, and you think of me a pessimist. For two thousand years people have been talking about brotherhood, and yet their isn't a person reading this article that doesn't harbor a grudge against an ethnic or racial group the author included. We still fight wars over the same old things, land, control of certiam economic treasures, just like the any war at any period in mankind's development. In fact it may be that over certain very casic characteristics, such as world wide compassion we have not changed since our species first crawled out from under a fock.

For you grinches out there who would like steal Christmas and hide it so it will be bothersome no more, think about the positive attitudes that may be generated by this special holiday. Even if your thing isn't God or religion, I certainly do hope that at least a world of Peace and brotherhood among mankind does appeal to you, and because the hope of a better world is something you would like to see, you will adopt the Christmas Spirit.

An Appeal

Sir Perry

Gentlemen,

Methinks it appropriate that in this year of centennial jubilation, nurture a bewiskered chin. Is this facial accouterment inconsistent with contemporary standards? Good Sirs, I assure you, a muff is not inconsistent with the fashion of the day. Have not our fellow countrymen enjoined this manner of sodality from time to time in order they may more fully celebrate their heritage? Gentlemen, many of ye are aware of communities in which the penalty for shaving has been temporary confinement in the community stockade! (However, to do so here, I feel, would usurp a personal liberty.)

Men of good will, I do implore your cooperation. Indulge thy manly nature. The beard was good enough for Mr. Zuck, it is good enough for thee.

Who Are The Kurds?

STORY BY John S. Porter

Swish-Boom. Rat-Tat-Tat. Machine gun bullets fly. A tank returns fire on a mountain hideout. From a hole just below the front, comes another burst of machine-gunning. On another mountaintop, a handgrenade is readied to be thrown. Ka-Boom! It missed its mark. A small rocket id launched from an antique rocket launcher. Boom-boom-crackle-ka Boom! As the tank goes up in flames, many men come rushing out of their hiding places seeking to avenge themselves on the remaing crew of the tank.

The scene just described is not between the Ethiopian army and Eritrean rebels. It is not between Israelis and Egyptians. This battle was between an Iraqi tank and Kurdistan freedom fighters. Just who are the Kurds, and where is Kurdistan? For a nation of guerillas, and over 4200 years of constant struggles for independence, Kurdistan is little noticed in the modern world of today. The Kurds trace their history back to biblical times, when Abraham and Ishmael were living. They believe that Ishmael was their forefather, and like Ishmael, they have been fighting ever since their beginning (approximately in the years between 2300 and 2260 B.C.)

This enslaved nation has had more experience in self-government (made up of local tribes and clans) than has the Palestinian Liberation Organization (P.L.O.), and has only been local or regional in its efforts of gaining independence. Who ever heard of a Kurd shooting athletes of hijacking a plane? Instead of these violent crimes, the Kurds carry out their war for independence against the Turks, Syrians, and Iraqis on a local scale, quite unlike the P.L.O. But yet they receive little, if any, recognition from the U.N. or elsewhere, even though scores of recorded cases of genocide (wiping out of an entire people or tribe) have been committed by Iraqi soldiers bent on total annihilation of the Kurds and the Kurdish race.

Located in the Middle East, Kurdistan has always been a crossroads for soldiers, missionaries, and traders with their camel caravans. Hence, many kingdoms have fought over this unique area. Located on two major rivers (the Tigrus and Euphrates Rivers), Kurdistan enjoys its position as the crossroads of the Middle East. As a "link" between Europen Turkey, Asiatic Iran, and Middle Eastern Iraq and Syria, Kurdistan benefits from being able to control who uses this heavily-traveled area. The Kurds at times have laid down taxes on passing caravans. The mountains aid the Kurds, for here is natural protection for Kurdish cities and military posts.

Because of their long history of fighting, the Kurds are well trained and used to the idea of permanent warfare. However, they would still enjoy freedom, if the nations of Iran, Iraq, Syria, Turkey and the U.S.S.R. could find it in their hearts to grant the Kurdish people, their dream: independence. Other nations would also benefit from an independent Kurdistan. The U.S. would gain a badly needed ally in the Middle East. The Kurds hate the Soviets because of the past invasions by the czars of Russia on the Kurdish homeland. At present, the Soviets are holding over 2 million Kurds within the borders of the Soviet Union. This is another cause for Kurdish hatred of the Soviets.

Israel already benefits from Kurdistan. Of the 8 divisions of tanks and other heavy artillery that Iraq has, 6 are occupied with the Kurds, leaving only 2 divisions to attack Israel. Other nations might find Kurdistan a very valuable trade partner, once the Kurds obtain their freedom. Rich oil deposits have been found in Kurdistan, along with other highly-valued minerals. The Kurds, resourceful as they are, would have little trouble establishing industries to trade with other foreign nationalities. Then too, because the Kurds will not get the world involved in their own troubles, other nations would find an independent Kurdistan a very peaceful Kurdistan.

In closing, let me point out once again why Kurdistan should receive more attention and recognition than the P.L.O.

1) Their struggle is regional, not international. The Kurds do not terrorize the world. 2) The Kurds have experienced leaders with an experienced form of self-government. (The P.L.O. is still fighting among themselves for leadership).

3) The Kurds are already a productive nation, not a destructive one. 4) The Kurds have a longer history of struggles for independence than has the P.L.O. and finally. 5) The Kurds are a separate race of people with a separate language, unlike the P.L.O. —who fail to represent all Palestinians.

With all of this in mind, isn't it about time that the Kurds be recognized as people deserving an independant nation?

Lines On Wine

by R. Corbin Houchins
E & J Gallo Winery
WAITING FOR BORDEAUX
OR
The Restaurant Ritual Explained

In the last three columns we considered how to examine a glass of wine. Now let's put the procedure in context.

Obviously, it would be inappropriate to evaluate each taste of every bottle of wine you have with meals. The purpose of the wine is enjoyment, not study, so you should use only so much of the full tasting technique as comes naturally. Some wines are complex enough to make scrutiny a pleasure in itself, some —the wines I drink most often— are best quaffed without fuss.

The principal virtue of the full tasting technique is that it shows you as much of the wine as possible in a short time. There are several occasions where that is quite useful, notably when dining out and at comparative wine tastings.

First, in a restaurant. A lot of mystique has grown up around the practice of tasting a wine before accepting it. Most waiters have been trained to present a wine, open it, present the cork for examination, pour a small taste, take a step back and look at the patron expectantly. What next?

The whole point of the tasting ritual is to determine whether the right merchandise is received in the right condition. When the wine is presented look at the label closely enough to make sure it is exactly what you intended; don't let the waiter whip it away before you have finished. If you wish to sample it at all before accepting it, you should unhurriedly go through the entire tasting procedure described in the preceding columns.

Probably you won't find anything wrong with the wine. In seventeen years of dining out fairly regularly, K have sent exactly two bottles of wine back. The rationale for the ritual is mainly historical.

In the days when most red wines required considerable bottle ageing the most common fault was that the wine had become "corked" —i.e., it had picked up a somewhat moldy flavor from the stopper, usually because of improper storage somewhere between the winery and the table. A bad cork is still possible, but most wines nowadays don't have to be aged after they leave the winery, and most merchants know enough to store the bottles properly. I usually squeeze the cork to make sure it isn't crumbly, but seldom bother to smell it: the question is not whether the cork smells like cork, but whether the wine does.

The problem with the two bad bottles I encountered was oxidation. It occurs more often with whites than with reds and shows up as a "burnt" or sherry-like quality. (Sherry is wine that has been intentionally oxidized a bit in the production process to produce a pleasing nut-like flavor; accidental oxidation seldom helps.) Browning of the color os often a tip-off to oxidation.

The fact that the wine is sound doesn't mean nothing is amiss. If a red wine is warmer than you like it, have the waiter put it in the refrigerator while the food is being prepared. If a white needs an ice bucket, ask for it. Even if the restaurant doesn't have traditional containers, you can generally induce them to find something that will hold a bottle of wine in some ice water.

If you think you detect a fault but are not sure, ask the waiter or sommelier to taste the wine, and inquire whether he does not think it exhibits the problem you suspect. Most good restaurants are fair about this. You too must be fair: do not send a sound bottle of wine back simply because you regret your selection, and if you miss a fault at the first tasting do not send the bottle back after it has been partially consumed.

Will Reagan Stand A Chance At Winning The Presidency?

BY Mark Wiener

Although a host of Democrats are competing for their party's nomination for the "Bicentennial" presidential elections, only two Republicans so far have entered in the race; the accidental, conservative incumbent; and a sports announcer turned actor, turned governor turned candidate, Ronald Reagan.

At 64, Reagan has lived a colorful and varied life. One might be surprised to learn that the past Governor of California, well remembered for his condemnation of college protesters, once lead a week-long student strike at his own college in 1911 to protest its puritanical regulations. After college he turned to acting, and became well known through the 50 movies he made and eight year marriage to Jane Wyman. As his acting career declined, he became more interested in politics, became a well known Republican, and in 1966 he ran for and won the Governorship. Though his two terms were less than spectacular, he did manage to turn the state's 194 million dollar deficit into a 500 million surplus.

President Ford certainly is anything but liberal, but compared to Reagan, he looks like George McGovern. This may be because Ford is trying to please both sides of the G.O.P., where Reagan support is mostly right-wing, but deep. And Reagan's strength seems to be growing by the day, with polls showing his popularity slowly catching up with Ford's, thanks to Ford's numerous bunglings. He is definately a challenge to Ford, a much better speaker, a more dynamic personality, and is not concidered part of that "mess" down in Washington.

However, Reagan's strong rightest convictions will probably keep him from obtaining the office. Part of his belief is that the federal government exercises too much power, and if it were up to him such things as welfare, education, and housing would be completely under state control. He almost seems to be a reflection of the McCarthy Era, with the belief that detente is a "one way street that the Soviets have used to continue moving toward the Marxist goal of a socialist, one-world state". He opposes the Equal Rights Amendment, fearing it might bring about such things as integrated rest rooms. He also opposes abortion and any kind of gun control.

Another fault of Reagan's is that he is known for not making his own decisions, and releying to much on other people's advice, including his mothering wife, Nancy. He even seems doubtful if he wants to be President, telling a reporter that he often wishes "someone else were in this position besides me". Ford admitted in a speech that he was a "Ford", and not a "Lincoln", and he has more than proven that over the months. But if Reagan was to get his job, he would probably turn out to be an Edsel.

Another puzzle to solve? Perhaps he should consult Modes!

Calendar of Events

The College Center Board welcomes everyone back to Juniata after what we hope was an enjoyable Thanksgiving vacation. Programming for winter term is now in full swing with an excellent selection of weekly films already scheduled and a variety of other activities and events are in the making by fine arts, recreation, special events, and coffeehouse/dance committee personnel. So put on your winter woolens, brave the raging winter weather, and "come on into Dodge" for some "fun and socializin'!" Here is where it's at, and when:

"Casablanca" — A Bogart Classic

by Zig

I'm sure that if you make the rounds of the campus Christmas party circuit Saturday night, you will easily recognize those fortunate souls who managed to fit a viewing of Casablanca into their party schedule. They will be the ones who, with drink in hand, will saunter up to you clad in a belted trench coat, per at you from under a wide brimmed hat and with a contorted upper lip offer you the following toast— "Here's looking at you, kid." Or possibly you'll find them leaning against a piano (or a wall if there doesn't happen to be a piano handy) romantically humming As Time Goes By to a fairly unattentive lamp. Instead of laughing at them, try to understand that they are merely transfixed by the ultimate cool of Humphrey Bogart.

Casablanca is my personal favorite of the Bogart classics for he retains his tough guy image without removing the element of romance. In Casablanca, he plays the owner of Rick's Cafe American, located in Maracco, a city that served as a jumping-off spot to America for European refugees during World War II. Rick is in Moracco attempting to get over a love affair he'd had in Paris with Ilsa (Ingrid Bergman). She makes the task twice as hard for him and herself by showing up in Moracco accompanied by her husband, who in order ot continue his flight from the Nazis is in desperate need of two passports — passports that Rick can provide if he's tough enough to give up Ilsa.

I know that there are many Bogart fans on this campus because I've talked to you so I hope that you'll come to Oller Hall on Saturday, December 13 at 7:30 p.m. and for 50¢ find out once and for all if Bogart really does say those immortal words — "play it again, Sam."

Three JC Students Run Marathon In Philadelphia

BY Evagelia "Teddy" Lyras

On Saturday, November 29, out of the 300 runners of all ages — ages ranging from young boys 14 years of age to men 60 years of age, including women to about 40 years of age 8 who had set out to run the Philadelphia Marathon, 225 finished, among them Jack McCullough, Paul Wilson and Dave Parker of Juniata College. The marathon was run on a nice day over roads and sidewalks that contained hardly any hills.

It was the first marathon for all three of them. They ran it cold, that is they did no special preparation. They did no carbohydrate loading; they ate no special food nor abstained from any; they ran no special mileage; they only did their everyday activities, which included their daily run of about 10 miles. All they knew about the race was that it was a long way, 26 miles, and that they would be more than tired at the end. None of them had ever run 26 miles before. The longest Dave had ever run continuously before was 13 miles; Paul had run 16, and Jack had run 20.

Read on to see how these characters felt during and after the race.

"What kind of feelings did you experience at the starting line?"

"I was a little apprehensive," says Paul, "I knew I had a hard race in front of me and that I would really hurt. I really wasn't sure if I would be able to finish or not. I was not in tip-top condition at the time. But other than that I didn't really feel differently than I usually do before races."

Jack says, "I was not nervous either. I knew I had a long, long, way to go, but I was very happy because running a marathon was always something I had talked about doing, and now I was doing

Dave says he was not scared as he usually was before races. He just thought, "Oh well, here it goes!"

Dave says he felt O.K. within the first 17 miles, that is O.K. in the realms of experience he had felt before in other races. "But after those first 17 miles," he adds, "I felt unbelievingly bad. You wouldn't believe it! My knees and hips started hurting, and blisters began forming. I was feeling very run down those last nine miles. From then on, it was mind over matter."

"How did you feel after crossing the finish line?"

"I was very, very, very glad it was over and very happy that I ran under 3 hours. As to how I felt physically, that is a different story. I felt worse after I had stopped running. My legs were shaking. I felt very rundown, more that I ever did before. I limped back to the car where I found Jack waiting."

But Dave is willing to run another marathon. What do Jack and Paul have to say? Are they ready for another marathon?

Jack would like to run another one in the springtime and Paul says, "Well, I guess I will too."

"Now that both of you are willing to run another marathon, tell us how you felt about the race. Paul, how did you feel after the race?"

"I felt very run down and stiff, but words are inadequate to describe my exhilaration at finishing the race! Running under 3 hours also added to my satisfaction." Paul finished 54th in a time of 2 hours and 54 minutes. "I felt good up to the 16 mile mark," continues Paul, "when I began getting a cramp in my side which persisted throughout the race. When I reached the 20 mile mark, I was just about walking. I did the last 2.2 miles in 23 minutes. I was feeling quite bad. I'm very glad I finished though, because I was not conditioned at all."

"How about you Jack, how did you feel during the race?" (Jack finished 21st with a time of 2 hours and 43 seconds.)

"I felt very good. I was very comfortable. I didn't start feeling bad till I reached the 20 mile point. Then it came upon me all of a sudden. It was an awful feeling. I was dizzy, my legs were knotted. It's hard to explain, but I sure felt awful.

"When I crossed the finished line I was happy it was all over. I walked five feet and then clutched onto the nearest pole as my legs began to wobble. I felt as if somebody was continually hitting me behind the knees. But somehow I manaled to walk over to the car, but it was locked."

It can be said that the marathon is one of the longest and hardest races of all. It is a matter of guts, especially the last few miles when it is nothing else but mind over matter. Congratulations to Jack, Dave and Paul for their performances and best of luck in the future!

Women's BB Team Is "OK"

by Kim Norris

The Juniata women's basketball team began practice for the 1975-1976 season on November 4 in preparation for their opening game against Susquehanna University on January 10. While losing only two seniors, Susan Rossnirt and Leslie Whitaker, and several underclassmen due to transfer, the team is strong in returning letter winners and excellent freshmen potential. Those who have previously earned letters are: Jacque Prentiss, Kim Norris, Cathy Dickey, Marci Frye, Janet Edgar and Janet Bechtel.

With a full fifteen fame schedule and the post season MAC tournament, the women face a challenging season with optimism and enthusiasm. They're looking forward to the opportunity of bettering their 7-4 record for 1974-75 and another shot at the MAC championship to be held at Elizabethtown College the first weekend of March.

Second year coach Ed Gargula has one winning season behind him and is anticipating his second. Concerning the team outlook and preseason predictions, he feels that it's definitely going to be a more competitive season due to the several new teams on the schedule. According to coach Gargula, practices have been good and he's expecting a fine season, especially with the added height advantage of the new members.

Several women's games are being played as the preliminary to the men's varsity and a complete schedule of games and times is available from the Athletic Office. The women appreciate the student support they received last year and hope it continues for their '75 season.

sexual discrimination. Fortunately, however, the rulings do signify a trend away from the former oblivious attitude of the Court toward a recognition and resolution of discrimination claims. "No longer is the female destined solely for the home and the rearing of the family, and only the male for the marketplace and the world of ideas."

Gradually women are gaining solid legal rights. You owe it to yourself to know what your legal rights are. You may not feel you will ever need to exercise these rights. But I would venture a guess that you will and often. "Knowledge is power."

Bridge Players Unite on Jan. 15

by Barry Young

Do you like to play bridge, but have had trouble finding a fourth at Juniata? If so a club is being started to partially solve this. Professor Cauffman for the past few weeks has been holding a class to teach bridge every Wednesday. Now he and some Juniata students are planning to start a bridge club. If you are interested in joining, contact either Professor Cauffman of the math department, or myself at box 1339 or call me at room 327 north west, phone number 643- 9954. The first meeting of the club will be on January 15, in the green room of Ellis. This will include an organizational set-up, and some bridge playing, all interested parties are invited to come.

THE JUNIATIAN

VOL. XILX NO. 10 | Juniata College — Huntingdon, Pa. 16652 | January 15, 1976

Forthcoming Acc't. Seminar

Three Juniata College graduates engaged in the field will participate in an Alumni Seminar Program on "Accounting" scheduled Sunday and Monday, January 18-19.

Alumni participants will be Philip G. Thompson, a 1968 graduate and assistant to the president of the General Finance Service Corpora tion of Huntingdon; Stephen T. Gillingham, a 1966 alumnus and tax attorney for the Internal Revenue Service of Washington, D.C.; and George H. Wiest, a 1961 graduate and partner in the public accounting firm of Kuntz, Briggs, Fultineer, Lesher and Siegrist of Lancaster.

Sponsored by the college's department of economics and business administration, the seminar program is designed to give student an overview of the general area of accounting, as seen by persons working in the field.

According to Charles W. Wise, department head and chairman of the alumni seminar program, "The program allows an opportunity for interaction between students and practitioners, both in the discussion of relevant issues and on a more informal social basis. It also provides both students and staff members with data for career planning and designing academic programs."

Some 30 students, primarily upperclassmen with interest in the accounting field, are expected to participate in the seminar sessions.

Unlike the two previous alumni seminar programs, which were held on the Juniata campus, the accounting seminar will tsake place at Camp Blue Diamond, Petersburg RD. In order to provide a more concentrated experience, all participants— alumni speakers, students and business faculty members— will stay at Blue Diamond for the entire program, which runs from approximately 7 p.m. Sunday until 5:30 p.m. Monday.

A general session and panel discussion will open the program Sunday evening. Each alumni participant will give a general description of his company and its operation and describe his particular position and its responsibilities and how it fits into the overall working of the company.

Monday's schedule includes three special topic presentations, small-group career information and academic counseling sessions and informal gatherings.

Special session topics will be: "Accounting in the Financial Service Industry," by Thompson; "Techniques for Manipulating Corporate Profit," by Gillingham; and "Legal Liabilities in Public Accounting," by Wiest.

"Accounting" is the second of three alumni seminars planned by the economics and business administration department for the 1975-76 academic year. During the spring term the seminar topic will be "Corporate Law."

Senior Don Martin contributes to the Juniata scoring drive against Susquehanna with a fine shot.

PHEAA Sends Renewal Applications to Students

The Pennsylvania Higher Education Asistance Agency has begun mailing renewal applications to 80,000 college and other students who now hold state grants. The Agency is doing the mailing now so as to coincide with the holiday vacation period while students are at home.

Those who will receive renewals are students who are now attending college or other postsecondary schools and have previously received a State Higher Education Grant.

Students applying for renewals have until May 1, 1976 to file, but an earlier suggested filing date has been assigned to each applicant. PHEAA urges the students to comply with the earlier suggested filing date.

Executive Director Kenneth R. Reeher said that PHEAA each year sends out renewals as a courtesy to the students and also to ensure a smooth processing flow within the Agency. He added that compliance with the suggested filing deadline given on each application would help the student to be listed as being "on time" with his or her application. This is important, he said, since there is no guarantee that "late" applicants will be processed for any award money.

Reeher said that the fact that a student files an application does not guarantee a renewal award. Awards are determined on an individual basis with emphasis resting on student need. It is possible that some who received awards for the current year may not qualify for the 1976-77 academic year due to changes in financial or other circumstances.

Various factors always play a role in the renewal of an award. In addition to the annual review by the Agency of the applicant's ability to finance the student's education, consideration also is given to increased college costs, the number of grant applications received by the Agency and the amount of funds made available for that year by the General Assembly.

For the academic year 1975-76 (the current year) the Agency made approximately 120,000 awards worth about $70 million.

The state's student aid programs, administered by PHEAA, are designed to help the student whenever possible, but actually supplement the students' parental contribution toward educational costs. Once the need factor is decided, the student then can obtain up to one-third of his needed postsecondary schooling expense money from a grant, one-third from a loan from a private lender under the auspices of the State Guaranty Student Loan Program, and another one-third by working or other sources of financial aid.

Individuals who are not filing for renewals — these would be first-time entrants into postsecondary education — can obtain applications from their high school guidance counselors, or from the financial aid office at the college, business, trade or nursing school they are planning to attend.

New Merit Scholarship Programs Offered At JC

Two new programs of academic merit scholarships, the Brumbaugh-Ellis Presidential Scholarships and Alumni Annual Support Fund Scholarships, were announced by President Frederick M. Binder.

According to Dr. Binder, the programs will provide $35,00 each year in new grants to entering freshmen, regardless of financial need. Ten new Brumbaugh-Ellis Scholars, each receiving stipends of $1500 per year, will be selected annually. At least 20 Annual Sup port Fund Scholars will receive grants totalling $20,000 per year, with stipends ranging from $200 to $1000.

The Presidential program honors five of the eight Juniata presidents who served the college during its first 100 years: Henry B. Brumbaugh (1888-94), M. G. Brumbaugh (1894-1910 and 1924-30), I. Harvey Brumbaugh (1911-24), Charles C. Ellis (1930-43) and Calvert N. Ellis (1943-68). The college, founded in 1876 by several members of the Church of the Brethren, is currently celebrating its centennial academic year.

Criteria for the Presidential awards include high school class rank (upper one-tenth) and high achievement on standard college entrance tests. The awards will be renewable for up to four years given appropriate levels of academic performance.

The Alumni Scholarship will be provided through the college's Annual Support Fund, the goal for which has been raised this year from $130,000 to $150,000. Last year, some 49 percent of Juniata's alumni participated in the college's several giving programs, including the ASF.

Criteria for the Alumni awards will also include class rank and achievement on entrance tests, plus demonstrated levels of character, leadership and citizenshp. They too will be renewable for up to four years provided a specified grade point average is maintained.

"I feel we are making a major step," said Dr. Binder in his announcement, "in our effort to continue attracting outstanding students to Juniata. Despite fiscally trying times, we are making significant sums available to the academically promising student regardless of financial need.

"I urge those who qualify," he concluded, "To avail themselves of this important opportunity."

Mitchell REC NSF Fellow

Dr. Donald J. Mitchell, assistant professor of chemistry at Juniata College, has been awarded a Faculty Fellowship in Science by the National Science Foundation (NSF).

Mitchell, whose application was among 598 submitted to the NSF, was one of only 93 faculty members throughout the United States accepted for fellowship grants.

With awards totaling nearly $1.5-million, the program is designed to help faculty members at colleges and universities broaden their perspective in the applications of science to societal problems.

The NSF grant will enable Mitchell to engage in research on the gasification and liquefaction of coal at the University of Sheffield, England, during the 1976-77 academic year.

Mitchell's award marks the second consecutive year that a member of the chemistry department at Juniata haxs received a NAF Faculty Fellowship. Dr. William E. Russey, professor of chemistry, is currently engaged in research at the Max Planck Institute, Muhlheim-Ruhr, West Germany, through the NSF grant he was awarded last year.

Two From The South

by Mark Wiener

Buried in the crowd of democratic dark horses for the '76 presidential elections are two men with much in common: Jimmy Carter and Terry Sanford. Both are former southern governors; both are in their 50's; and both have a common enemy, George Wallace.

Carter, the better known of the two, is the former governor of Georgia, and is slowly moving into the political limelight. He believes strongly in shrinking the federal bureaucracy and reducing waste; and makes an example of his handy work in his record as governor, when he managed to both increase social services and collect a spending surplus of over 50 million dollars. He categorizes himself as liberal in such fields as human rights and the environment, and a conservative in government management. His biggest threat of course is Wallace, who presently is way out in front in the polls. But Carter's hard campaigning and liberal standings show in an increasing popularity.

Terry Sanford, the less known and promising of the two, is a former governor of North Carolina, and is on leave of his presidency at Duke University. A past Kennedy and Humphrey supporter, Sanford is a little more liberal than Carter and stresses such things as anti-poverty programs and quality education. However, his campaign is $100,000 in the hole; and he has had a previously disastrous campaign, loosing in 1972 to Wallace even in his home state.

Both Carter and Sanford hope to beat Wallace in the state primaries, but the polls prove that doubtful. What is likely to happen is that they, and the other dark horse candidates in effect will neutralize each other, leaving the door wide open for the Grand Dragon.

Zombies, Tune In On This One?

by Steve Townsend

It was the first day of my Christmas vacation and I was sitting in front of my television contemplating the mistletoe and stroking a sweet Christmas cookie when channel 48 programmed an ancient horror classic entitled "I am Zombie".

"Wait a sec sweets," I said as I spun the Roto-Tenna, "lets tune in on this one."

"But I thought you said you were going to study every nite of the break?"

Later that evening, I decided I would make good on my resolution and catch up on a bit of neglected acedemia. Unfortunately, texts and horror movies mix about as well as oil and water, so as the greasy remembrances of "I am Zombie" floated to the surface of my mind, I decided it would be best if I packed away the books and headed to Vic's bar for some darts.

One week later, I had still made no effort to glean the intellectual secrets from my books. Day two of my vacation I had given up the books to watch football. The third day was spent playing football. On the fourth day I figured I had better recooperate from the previous afternoon, and on the fifth, sixth and seventh days I lounged around the girl's place resting furiously.

"You know," my babe said to me on the morning of the eight, "that you haven't studied since you've been home."

Cringing, I replied, "Yes, I know."

By this point in the vacation I was becoming seriously concerned about my lack of disciplinary strength. But even though I was well aware that two tests awaited my return to Juniata, I continued to soak in the soft life and, as a consequence, fell even deeper into my sluggish funk.

The truth was that after nearly two weeks of pleasurable idleness, I didn't really want to have to study again. In fact, when channel 48 decided to re-run "I am Zombie", I found myself back at the tube quite prepared to waste another evening rather than face the subjects.

"Don't you have some catch up work to do?", mocked my Brother.

"Yeah, just as soon as "I am Zombie" is over."

"You ARE Zombie!", he wailed back.

Yes, I was Zombie. I had already picked up the TV guide and zeroed in on an old Garbo flick, and after that a thriller entitled "Ethel and Julius, Spys" seemed too much to resist. It would be just about daylite when that one ended, so I decided that I might as well drive to my girl's apartment and rouse her out for a tasty breakfast at my favorite trucker's diner. And, if we hurried back, I could catch the early morning re-runs of "The Three Stooges" and then maybe a good nap in the afternoon and then the football play-offs and then maybe spend the evening slow dancing at the Back Room and then remember that it was time to go back to Juniata totally unprepared for my two examinations!

Sitting on the Amtrack bound for Huntingdon, I was wondering what had become of all my good intentions. Without a moments exception, I had frivolously wasted an entire vacation. The only thing I had to show for the whole affair was a series of deep guilt creases across my forehead. It was then that I decided that next year I could at least do away with the guilt creases by leaving all my books at school. After all, isn't that where they belong on vacations?

"Deliverance"—The Horrifying Story of Surviving Reality

by Zig

This Saturday night, January 17, at 8:15 you cannot afford to miss what could possibly be your last chance to see Burt Reynolds, Cosmopolitan's Man of the Hour, appearing on screen without his toupee. (And who said that Juniata doesn't expose us students to the most unique experiences that money can buy?) The film will offer you much more than that questionable thrill in return for your 50¢, for as Reynolds has often revealed on the talk show circuit, Deliverance was his first "biggie movie". In many respects Burt was correct.

Deliverance, conceived by author James Dickey, is interesting in that it opposes the currently fashionable belief in the retreat to primitivism. The film depicts the story of four relatively successful businessmen who decide to quench their thirst for adventure by canoeing a wild Georgia river running through essentially untamed country before it is destroyed by progress. For three of the men, the trip into the wilderness is nothing more than a mildly exhilarating way to spend a weekend. But for their fearless leader, Lewis (Burt Reynolds), the experience promises to be a more rigarous test of their ability to survive in opposition with the equally determined will of nature.

By successfully maneuvering some easy rapids, the men are given a very premature sense of triumph over the river. "We beat it, we beat it, didn't we?" shouts Ed (played by Jon Voight of Midnight Cowboy fame). "You don't beat this river," Lewis answers evenly, being more sensitive to the extent of this unconscious life or death battle of wills being waged. Even Lewis, despite his sensitivity, could not have imagined the horror that awaits his party of adventures as they become severed gradually from their superior idea of civilization. This horor is beautifully and brutally depicted on the screen as the men quickly learn that the rules of civilization do not apply to the wilderness. In Deliverance, man must follow the rules of the wilderness in order ot survive even if it means that man must become bestial. Man's spiritual deliverance does not come through a knowledge of nature's power, but through a union with it.

Juniata—Does It Function In TIME? Think About It. . .

by J. Donehue

With all the zany, goodnatured hoopla and plain old good clean fun connected with the nation's Bicentennial celebration, some folks just might overlook Juniata's own celebration in '76. It would seem that Juniata is 100 years old in this year; a hundred years is a long time for anything to survive, and it must certainly be significant in SOME way.

Most students are aware of the four years that they live at J.C.—no trivia too small, no outrage is too momentous not to be discussed, analyzed, and rehashed. Few Students, however- or alumni, for that matter- are well acquainted with Juniata's one-hundred year life span. The college we know is an outgrowth of an experimental school on the second floor of the Brumbaugh print shop. As you can read about in the college catalog, the "Huntingdon Normal School" had only three students, but had already constructed a system of goals and directions. Does the Juniata of today have ANYTHING in common with this Nineteenth Century phenomenon? Is there something unique, something strictly Juniata that has remained constant through those years? What, then, is the golden thread? Can dogs fly? If you find these and other questions interesting, maybe you'd get into the yearbook staff's project: they are compiling photographs, newspaper clips and lots of etc's for a special section in the Alfarata of 1975-1976. Stop by the yearbook office in Ellis or drop them a line if you think you might.

Center Board

The Juniata College Artist Series is especially pleased to welcome back Mr. Robert Swan, a county native who went on from Huntingdon to the Juilliard School and a career as a concert pianist. Having also studied at the Eastern School of Music and the Aspen Music Festival, he is also currently a member of the faculty at the Turtle Bay Music School in New York. Mr. Swan's bicentennial program will be an eclectic selection from the works of such diverse composers as Copland, Brahms, Gershwin and Liszt.

Robert Swan will be performing in Oller Hall on Friday January 16th at 8:15 P.M. Advance student tickets are available free at Ellis Information desk. Tickets at the door will be $5.00.

Where does the camping trip end... and the nightmare begin...?

Letters to the Editor

We feel that the liberal arts program at Juniata College has come under unnecessarily harsh criticism in the past few months. We feel that, contrary to recent reports, the liberal arts fervor is alive and well at Juniata.

A good example of the opportunities for a varied and fulfilling education is evident in our current living quarters in Cloister Dorm. The rainspell this fall gave us an excellent lesson in philosophical moral decision-making; i.e., what to save and what to leave behind when a veritable torrent of water is pouring through the wall. To make the opportunity even more educational, the maintenance crew allowed us to leave the hole unrepaired so as to keep our education a continuing process.

As we moved into the winter months, even more opportunities in learning presented themselves. Shopping around for the best deal in winter-proof window plastic, we finally found the ideal buy in a farm-and-garden store in State College. After putting plastic over our windows, we found that the state of the window frame allowed us to expand even more into the field of home improvement. After caulking all of the cracks and holes shut with a caulking gun from home, and after taping a giant sheet of cardboard over the entire window well, our appetites still remained unsatiated. Consequently, we repaired a broken window pane in the storage room across the hall with some of our left-over cardboard. Our next project will to to remove the peeling paint and cracking plaster on our room walls and to re-plaster and re-paint the entire room.

We have even found an opportunity, through Juniata, to involve ourselves in our country's current bicentennial celebration, and to experience in a small way our forefathers' style of life. Unable to locate electric heaters at home, we have taken to burning candles to provide the necessary warmth. We were planning to install a Franklin stove, but the boarded-up window prevented that, giving us no exit for the chimney-pipe.

Continuing in the bicentennial vein, we, through our bathroom facilities, have further experienced the way of life of our ancestors. The flooding shower stall, due to the long-obstructed drain, gives one the impression of bathing in a flowing stream, and the odor of the urinal gives one the impression of being in the old-fashioned "neces-

Women Attorneys View On Law

Attorney Lillian Raycroft of State College was the guest speaker Tuesday evening at the January meeting of the Juniata College Barristers Club, the college's pre-law organization.

A 1950 Juniata graduate, Atty. Raycroft spoke on two aspects of the legal profession— the role of women in law and the need for integrity in legal dealings.

According to the Centre County attorney, "The qualities of an outstanding lawyer are a combination of intelligence, integrity and diligence." She felt that too often students believe that intelligence is the only necessary ingredient in a successful legal practice, and went on to stress that diligence and integrity are essential for proper client representation.

Seasoning her talk with various anecdotes about her experiences as a woman attorney, she also stated her belief that female attorneys are treated as equals by their practicing male counterparts.

Prior to her presentation, Atty. Raycroft was the guest of honor at a dinner held in the President's Dining Room of Ellis College Center.

Atty. Raycroft earned her law degree from the University of Pennsylvania in 1953. She is an alumni representative on the Juniata College Board of Trustees and a director of Central Counties Bank. In 1965 she served as acting district attorney of Centre Conuty. Her name is listed in the world edition of Who's Who in Finance and Industry and in various other "Who's Who" publications.

HEY KIDZ! ! You say you sometimes wonder about flying dogs? Are time warps and magic mushrooms your thing? Are you a die-hard Trekkie? Have you encountered beings from other dimensions? Even if you haven't, don't feel left out— YOU can explore tomorrow, TODAY!

Your pals on KVASIR, Juniata's 'creative arts' magazine are sponsoring a science-fiction short story contest. Write us a short (try to stay under 10 pages) story that you think fits the "Science Fiction" category, and you could win a $25 U.S. Savings Bond. (Take Stock in America for '76)

There is a distinguished panel of judges that spans all 3 Divisions who will read the stories and decide a winner. We won't try to specify any criteria for writing or judging, simply because such restrictions would be hard to define, impossible to enforce, and would limit YOUR range of expression. If you have reservations or questions, Kvasir's faculty advisor Prof. Ralph Church is always helpful in getting such projects off the ground. Contact details and other trivia are obtainable from Kvasir staff. If your story is selected, it will be serialized in the Juniatian; the deadline for entries is March 1, so start thinking sci-fi. Don't forget Kvasir's Essay Contest— details available from 309 Founders.

Last minute newsflash: A chartered trip to Mars is now being investigated by the Kvasir select committee on Interstellar Travel for those so inclined; details later, Kidz.

(Along Muddy Run)

by Saltz

Detente has been a very controversial issue in the American people' minds for a few years and has become a topic in the upcoming presidential election. Except for a few avid hawks, world peace is a goal we are working for quite diligently, I think that we had better get our heads together and decide what exactly world peace is. To me, co-existence with the Soviet Union would be sufficient, however, it is possible that the Communists in Russia have a very different idea as to the credentials of world peace.

Before Christmas vacation, on the eleventh hour report, we nightowls watched how the Soviet Union has gained the technology to blind our satellite missle Detection system by using laser beams. Another news report 2 weeks later revealed the Chinese stating that conventionally and nuclearly, the Russion Communists had a superior advantage over the United States, in regards to weaponry.

As I see the situation, there are some problems here that have some serious ramifications. The peace of the world could be at stake, if the Soviet Union thinks that they could initiate a war, and devastate the United States. This very possibly could be the Soviet Union's idea of World Peace, quite simply put, to eliminate her opponents.

The important problem that we have a great deal of control over is how are we to react in regards to our weapons situation. The idea that defense funding is too great now, is relegating the role of our nation to that of a second rate power. Are we willing to sit back in our affluence and watch a powerful country dwindle to less than optimum conditions.

The fault for the American people's apathy and outright hatred of Defense spending rests in the secretive Government that we have been experiencing. I seriously doubt if the truth is being let out just how far behind we have fallen in regards to some of our counterparts in the world.

I realize that this article has been quite distastful to think about, as we are talking about a great deal of money to further advance our defense capabilities. There also are a great many social uses for American monies to be spent for other than newer and more efficient ways to kill people, however, let us not be too willing to put the cart before the horse. I see it as very important to make sure that we have the capabilities to deter anybody in the world from making unusual kinds of demands on this country or it's people. The nice thing, and really the only good thing about the weapons system is the fact explanation of the state of the world. We deserve to know who creases the chance that a nation will seek to use them because of the terrible repercussions that would be experienced by it. If we lose this detterence aspect in the world, the damage done may be irreperable.

It would appear to me that the leaders of this country owe us an explanation of the sytate of the world. We seserve to know who we must fear, why, and how to make up the deficit that has been indicated to us. It is more than an obligation for the United States to protect it's citizens. It is the United States duty to deter the threat of Nuclear attack so that everyone in the world need fear the holocaust a bit less.

Presently the Juniata College Senate is preparing for the organizational conference of the Private College Student Lobby Association which will be held this month beginning 24th and ending the 26th on campus, also the Program Committee has arranged for the NATIONAL LAMPOON Editors Review Show to come to campus (the date is still undecided) also the political assassination agency has been signed to come for their Who Killed J.F.K. program to be held January 22nd at 8:15 in Alumni Hall.

The Student Senate has also experienced five resignations from Charlie Kerekes, Peggy Manz, Lynn Bowman, Dave Mitchell, and Barry Eppley. All of these people felt that they were unable to serve the students in the manner of which they should be represented. An election for these vacant seats will be held January 15th. Also Mike Martin of the Resident Hall Association is leaving Juniata for a Washington semester at American University and his position will be filled by John Guju Vice President of the R.H.A.

As of now it seems that J.C. will continue to work on the term system although the Faculty Executive Committee continues to study alternatives to this system as well as other curriculem adjustments. In order to hear student concerns a series of hall meetings are planned Publicity will be posted with time for the meeting.

The Race Has Begun

by Evagelia Lyras, "Teddy"

The race has begun! The runners are stampeding around the track fighting for positions. They suddenly disappear into the woods to climb the hills of the course. The magnamious crowd eagerly awaits the team's return.

25 minutes have slowly gone by, and no one is in sight. 5 more minutes go by with still no one in sight.

But wait! Look over there! Isn't that a runner coming down that hill? Yipee! It's a Juniatian runner followed by. . .wait, let me see. . . anther Juniatian runner! Hurray! We have taken the first two places!

The crowd's elation turns into an uproar (that is if it is a football game, other than that I guess one can call two a crowd.) Both runners are striding along that last bend in the track. The crowd is still in an uproar! The first two runners have finished and there is still no one else in sight. "Hurrah!" screeches the crowd. "Way to go!"

But someone comments, "Those poor souls look so exhausted! Why are they doing that to themselves? I don't understand. Who are they anyway?"

"Whatt do you mean? Don't you know? They are Jack McCullough and Paul Wilson, the two top runners from Juniata College."

"But still, why do they put themselves through this 'tortue'?

"What's so important about running anyway?

"What can one get from it?

"It sure can't be enjoyment. Look at those pain filled facial expressions.

"What's so hard about running anyway? All one does is move one's feet."

Oh yeah! Read on and the answers to these mysterious questions will be found.

Both Jack and Paul have concluded their final college Cross-Country season successfully. Both turned in respectable places at the MAC's. Out of 140 places, Jack finished 6th and received a medal; and Paul finished 21st. Jack thinks he ran a good race and is satisfied with his performance. Paul, who had been bothered by a stress fracture in his ankle, thinks he ran terrible. Even though he had not had a decent run for three weeks, he finished 21st; but he is still not satisfied with his performance.

When asked if they will continue running after college, both emphatically say, "Definitely yes!" It means too much to them to kick it out the window. But what does running really mean to them?

Well, Paul considers it an art form; in an abstract form it is a form of avant-garde- an art experiencing the physical changes in nature. Running provides him with a sensual experience by running shirtless in a summer rainstorm to running bundled up in a winter snowstrom. Jack does not go that complex. To him running is a habit as important as eating and sleeping is to anyone else. If has become part of him. He has not skipped a day without running since high school.

For Jack running purges out the stagnancy of studying. Both agree that running is an excellent way to appreciate nature and its changes. Nature is just beautiful when one notices the changes, but most important of all running provides relaxation. After a good run, both feel as great as new. With the daily frustrations of life purged from the body, one is renewed with energy, ready to attack the problems of life.

"Why do you put yourselves under this 'tortue'?"

Tortue? None of them consider torture. There is a point where torture begins and ends. According to Jack, the body conditions itself to becoming hurt. Through practice one is mentally prepared to feel this 'uncomfortableness'. But in a way, it is a pleasant uncomfortableness. Not something that really hurts.

"How does your family and friends accept this 'atrocious' form of expression some people call running?"

"My family and friends do not understand why I put myself under what they see as aggravation. As for me, I don't see it as aggravation at all; running is very entertaining and enjoyful," says Paul.

Jack says that everybody associates him with running. "Everytime I go home, people first ask me how my running is coming along, then, how I, myself, an doing. As for my parents, they think it consumes me too much. You see, running is a pattern of life, at least to me it is. My life revolves around running, running dors not revolve around me. For example, I can't eat before I go running; and I always have to wait a while after a run before eating. My eating hours revolve around my running habits just as everything else does. Some people just can not see why I subject myself to this, day in and day out."

"How did you ever get into this sport?" I ask.

"Well, I am sort of what is called physically inept at other sports," answers Paul. "Besides, my friends in high school ran too. But to tell you the truth, I really can't pinpoint my reason."

Jack says that he was forced to go out for running. "My dad said I had to go out for some kind of extra activity. I can say that I was rather frail to play any contact sports, but there is no special reason why I picked track. I'm very glad I did though."

"How far do you guys run each day?"

"Oh, we run between 10-15 miles a day. I run in the afternoon mostly with Jack. But Jack also gets up at 6:30 every morning for a three mile run," answers Paul.

"Really? But what if you go to bed late? What happens then?"

"I still get up anyway. It's a habit. I have to," answers Jack.

"Since you run so much haven't you ever been bogged down with injuries?"

Paul says that he's been lucky in comparison to other runners. "Besides this year's unjury, I had a twisted ankle my freshman year and a wrenched back last yeatr, so I can't really complain much."

"Well, I've been even luckier. I haven't had any injuries at all and am not exactly looking forward to any either," adds Jack.

"How about racing, do you race very often?"

"Both of us will run spring track," says Paul, "and both of us plan to run races in Harrisburg and Penn State during the winter. JC has no indoor track team, but a few of us continue competing during the winter. As for after graduation, I will definitely continue competing. Without even asking I know Jack will too, right Jack?"

"That's right!"

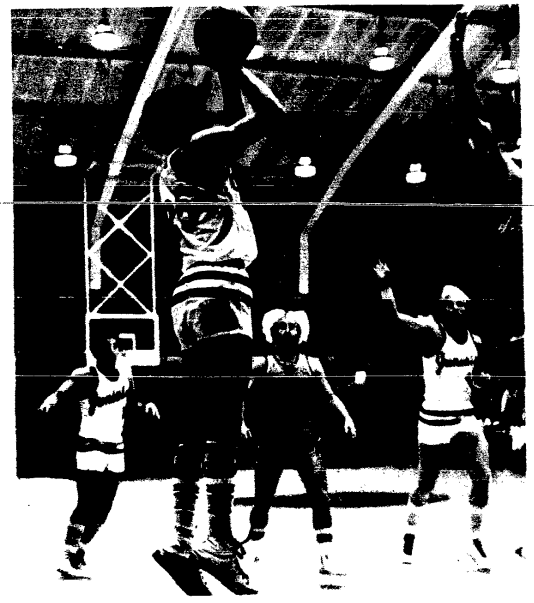
"What do you consider important factors in running?", I ask.

Both seemed to agree that consistency in one's workouts and keeping one's weight down are two very important factors. But that's not all, one must receive enjoyment and self-satisfaction from one's runs; otherwise, it will all be useless. Why run if one does not enjoy it? To run successfully one must also possess confidence in himself, so that he will be able to accomplish what he is capable of doing."

In answering my question what would they tell one who has just begun running, Jack says that patience will be required. "One should not hasten to make a judgement that he does not like running because he is not physically in shape, that will come in time. I would also tell the person, as I said before, to make sure that he runs because he likes it."

This about concludes my interview. For those who have read it. I hope you have enjoyed it. I hope you have gained an inner glimpse into the lines of these two JC runners and why they run.

Next week you will read about two more JC runners, Steve Hooper and George Anderson, and why they run.



Freshman Roger Galo prepares to release his accurate shooting talents.

Galo— Rookie Of The Week

Roger Galo, the freshman guard who is quickly becoming the hottest thing in recent Juniata basketbal history, has been named the ECAC (Eastern College Athletic Conference) Rookie of the Week for Division III in the first week of voting for the current season.

Galo, who has averaged 23.3 points per game in his first seven starts for Juniata, poured in 80 points in three games to earn his first collegiate honor. He had 33 and 32 points in wins over Allentown and Eastern Mennonite, respectively, and 15 in a loss to Maryville. In the latter test he was hampered by a jammed thumb.

Galo also ranks fourth for the Indians in rebounds and second on the squad in assists.

A graduate of Valley High School, the New Kensington native was an All-Section 9 selection last year and led the Vikings to the section title and a runner-up spot in the WPIAL Championships.

Admissions Progressing

BY THE CLOSE OF 1975, the Admissions Office had received close to 4,200 inquiries from high school seniors this academic year. Of this number, 578 were received during December alone. Applications through December totalled 552, with 237 students offered admission.

So far this year, admissions travel has included 366 high schools, 43 "College Night" programs, and 15 commnity colleges. Admissions personnel visited 84 high schools in December alone.

It was noted that nine of the Brumbaugh-Ellis Presidential scholarships have been awarded and four acceptances have been received. Eighteen Alumni Annual Support Fund Scholarships have also been granted.

What About the Black Umbrella and the Red Rose?

by Suzi Baker

The campus community was fortunate last Thrusday to have a speaker from the Political Assassination Investigation Agency. Mr. William Spiropaulos presenred a very thought-provoking program incorporating the most recent facts and speculation about President Kennedy's tragic death. The presentation was highlighted by three film clips, including the famous Zapruder film, and numerous slides.

Mr. Spiropaulos' major thesis was that the assassination of Kennedy was a conspiracy. He estabilished several points in my mind. Undoubtedly, the Warren Commission did not do a very thorough job in its investigation. The men selected for the Commission and the political climate at the time may have significantly influenced the quality of the investigation.

I was also convinced of the three-bullet theory. The evidence presented supported the idea that Kennedy was shot not only from behind but from in front as well. Most likely the shots came from the grassy knoll as evidenced by the angle at which the bullet entered Kennedy's body, the movement of his head in reaction to the shots, and the picture of the man behind the fence.

The presentation included a substantial amount of speculation. Most significant in most people's minds was the mysterious man with the black umbrella. Was this enigmatic man a signal? the actual assailant? or simply an eccentric old man who didn't like the sun? And what about the red roses presented To Jackie Kennedy? Were these really the kiss of death proffered by the Mafia? What of the three tramps who were not booked by the Dallas police? Who were they and why weren't they booked? If E. Howard Hunt was among them, could Richard Nixon be implicated by association? And how about the cop with the earplug and the rubber boots? (Someone will have to clarigy for me the relationship between rubber boots and the assassination). This evidence is reminiscent of attempts made at one time to build a case that Paul McCartney was dead because he appeared on the cover of the Abbey Road album in bare feet, etc.

Outside of the evidence and the speculation, Mr. Spiropaulos never really confronted the question of who killed JFK, and there appear to no solid leads. At one point, he raised the question of Oswald's innocence. I have to wonder why an innocent man with no knowledge of conspiracy would be the target of Jack Rudy's carefully planned execution.

I am a little confused as to where the finger of accusation was point ing. Among the top suspects, according to Mr. Spiropaulors' sketch, are the Dallas police, corporate leaders (an echo of the film "Executive Action"), a Cuban conspiracy, the FBI and the CIA, the Mafia and a worldwide conspiracy. (I'm certainly glad he's narrowed it down for Us!)

Regardless of who did kill JFK, I still wonder where these investigations are taking us. Why are thousands of Americans still pondering the question and why are hundreds of Americans making it a part of their life's work? If they are seeking "justice", I have to question for whom? Justice for the Kennedy family? The Kennedy family will neither comment nor cooperate with these investigations. Justice for the American people? Assuming that a specific person or group can be established as part of the conspiracy, (and that's quite an assumption!) the statute of limitations for the crime has long since expired.

If the reason for this misdirected effort is to let the truth be known to the American public, I would hope that they establish what the truth is before they add fuel to the already burning doubts that Americans have concerning their political institutions and leaders. Perhaps, it is this very atmosphere of doubt that gives impetus to these assassination investigations, which in better times would not be encouraged.

At any rate, I urge members of the audience to maintain a healthy skepticism about the whole question. We have been presented with one side of a story. Mr. Spiropaulos spoke in generalities and did not cite many concrete sources of information. We, as humble stdents, were in on position to really challenge his presentation. I am not trying to tell you that what he said wasn't true. To the contrary, I feel that he presented a convincing case in certain respects. I am simply trying to caution you in believing everything he said. Keep in mind the old aniom, "You can believe nothing of what you hear and only half of what you see."

A special thanks to the Student Government for sponsoring the program.

Liberal Sen. Bayh Jumps In

by Mark Wiener

With the political shrewdness of a veteran Washington politician, but the personality of a midwestern back roads farmers, Sen. Birch Bayh seems to be the most paradoxical of the Democratic candidates. A diehard liberal, the 47 year-old Senator from Indiana is known for his work as head of the Constitutional Amendments subcommittee. He was the principal writer of the 25th Amendment, and also involved in the drafting 26th and 27th. His political persuasion runs along the lines of other liberal Democrates, he has in the past supported legislation that favored welfare and public health, civil rights and gun control.

Incongruent to his Washington liferalism is Bayh's country boy appeal. He is infamous for his "Golly gee's" on his 340 acre farm in Indiana, where he feels "closer to God".

Whether it's due to his down-to-earth character, or his introduction of such bills as one last year to break up big oil companies; Bayh has won the support of George Meany, and thus the rest of the AFL-CIO. With this kind of backing, Bayh chances of obtaining the nomination are better, and close to best.

Upperclassmen might remember Bayh's visit to Juniata in the fall of 1973. His topic then was, of course, Watergate. Students complained he sometimes failed to answer questions directly; and when asked about the possibility of his running in '76, he stated that it was too far off to think about.

For now, Bayh seems to be covering all the bases, satisfying liberals with his voting record, and passivefying the conservatives with his "back-on-the-farm charm".

Black Good Friday

On Sunday and Monday evenings, February 1st and 2nd, at 8:15 in Oller Hall, Juniata College and community will offer, as part of its Ceatennial year programming, an original multi-image documentary presentation entitled: A Lincoln Remembrance, Black Good Friday, A Bicentennial Tribute. Professor Clayton Briggs, Associate Professor of Speech and Theater has developed, designed and directed Juniata's first totally automated multi-screen production. The production represents both campus and community involvement, as five men from the community joined with five students in furnishing the narrative and dialogue needs of the script. The Huntingdon Men's Chorus, under the direction of Mr. Tim Flenchbaugh, prepared and taped five songs for inclusion in the story depicting the life and times of Abraham Lincoln. The Juniata College Choir, under the direction of Professor Bruce Hirsh, and the Juniata College Orchestra, under the direction of Professor Ibrook Tower, make an equal contribution tc the visual panarama.

Black Good Friday is a visual, narative and musical retrospective. It captures the turbulent forces unleashed when reason failed to prevail. The story opens with a slave auction representative of the early 1800's and progresses through westward expansion, Lincoln's bith and rise to maturity. The unceasing antagonism existing between pro-slavery southerners and northern and western free staters is woven into the fabric of the documentary, carrying the viewer deeper into the worsening struggle until the attack on Fort Sumter shatters Lincoln's fondest hope of preventing a total dissolution of the Union. Many battles occur before the Union flag is unfurled once again over Fort Sumter. With peace comes promise of quiet and fulfillment for Abraham Lincoln. It was short lived, however, as an assassin's bullet stilled the one person dedicated to healing the wounds of hatred existing between fellow Americans.

Technically, four separate screens will be used in chronologically projecting the events existing within Lincoln's lifespan. One or more screens will be used at any one time, permitting a panoramic sweep of the events and people involved in the historical recounting. The entire program will be totally automated.

Black Good Friday will be shown in Oller Hall Auditorium Sunday and Monday evenings, February Proposal—Safety of Pres.

by Robert Lopresti

In recent times we have had increasing reason to fear for the safety of our President and other politicians. Those public appearances and hand-shaking rallies seem incredibly risky and some major news-magazines live agonized over the feasibility of eliminating them or at least making them safer.

I would like to make a modest proposal on how we can do just that.

To begin with, we must first see exactly what the problem is. Since we all know that those hand-shaking expeditions are dangerous, why do politicians continue to go on them? Surely not just to influence th minds attached to the hands they shake. No modern presidential candidate could possibly slap enough backs and kiss enough babies to effect the votes.

Then why do they do it? Picture one of those rallies. Besides the candidate, his aides, nervice secret service men, and the crowd, what other large group is always present? TV cameramen, news reporters, still photographers; the media are there. Through the press, radio and TV reports of these events the politician reaches millions of voters. Like many speeches, conferences and professional sports; the political rally has become a media event. It is aimed not at those present, but at the TV cameras.

With this in mind, the solution to the problem becomes obvious. Instead of having the candidate appear before an unknown and possibly dangerous crowd for the sake of the cameras, send him to Hollywood, or any other film center. There, out-of-work set designers (my plan will obviously help the unemployment problem, too) can recrereate what ·ver city the politician was hoping to impress. Hundreds of out-of-work extras can be hired to simulate a crowd, and the secret service can check out and frish every single one before the star arrives, to ensure his safety. Once the scene has been recorded on film it can be shipped to whatever cities the candidate wants, where all the news shows can run it.

Besides increasing safety and employment my plan has other good points. It is more foolproof then today's method. In mine there is no chance of a too-small or unenthusiastic crowd, or bad weather, or abscence of mediaspoiling the event. Furthermore if something goes wrong it can simply be done over. If Muskie starts crying, or Ford falls down the stairs, or someone shouts "what about Chappaquiddick?" at Kennedy, that part of the film can be simply clipped out and done again.

Some spoilsports are sure to object to my plan. They'll say that we'd be selecting the best actors instead of the best candidates, and also that the public will object to the rehearsed quality. In answer to the actor objection I would say that we already are voting for actors. Remember when people said Nixon lost to Kennedy because of his bad make-up job on the TV debate? As for the rehearsed quality, I don't think the public is stupid enough to think that much of what they see politicians do is spontaneous, and yet they don't seem to be complaining.

One final thought. The media, with all the elaborate publicity which it has given assassinations and attempted assassinations have certainly helped inspire the recent attempts. This way, part of the problem would become part of the cure.

Letters to the Editor

While reading (Along Muddy Run) in the January 15 issue, I began to wonder if the author knows what detente means. The dictionary definition is "A relaxing of tension, as between nations." In my mind one does not relax tension by making more and more bombs; this only makes the other nation(s) nervous. In order to feel secure they then make bigger bombs than ours, and the spiral continues upward. Does it really matter if we have only enough power to destroy the USSR six times while they are able to blow us up ten (or twenty or fourty)? Contrary to popular belief, Once Is Enough.

I do not feel that ". . .the American people's apathy and outright hatred of Defense spending rests in the secretive Government that we have been experiencing." More probably, people are beginning to question the necessity of spending billions and billions of dollars on stockpiling 'better' weapons, when this same money could be spent on many projects that would help man (medical research, education, space exploration—the list is infinite).

In the militaristic situation discussed in this article, the only way a nation could make the ". . .unusual demands on this country or its people" of which he writes is by threat of force. Our country is far too important to the world both as consumer and producer for any nation to actually carry out a threat of destruction. (What would the USSR do without our wheat now?)

I do agree that the leaders of our country owe us an explanation of the state of the world. I question, however, that we must make up a deficit in weaponry. The idea of detente and world peace is not to threaten other nations, but to learn more about them in order to understand them and co-exist without war (be it military or cold).

Bloomsburg to Hold Simulated Convention

On April 9th and 10th, Bloomsburg State College will hold its third Simulated National Convention. In 1972 it was attended by 1,400 students from over twenty colleges and universities in the Eastern United States. The program operates similar to a regular national convention. This year's Democratic Convention will seat 1,500 delegates (half the number to attend the actual Convention in New York City).

This affair is sponsored by the Community Government Association in cooperation with the Department of Political Science. The Steering Committee invites social organizations, clubs, groups of friends, etc., to join together and form state or territorial delegations. The delegate fee is $1.50 per person.

Limited overnight accommodations will be available on a "first-come, first-served" basis. Admitted to all events, delegates amend and vote on the platform, nominate and vote for candidates for President and Vice President, and are served linch on April 10th.

The Presidential and Vice Presidential nominees in 1968 were Nelson Rockefeller and Ronald Reagan; in 1972 they were George McGovern and Vance Hartke. Past speakers have included Gerry Ford, Frank Church, Shirley Chisholm, and Tom Eagleton. The Steering Committee presently has a commitment from George McGovern to speak as Distinguished Lecturer on March25th at 8:00 P.M. In addition, invitations have been extended to Lowell Weicker and Ed Muskie for April 9th and 10th.

Information and application forms may be obtained by writing: Simulated National Convention, Bloomsburg State College, Bloomsburg, Pa. 17815.

Circle K Club Chartered

Circle K, one of the newest organiations on the Juniata College campus, was formally chartered on Tuesday, January 27.

Dr. Frederick M. Binder, Juniata president, was the principal speaker at the charter night dinner, scheduled for 6 p.m. in the Faculty Lounge of Ellis College Center.

Initiated through the efforts of the Huntingdon Kiwanis Club, Circle K has attracted approximately 30 Juniata students who express interest in a service organization for college students.

Ten Circle K members at Juniata participated in the club's first service project during Christmas holidays when they "rang the bell" in downtown Huntingdon in support of the Salvation Army's program for the needy.

(Along Muddy Run)

by Saltz

Both for the participant and the spectator types, Juniata does a fairly good job of providing athletic events for the campus community. The winter months bring Basketball for both sexes on both a varsity and intramaul basis, as well a multitude of other athleteі activities. There is a new sport on campus however that does not fall into either one of these categories, Ice Hockey. Actually there has been a Ice Hockey Club on campus either officially or unofficially four approximatly four years. However due to the help of Dr. Binder, and the Athletic Director Mr. Nadzak, the club has finally concluded it's long search for opponents. The search ended when Juniata joined a non-NCAA sanctioned league made up of other college Ice Hockey clubs who desired to upgrade their Ice Hockey programs. The schools that banded together include Juniata, Indiana University of Pennsylvania, Lock Have State, Millersville State, Slippery Rock State, as well as others.

Last year Juniata was undefeated in it's competition with other college's club teams, and all in all had a good season despite losses to a Johnstown all star squad, and a State College club team. This year, however, the Indian skaters are off to a slow start due to difficulties in obtaining ice time for practice sessions.

The Indian coach for the year, replacing Michael Harrison, will be Mr. Paul Hegerling, who's Hockey experience reflects back to his days as an undergraduate at Penn State, and furthers itself as an ex player with the Johnstown Jets. Some of the returning players from last year are: Captain Vince Vince Sarni, as well as Jeff Bloss, Gary Hager, Ken Rodger, Don Plummer and Dan Bausher, who no doubt will be key personal in the outcome of the rapidly approaching season.

If you enjoy seeing the Flyers beat the life out of the Ruskies or just would like to see some familiar faces trying to put that small hard rubber disk past a goalie and into the net, join us at Penn State!

Rock'n Roll Is A Great Trip

by Steve Townsend

Whenever some mush-minded connisseur of "Culture asks me why my turntable never plays "classical" music, I coldly stare him straight in the eye and reply, "Umm, very anti-boogie". Inevitably, he becomes extremely indignant and begins accusing me of being ill-cultured, vulgar, and possessed of very coarse sensibilities", all of which I demonstrate by proudly commenting, "If Beethoven would've had to ride the back of the bus, he wouldn't have been such a musty old prig".

Essentially, I can't stand music penned by prigs, and to my tastes a prig is any musician who did not, or does not now, play Rock and roll. And why should I think any other way? Indeed, how could I feel any other way? I', as American as Motherhood, Apple Pie and Afro-Sheen. If George Washington was brought up to tell truths, I was raised to blow them out the bell of a tenor saxophone.

By the time I was four I had committed to memory the entirety of Presley's early "Hound Dog". A few years later I was regularly accompanying chaperons to teen dances at the Tyrone YMCA. There, I was introduced to the likes of Little Richard, Fats Domino and Jerry Lee Lewis, My first record album was a collection ofChuck Berry's Greatest Hits which the doctor prescribed to help me over the measles. I don't know how beneficial the album proved health wise, but songs the likes of "Johnny B. Goode", "Sweet Sixteen" and "Maybelline" found a soft spot in my young heart.

Today, years later, my tastes remain loyal to those same acts. If my preferences had shifted at all it was toward a deep and abiding respect for R and R as a lasting art form. Consequently, I can now see past its youthful exuberance and into its always pathetic undercurrent of vulnerability. But what may be more important than my understanding of Rock and Roll's nature is my newfound recognition of it as America's peculiar and glorious musical gift to the world.

Unforunately, American's production of the art has not been overwhelmingly prodigious. Considering that I'm still purchasing old Beatle and Stone records by the gross, one could say that it has been nearly non-existent. As a matter of fact, if one were to survey the entire field of American rock acts (including that over rated upstart Springsteen), he would find the only act legitimiately entitled to carry our native banner would be Grand Funk. And even though they be cut from the same native cloth as the rest of us, we have to admit that they are not masters of their craft.

As a good American this paucity of national talent tends to distract from my overall enjoyment of the music. I can't help but begin to seriously ponder the claims of the European fans. I ask myself if Rock and Roll is really only an overdone fad, a fancy that has overstayed its welcome in the hearts of Ill-cultured persons like myself. But deep down within me, in that unfathomable, mysteriously rich soil that gives life to all my divine emotions, I realize that Beethoven has rolled over forever. And that as long as a handful of cheeky native punks wish to shake the complacency from the minds of all Americans, the potential for Rock and Roll will always be unlimited.

Sen. Bentsen Introduces YEA

Senator Lloyd Bentsen (D-Texas), a candidate for the Democratic Presidential nomination, has introduced the Youth Employment Act of 1975, which is designed to help America's young people locate jobs and aid them in selecting a career.

In a Senate speech, Senator Bentsen said, "Almost half the unemployed in this country are young people; 3.3 million youths under 25 years of age are out of work and are having great difficulty finding a job." He went on to say "One reason unemployment among the young is disproportionately high is a lack of understanding about where job opportunities lie."

As an example, Senator Bentsen said that during the 1970's, over 4 million people will be trained for teaching positions but only 2 million grade school and high school positions will be open. Bentsen added, "We knew years ago that the number of students would fall after the post-war boom babies went through school, but no one passed that information on to preparing teachers." "Now," continued Bentsen, "millions of young Americans will waste time and money preparing for teaching jobs that don't exist."

The Senator offered his Youth Employment Act to help solve this problem. His proposal would put counselors in high schools and vocational schools to help advise and place students in jobs prior to graduation. The plan would place computer terminals in schools so students themselves can get information about careers and specific jobs, and it would also establish neighborhood and seasonal placement offices to assist youths who have left school.

Questions of Responsibility Being Asked by Center Board

by David Corman

Exactly what is the purpose of the Juniata College Board? How does this building bearing the inscription "Ellis Hall" function as a "college center?" These two important questions were among those raised as a result of a critical evaluation of the role of the College Center and Board, and its relation to the college community, during a five-day leadership conference last summer. Since that time, the Center Board has been involved in an introspective process in a serious attempt to answer these questions.

Specifically, we have been looking at the current set of by-laws (wherein lie the statement of purpose and ground rules for the Board) under which we have been operating, programs of activities which have been offered in recent years, the social and educational needs of the college community, and the relationship which exists among these three items. We have found, unsurprisingly enough, that the needs of the college community have changed since the beginning of the decade, which suggests to us that programming along traditional lines may no longer be satisfying these changing needs. Increasing difficulty in solving current questions of Center policy according to the by-laws has indicated to us the inadequacy of these guidelines in the areas of programming and use of the College Center. Accordingly, we feel that the future effectiveness of the College Center and its Board will only be assured through a revision of its by-laws.

Within the next month the College Center Board will be making important chamges in these guidlines, as well as investigating new approaches to programming of activities. Implicit in these changes is a redefinition of purpose of the Center Board, which is directly influenced by the needs of the college community which it serves. We obviously need your help to make these changes effective; new guidelines will be used to clarify policies dealing with use and functioning of the College Center, which will affect you as a member of the college community.

A questionnaire will be distributed shortly, asking for your perceptions of Ellis Hall as a college center and of the responsibilities of the Center Board. Please cooperate; your response counts! In the meantime, we urge you to bring your complaints and suggestions directly to us: Center Board meetings are held every other week, and are open to the public. We are also officially installed in our new office on the ground floor of Ellis Hall, and a Board member is available to discuss ideas and answer questions in the evening from 5:30 to 6:30, Monday through Friday. Come and talk with us!
